BULLETIN NO. 2001-1

DATE: May 4, 2001

TO: All Land Registrars

Land Titles Act
Registry Act

Condominium Act, 1998

I. INTRODUCTION

The Condominium Act, 1998 is the culmination of many years of consultation to reform the existing legislation. The new Act will provide for increased consumer protection through more detailed disclosure requirements prior to the sale of a condominium, mandatory post construction audits of the common elements after registration of the condominium project and ongoing reserve fund studies to ensure adequate funding is available for repairs throughout the life of the condominium.

In addition to the increased consumer protection, the new Act will introduce new forms of condominium ownership. These new forms will allow the industry to address a variety of consumer needs by allowing freehold and leasehold condominiums. Beyond the standard condominium type now in existence, the new forms of freehold condominiums will encompass vacant land condominiums, common element condominiums, amalgamation and phasing of standard condominiums. Standard condominiums can also be constructed on leasehold lands.

The provisions of this Bulletin are effective as of May 5, 2001, being the date the Condominium Act, 1998 (new Act) comes into force. A series of Regulations under the new Act – O. Reg. 48/01, 49/01, 50/01, 51/01 and 52/01 have been filed and are available on the MCBS Internet site - www.ccr.gov.on.ca.

In summary the types of condominiums in the new Act are:

1. Standard Condominiums

Standard Condominiums will be entitled - '(LRO Division) Standard Condominium Corporation (Plan) No. ____'. All condominiums in existence at the time the Condominium Act, 1998 comes into force are deemed to be standard condominiums however, the word "Standard" shall not be added to their name.

2. Leasehold Condominiums

Leasehold Condominiums will be entitled - '(LRO Division) Leasehold Condominium Corporation (Plan) No. ____'. It is anticipated that Leasehold condominiums will be developed on institutional lands (e.g. universities, hospitals) where there is an obligation for the institution to maintain title to the property. The initial term of a leasehold condominium will be between 40 and 99 years.

3. Vacant Land Condominiums

Vacant Land Condominiums will be entitled - '(LRO Division) Vacant Land Condominium

Corporation (Plan) No. ____'. Units are not part of a building or structure. Units are on one level only and the condominium must contain common elements. A vacant land condominium must be freehold and cannot be combined with any other type of condominium.

4. Common Elements Condominiums

Common Elements Condominiums will be entitled - '(LRO Division) Common Elements Condominium Corporation (Plan) No. ____'. Common Elements Condominiums have no units. The owners of the common interest are owners of freehold parcels of land (parcels of tied land or POTL's) that are not part of the condominium property. The parcels of tied land must all be in the same land registration division as the condominium land and they must have a land titles absolute title or have a valid certificate of title.

5. Phased Condominiums

A Phased Condominium will be entitled - '(LRO Division) Standard Condominium Corporation (Plan) No. ____'. Only standard condominiums may be phased and the intention to create a phased condominium must be indicated on the first page of the declaration. The declaration must also set out the "servient tenement" which are lands that the declarant owns and intends to include in the condominium as future phases. The phases will occur by way of an amendment to the declaration and description and will re-describe the condominium lands to include a part of or the entire servient tenement. Future phases can be registered within ten years of the time of the initial registration.

6. Amalgamated Condominiums

An Amalgamated Condominium will be entitled - '(LRO Division) Standard Condominium Corporation (Plan) No. ____'. Only standard condominium corporations may amalgamate. The word 'amalgamated' will not be part of the name of the new condominium corporation or plan. All declarations, descriptions, bylaws and rules of the amalgamating corporations cease to apply and will not be brought forward to the amalgamated corporation. All outstanding encumbrances or interests that affect the common elements or units in the amalgamating condominiums will continue and will be brought forward to the appropriate index or register in the amalgamated condominium.

Registration checklists for each type of condominium will be available for staff and clients. The checklists will be updated periodically.

II. TRANSITION PROVISIONS

The regulations under the new Act set out a transition period of 6 months, commencing when the new Act comes into force on May 5th, 2001. A declaration and description may be submitted for registration under the old Act during this time however, they must still go through the pre-approval process and be registered on or before October 31, 2001. This provision also applies to amendments to the declaration and description.

III. GENERAL PROVISIONS

1. Condominium Corporations Index

The Condominium Corporations Index is continued under the new Act (s. 3(3)) and will be in the existing format being MCBS Form 10315 (88).

2. Non-Automated Condominium Register - Land Titles Act/Registry Act

If the records of the condominium property are not automated, the Condominium Register, referred to in s. 3(4) of the Act, will be kept in a loose-leaf book and will include a set of four groups of pages, continued from the old Act, consisting of:

- (a) a Property Parcel Register or Property Abstract Index in the existing MCBS Form 10314 (88);
- (b) a Constitution Index in the existing MCBS Form 10316 (88);
- (c) a Common Elements and General Index in the existing MCBS Form 10317 (88); and
- (d) except in a common elements condominium, a series of Unit Registers or Unit Indices, one for each unit included in the condominium property, in the existing MCBS Form 10318 (88).

3. Automated Condominium Register - Land Titles Act

- (1) If the records of the condominium property are automated, the Condominium Register shall contain one PIN for each unit;
- (2) If the records of a common elements condominium property are automated, the Condominium Register shall contain one PIN for the property.

4. Pre-Approval for Registration

The requirement continues that all condominium declarations and descriptions and amendments to the declaration and description must be approved by the appropriate Land Registry Office prior to submission for registration.

5. Condominium Estate and Type Statements

The statements setting out the estate (freehold or leasehold) and the type (common elements, phased, standard, vacant land) shall be included on the first page of the declaration.

6. Planning Authority Conditions

Easements can be created in the declaration as a result of conditions of approval imposed by the Planning Authority. These easements can benefit third parties. (s. 20, new Act) If such easements are created in the declaration, Schedule A will include a note identifying the easements as being so created and a reference to the location within the declaration where the statement of planning conditions are set out. (s. 7(2)(g), new Act)

7. Descriptions of Easements

Descriptions of easements must be in compliance with O.Reg. 43/96, with the following exception, as outlined in s. 45(5), O. Reg. 49/01. An easement created upon the registration of the declaration and description may be described by reference to physical features or a specified level, or levels, and must be illustrated on the condominium survey plans. The extent of the easement must be clearly illustrated as a closed figure and with the use of arrows. A surveyor must be able to physically establish the horizontal and vertical extents of the easement strictly from the information contained on the plan. An easement so described will be deemed to have the approval of the Examiner of Surveys and Land Registrars are authorized to accept them.

8. Easements Affecting Part of a Unit or Exclusive Use Portion

Where an easement affects part of a unit or an exclusive use portion, the requirement will continue that the part so affected will be illustrated and defined by measurements on the plan defining the unit or exclusive use portion or described as a PART on a reference plan.

9. Description Plan Sheets

The description will contain four parts. They are as follows:

- Part I - the perimeter plan sheet and diagrams of the units.
- Part II - the exclusive use portions of the common elements.
- Part III - the architectural plans.
- Part IV - the structural plans.

Although the regulation uses roman numerals, the use of numbers 1, 2, 3 and 4 is also acceptable.

10. PIN/Parcel/Certificate of Title Notation

The perimeter plan sheet for all condominiums, other than amalgamations, will include a notation above or below the Schedule of Appurtenant and Servient Interests (Form 3, O. Reg. 48/01) that relates the land included in the plan to the whole, part or remainder of the land described in the existing underlying PINs, parcels or certificates of title.

11. Declaration Schedules

The regulations under the old Act prescribe only one schedule, being the description of the property set out in Schedule A. The new Act prescribes all required schedules, which vary depending upon the type of condominium, from Schedules A to M. See Appendix A for a summary of each.

12. Schedule C to the Declaration – Unit Boundaries

Sections 5(4) and 56(4) of O. Reg. 48/01 set out the requirements for Schedule C to the declaration. These subsections specify that the unit boundaries be referenced to buildings or monuments and fully describe the monuments or in the case of a vacant land condominium certify that the unit boundaries are controlled by the monuments illustrated on the plan sheet. Schedule C cannot contain inclusions or exclusions from the unit. Typically inclusions and exclusions are pipes, wires, cables, conduits etc. These items more properly belong in the body of the declaration. A note may be included, below the surveyor's signature, referring the reader to specific portions of the declaration that details ownership, maintenance and repair obligations of these items. If these inclusions and exclusions are contained in Schedule C, the Land Registrar is to refuse the declaration.

13. Architectural and Structural Plans and Certificates of Completion – Schedule G

If the description contains architectural plans (prepared by an architect) and structural plans, Schedule G of the declaration shall contain an architect's certificate and one or more engineer's certificates. (s. 8(1)(b) & (e), new Act)

If the description contains architectural plans (prepared by an architect) and no structural plans Schedule G of the declaration shall contain only an architect's certificate. (s. 8(1)(b) & (e), new Act)

If the description contains structural plans and no architectural plans, Schedule G of the declaration shall contain only one or more engineer's certificates. (s. 9(2), O. Reg. 48/01)

Similar to the old Act, if architectural plans are not available, inadequate or not required under the Building Code Act, drawings that are sufficient to enable the construction of the buildings prepared by a non-architect are deemed to be the architectural plans (s. 13, O. Reg. 49/01) and the completion certificate in Schedule G can be completed by an architect and/or an engineer(s). (s. 5(8), O. Reg. 48/01) (Note: s. 9(3) O. Reg. 48/01 sets out that the completion certificates are part of the declaration)

The Schedule G certificates will together address all the matters required by O. Reg. 48/01. (Form 2 or Form 17)

Registration requirements:

- One set of paper prints of the architectural and structural plans must be submitted to the land registry office.
- Architectural and Structural Plans will include the following endorsement on each sheet:

_____ (Standard, Common Element, Vacant Land or Leasehold)
 Condominium Plan No. _____

Part (III or IV), Sheet _____ of _____ Sheets

Note: The regulations under the new Act no longer require the total number of Parts on architectural/structural plans.

14. Encroachments

The treatment of encroachments remains unchanged. Those portions of condominium buildings located outside the condominium property are not governed by the Condominium Act, 1998. The title to encroachments should be resolved prior to registration of the condominium however, if title resolution does not take place, the notes set out below must be included in the declaration and on the description to reflect the encroachment particulars.

Declaration – Include one of the following notes in a prominent place on the first page of the declaration.

- Where there is no encroachment agreement:
 CAUTION: That portion of the condominium building shown in hatched outline on Part ____ Sheet ____ of the description, encroaches upon the adjoining lands and is not governed by the Condominium Act, 1998.
- Where there is an encroachment agreement:
 CAUTION: That portion of the condominium building shown in hatched outline on Part ____ Sheet ____ of the description encroaches upon the adjoining lands and is not governed by the Condominium Act, 1998 and is the subject of an agreement registered as Instrument No. _____.

Description – Include one of the following notes adjacent to the encroachment that will be highlighted in hatched outline.

- Where there is no encroachment agreement:
 CAUTION: That portion of the condominium building shown in hatched outline hereon encroaches onto adjoining lands and is not governed by the Condominium Act, 1998.
- Where there is an encroachment agreement:
 CAUTION: That portion of the condominium building shown in hatched outline hereon encroaches onto adjoining lands and is not governed by the Condominium Act, 1998 and is the subject of an agreement registered as Instrument No. _____.

15. Non-Contiguous Portions of Units

The treatment of non-contiguous portions of units remains unchanged. Where two or more portions of a unit are non-contiguous each portion will be identified as an area of that unit. (e.g. UNIT 1, Area 1; UNIT 1, Area 2) A note will be included on the plan in close proximity to the affected unit(s) stating that: "Unit(s) _____, is (are) comprised of non-contiguous areas designated by the same unit number"

16. Reserving Corporation Numbers

Condominium Corporation Numbers cannot be reserved. Land Registrars are not to assign a number to a condominium corporation until the declaration and description are being registered.

17. Land Registration Reform Act

Declarations and descriptions are exempt from requiring a Document General, Form 4. (s. 3, O.Reg. 17/99)

18. Ontario New Home Warranties Plan

Land Registrars are required to forward a copy of all condominium declarations and amendments that create a phase in a phased condominium corporation after registration to:

Ontario New Home Warranties Program
5160 Yonge Street
Suite 600
Toronto, ON
M2N 6L9
Attention: Condominium Manager

IV. CONDOMINIUM TYPES1. Vacant Land Condominiums

Vacant Land Condominiums will consist of units and common elements. The units may be vacant lots similar to lots on a plan of subdivision. A unit may contain building(s) and structure(s) as long they are wholly contained within the unit and do not form any part of the unit boundaries.

Section 158 of the new Act requires that all buildings, structures, facilities and services on the common elements in a vacant land condominium be completed, installed and provided in accordance with O.Reg. 48/01, prior to the registration of the declaration and description. The new Act, however, also allows the declarant to post a bond or other security with a body specified by the municipality when the buildings, structures, facilities and services are not complete prior to registration.

When such a bond or security is posted:

- Schedule G of the declaration will not contain any completion certificates and the architectural and structural plans will not be submitted with the initial registration. Schedule G will contain a statement that the certificates will be included in an amendment to the description and a statement from the municipality or MMAH that the bond or security is sufficient to ensure that the buildings and structures will be completed and the facilities and services will be installed in accordance with the new Act.
- The submission of architectural and structural plans and the architect/engineer completion certificates will be registered as an amendment to the description in Form 21, O. Reg. 48/01, at some point after the registration of the condominium when the buildings, structures, facilities and services are complete. There are no time restrictions associated with this requirement.
- Schedule H will list all buildings, structures, facilities and services that will be included in the common elements upon the registration of the amendment.
- The surveyor is to list all four Parts on all plan sheets even though the last two parts will be submitted at a later date. This will eliminate the need to amend all of the plan sheets when Parts III and IV are submitted with Form 21, O. Reg. 48/01. The index on the first plan sheet will indicate 'NIL' for the number of sheets for Part III – Architectural Plans and Part IV – Structural Plans.
- Any existing plan sheets that are amended when the Architectural and Structural Plans are submitted (e.g. first plan sheet – index & illustration of the perimeter of the buildings and structures) must include a reference to the registration number of Form 21, O. Reg. 48/01. The process to amend the plan sheets is the same as the one set out for s. 107 amendments described in Section V, Item 1 of this Bulletin.

If there are no buildings, structures, facilities and services on the common elements this will be stated in Schedule H of the declaration and there will be no Schedule G. If there are no buildings and structures on the common elements there will be no architectural and structural plans.

2. Common Elements Condominiums

Common Elements Condominiums do not contain units. The common interests in the condominium attach to freehold parcels of land located in the same land registration division as the condominium property. The freehold parcels (parcels of tied land or POTL's) are identified and described in Schedule D to the declaration.

Automated Land Titles System:

In the automated system one PIN will be opened for the condominium property. Generally, documents relating to the condominium will be registered on this PIN and documents which relate to a specific parcel of tied land, such as a lien for common expenses, will be registered on the appropriate parcel of tied land. A remark will be placed on the parcel registers for the parcels of tied land notifying the user to search the common elements condominium PIN for additional encumbrances.

- The Owners' Names field in the Common Elements Condominium PIN will contain 'The owners from time to time of the parcels of tied land as set out in Schedule D to the declaration'.
- The thumbnail description for each parcel of tied land will be amended to include: 'together with an undivided common interest in (LRO division) Common Elements Condominium Corporation No. _____'
- A property remark will be added to the PIN or parcel register of each parcel of tied land that states: 'For additional encumbrances the PIN for (LRO division) Common Elements Condominium No. _____ in Block _____ must be examined.'

Non-automated Land Titles System:

- Make an addition to the parcel register for each parcel of tied land that states: 'Together with an undivided common interest in (LRO division) Common Elements Condominium Corporation No. _____ as in Declaration registered as Instrument No. _____'
- A long entry will be added to the parcel register of each parcel of tied land that states: 'For additional encumbrances the Common Elements and General Index for (LRO Division) Common Elements Condominium Plan No. _____ must be examined.'
- Remark the declaration in the Property Parcel Register and the Common Elements and General Index with: 'Note: The owners of this parcel are the owners from time to time of the parcels of tied land as set out in Schedule D to the declaration'.

Non-automated Registry System:

- A remark may be added to the Abstract Index for each POTL referencing the applicable instrument number or reference plan part.

If there are no buildings, structures, facilities and services on the common elements this will be stated in Schedule H of the declaration and there will be no Schedule G. If there are no buildings and structures on the common elements there will be no architectural and structural plans.

A parcel of tied land can be subdivided, however the common interest attached to the original parcel of land remains unaffected. To redistribute the common interest among the subdivided parcels an amendment creating new parcels of tied land must be registered.

3. Amalgamating Condominiums

Two or more standard condominiums may amalgamate into a single standard condominium.

The regulations require, as part of Schedule C to the declaration, two lists which indicate the relationship between the old unit numbers and levels and the new unit numbers and levels and vice versa. These lists assist clients in searching title following the amalgamation. Land Registrars are to rely upon the list specified in s. 36(7)(b) O. Reg. 48/01, being the new to old listing of the units.

The only changes to the declaration and description permitted in the amalgamated declaration and description are those necessary to facilitate the amalgamation. These changes must not create new units or adjust unit or condominium property boundaries and Land Registrars are not to accept declarations and descriptions for amalgamated condominiums that do so.

Schedule A to the declaration of the amalgamated condominium may contain a solicitor's statement specifying easements that will merge in law and no longer exist upon the registration of the declaration and description.

The perimeter plan sheets for amalgamated condominiums are not required to show underlying geographics and PINs, parcels and instrument numbers for units illustrated thereon. If shown staff are to encourage the surveyor to remove them however if the surveyor elects to have this information remain its accuracy must be confirmed.

In the non-automated Registry system a reference to the amalgamated condominium will be recorded in the Unit Index for each unit in the amalgamating condominiums.

4. Phased Condominiums

A standard condominium may be designated a phased condominium under the new Act. Schedule A to the declaration will identify lands owned by the declarant which are intended to be included in the condominium property upon the registration of future phases. These lands are defined as the 'servient lands'. Phasing will permit for the addition of units and common elements through an amendment to the declaration and description without following the amendment provisions of s. 107 of the Act.

S. 51(e), O. Reg. 48/01– the phase cannot be part of a building that was included in a previous phase or the initial registration; this prevents phasing within a building.

The declaration and description will be registered against the servient lands.

It should be noted that the Act does not identify the initial registration of the declaration and description as a phase. The first phase is the first amendment to the declaration and description creating a phase.

Schedule A to the declaration for an amendment creating a phase may contain a solicitor's statement specifying easements that will merge in law and no longer exist upon the registration of the amendment.

Automated System

Following the registration of an amendment for a phase, the thumbnail description for a unit added to the condominium, in the automated land titles system, will not include underlying geographics. For example a thumbnail will appear as: "Unit 1, Level 1, (LRO Division) Standard Condominium Plan No. _____. T/W & S/T as set out in Schedule A of amendment to Declaration (Registration No.)"

For the purposes of s. 22(2)(b), O. Reg. 49/01 an amendment for a phase in the automated system will be recorded against all the units. Any previously registered instruments affecting the property included in the amendment will be recorded against the unit(s) included in the amendment.

Non-automated System

For the purposes of s. 22(2)(b), O. Reg. 49/01 an amendment for a phase in the non-automated system will be recorded in: 1) the Constitution Index and 2) the Common Elements and General Index followed by any previously registered instruments affecting the property included in the amendment.

Any easements that merged in law, upon the registration of an amendment for a phase, will be so noted on the Common Elements and General Index.

5. Leasehold Condominiums

The declarant in a Leasehold Condominium must own a leasehold interest in the land. A declaration and description may be registered on the leased land, dividing the land into leasehold units and common elements. Purchasers buy a leasehold interest in the unit and common elements for a fixed number of years, as set out in the declaration.

As the leasehold interest has been transferred to the Leasehold Condominium owners for the term identified in the declaration, no registrations are to be accepted on the underlying leasehold parcel.

In the automated land titles system the leasehold PIN underlying the condominium will be closed. Any transactions involving any remaining interest of the lessee will be recorded on the freehold PIN where the lease is registered.

V. GENERAL REGISTRATION REQUIREMENTS

1. Amendments to the Declaration or Description - Owners' Consent – s. 107

Amendments to the declaration and description under s. 107 of the Act shall be in Form 1,

O. Reg. 49/01. The process for the registration of an amendment to the description is set out in s. 18, O. Reg. 49/01.

Amendments to the description will require the Ontario Land Surveyor to arrange with the Land Registrar or the Assistant Examiner of Surveys to make a copy of the original registered plan sheet(s). The surveyor will alter the copy to illustrate the amendment as set out in Form 1. In some cases an additional new plan sheet may also be necessary which will result in amendments to the Index of plan sheets.

The Certificate of Amendment (Appendix B) shall be included in a conspicuous location adjacent to the original Registration Certificate. The Surveyor's Certificate for Amendment (Appendix C) shall be included in a conspicuous location adjacent to the amended portion of the plan sheets.

Automated System

An amendment is recorded against each unit when the condominium is registered in the automated system. If the amendment add new units, all previously registered instruments affecting the lands included in the amendment are recorded against the units included in the amendment (s. 30, O.Reg. 49/01). If the amendment adds additional lands to the condominium but does not include units, previously registered instruments affecting the lands included in the amendment will be recorded against the existing units in the condominium.

Non-automated System

When the amendment adds additional lands to the condominium property and the condominium is registered in the non-automated system the amendment is recorded in: 1) the Constitution Index and 2) the Common Elements and General Index followed by any previously registered instruments affecting the additional lands. (see Appendix F)

2. Amendments to the Declaration or Description – Order of the Director of Titles

Under section 110 of the new Act, the condominium corporation or an interested person may apply to the Director of Titles for an Order to amend the declaration or description to correct an error or inconsistency that is apparent on the face of the declaration or description. Applications for an Order under section 110 of the Act are to be sent to the Assistant Examiner of Surveys for the region in which the condominium property is located. An application form is attached as Appendix D. An Order form is attached as Appendix E. The Order will include a statement of who is responsible for carrying out the amendment. The plan correction procedures set out in PART IX of O.Reg. 43/96 will be used if the Order is with respect to an amendment to the description plan sheets.

3. By-laws

The Condominium Act, 1998 states that by-laws and joint by-laws are not effective until registered. To register a by-law or joint by-law it must be attached to a certificate in Form 11, O. Reg. 48/01.

4. Rules

As was the case under the old Act, Rules and Joint Rules made by Condominium Corporations do not constitute an instrument acceptable for registration and will not be accepted for registration. If rules are registered as a part of a by-law it should be noted that they become incorporated in the by-law and can only be amended or repealed in accordance with the requirements for by-laws.

5. Other Instruments

Appendix F lists where instruments registered, after the initial registration of the declaration and description, are to be recorded in the land registration system.

6. Enforcing a Judgement against a Condominium Corporation

Subsection 23(6) of the new Act provides that a judgement against a condominium corporation is also a judgement against each unit owner at the time of the judgement. It should be noted, however, that the Sheriff's Office can not enforce a writ of execution against condominium unit owners if their names were not set out in the judgement, unless otherwise specified in an Order of the court.

To ensure that a writ of execution will bind the land of the persons who were the owners at the time of the judgement, it is recommended that the solicitor for the execution creditor ensure that the names of those persons are included in the writ of execution.

7. Terminations

Pursuant to s. 83(3) of the Registry Act the Land Registrar shall, upon the termination of a freehold condominium or a portion thereof, when the condominium property is under the registry system, open an abstract index for the former condominium lands.

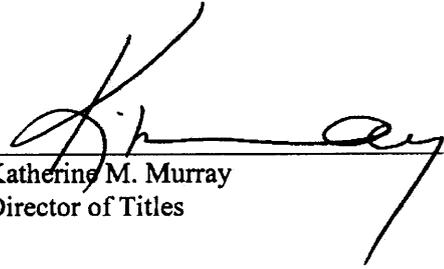

The procedure for establishing new PINs or parcels for the terminated lands, when the condominium property is in the land titles system, is set out in O. Reg. 49/01.

Any easement over the condominium lands created after the registration of the declaration and description is extinguished upon termination. (s. 127, new Act)

Bulletins 75022, 79041, 79046, 79049, 80027, 80038, 85003, and the portions relating to condominiums in 85005, 87002 are hereby revoked.

BULLETIN NO. 2002-4

DATE: December 23, 2002

TO: All Land Registrars
All Ontario Land Surveyors

Amending Condominium
Descriptions under Sections
107 and 109 of the
Condominium Act, 1998

The Condominium Act, 1998 provides for the amendment of a declaration and/or a description with the owner's consent under Section 107 or by a Court Order under Section 109.

When a Surveyor is engaged to undertake an amendment to the description under Section 107, the Surveyor should ensure that the amendment has been clearly set out in Form 1 of O. Reg. 49/01 under the Condominium Act, 1998. This Form must be registered in accordance with Section 107(6), prior to making the amendment.

When a Surveyor is engaged to undertake an amendment to the description under Section 109, the Surveyor should ensure that the amendment has been clearly set out in the Court Order. In addition, the Court Order must be registered.

Before proceeding with any amendment to the description, the Surveyor should consult with the Land Registrar or the Regional Surveyor.

AMENDING PROCEDURE FOR AMENDMENTS TO THE DESCRIPTION

1. Manual amendments may be made to the original description plan(s) where Planning Act approval is not required, subject to Item 10.
2. Where Planning Act approval is required, follow the process set out in items 3 and 4.
3. The Ontario Land Surveyor must obtain a copy of the original description plan(s), that require(s) amending, in the form of a hard copy (mylar or photographic reproduction) or a digital copy, from the appropriate Land Registry Office. Arrangements for the copy or copies can be made through the Land Registrar or the Regional Surveyor and an outside supplier. The original description plan(s) must remain in the custody of the Land Registrar or Regional Surveyor throughout this procedure. The Surveyor will be responsible for arranging for payment of all costs associated with producing the copy or copies.

All original registration particulars, Certificates and signatures must remain intact on the copy or copies.

4. On the copy or copies of the original description plan(s) being amended, including any sheets being added, the following shall be added preceding the component name of the Plan in the top right hand corner, in the same size lettering: “AMENDMENT TO DESCRIPTION”.

Example:

AMENDMENT TO DESCRIPTION
PART 1 OF 4 PARTS SHEET 1 OF 1 SHEET	HALTON STANDARD CONDOMINIUM PLAN No. XXXX

5. The Certificate of Amendment shall be included in a conspicuous location adjacent to the original Registration Certificate(s) or as close as possible and boxed as shown. This Certificate need only be added to those description plans that are being amended in accordance with Form 1 or a Court Order, as well as any new sheets being added. Renumbering a sheet will not require a Certificate.

6. The Surveyor’s Certificate(s) for Amendment shall be included in a location adjacent to the original Surveyor’s Certificate or as close as possible and boxed as shown:
 - A. To be added to all Part 1 Sheets, that are being amended or added and Sheet 1 of Part 1 of a Phased Condominium under the Condominium Act, 1998, if applicable; and

SURVEYOR'S CERTIFICATE FOR AMENDMENT

I certify that:

or

This survey and plan are amended in accordance with an amendment by Court Order registered as No. _____ and are correct and in accordance with the Condominium Act, 1998, the Surveys Act, the Surveyors Act and the Land Titles Act (or the Registry Act) and the regulations made under them;

(If the perimeter boundary or boundaries are being changed and/or a Unit(s) is being added, removed or amended, include the following paragraph)

- 2. The survey was completed on the _____ day of _____.

(If Units are being added or the extent amended on the Sheet, include the following paragraph)

- 3. The diagrams of the Units affected by this amendment are substantially accurate.

(If the plan is of Crown land and was prepared under the instructions of the Surveyor General of Ontario, include the following paragraph)

- 4. This plan and the field notes were prepared from an actual survey performed under my personal supervision and I was present on the site during the progress of this survey.

7. For applications under Section 107, a statement with respect to Planning Act approval as per Section 9 of the Condominium Act, 1998 shall be included in a conspicuous location adjacent to the amended portion of the description plan or as close thereto as possible.
8. If the amendment necessitates the addition of a new description plan sheet (or sheets), the Part / Sheet box on the existing description plans shall be amended.

Example:

9. Further to item 8 and the addition of Architectural and/or Structural Plans, as a result of the addition of Units, the Index of Parts Schedule shall also be amended accordingly. The numbering of the original Architectural and/or Structural Plans will also have to be amended.
10. If applicable, the Schedule of APPURTENANT and SERVIENT INTERESTS shall also be amended accordingly. If this necessitates the moving of other items on the plan to accommodate the expansion of the Schedule, manual amendments to the original description plan(s) will not be accepted.
11. All manual amendments to the original description plan(s) shall be prepared to a drafting standard that in the opinion of the Land Registrar or the Regional Surveyor will permit legible and accurate copies.
12. Consideration shall be given to the extent of the amendments and the placement of the required Notes and Certificates. It may be necessary to place the copy on a larger sheet than the original without exceeding the maximum plan requirements.

REGISTRATION PROCEDURE

It is strongly advised that the amendment be pre-approved by the Land Registry Office prior to forwarding the amended plans to the Planning Authority. Once the Planning Authority signs the approval Certificate with respect to the amendment, no changes or amendments will be allowed without the Planning Authority's written approval.

For pre-approval, the following must be submitted:

- ✓ two (2) paper prints of the amended description;
- ✓ one (1) marked up copy of the original description illustrating the amendments;
- ✓ two (2) copies of completed Form 1, O.Reg. 49/01, or Court Order, and the applicable amended Schedules etc.;
- ✓ one (1) copy of the original declaration and
- ✓ copies of all Plans and title documents, if applicable.

Submission for Registration:

The process for the registration of an amendment to the description is set out in Section 18 of O. Reg. 49/01.

Where the original description sheet has been superceded, it is to remain with the original mylars and made available for viewing upon request, in accordance with Section 18 of O. Reg. 49/01.

This Bulletin supercedes Appendices 'B' and 'C' of Bulletin 2001-1

DECLARATION

For registration this document must be on 8.5" x 14" white paper.

THIS DECLARATION (hereinafter called the ‘Declaration’) is made and executed pursuant to the provisions of the Condominium Act, 1998, S.O. 1998, C.19, and the regulations made thereunder as amended from time to time (all of which are hereinafter individually and collectively referred to as the ‘Act’), by:

DECCORP. INC.

A Copy of the Declaration must be included in the package – Sec. 72(3)(m)

(hereinafter called the ‘Declarant’)

WHEREAS:

- A. The Declarant is the owner in fee simple of lands and premises situate in the Municipality of Somewhere in the Province of Ontario, being more particularly described in Schedule ‘A’ annexed hereto and in the description submitted herewith by the Declarant (hereinafter called the ‘Description’) for registration in accordance with the Act and which lands are sometimes referred to as the ‘Lands’ or the ‘Property’;
- B. The Declarant intends that the Property together with the buildings constructed thereon shall be governed by the Act and that the registration of this Declaration and the Description will create a freehold common elements condominium corporation.

STATEMENTS

THE REGISTRATION OF THE DECLARATION AND THE DESCRIPTION WILL CREATE A FREEHOLD CONDOMINIUM CORPORATION OF THE COMMON ELEMENTS TYPE.

Sec. 40(1)(a)(i)

A PARCEL OF TIED LAND MAY NOT BE DIVIDED INTO TWO OR MORE PARCELS UNLESS AN AMENDMENT IS REGISTERED TO THE DECLARATION THAT TAKES INTO ACCOUNT THE DIVISION OF THE PARCEL OF TIED LAND.

Section 40(1)(a)(ii)

NOW THEREFORE THE DECLARANT HEREBY DECLARES AS FOLLOWS:

ARTICLE I

INTRODUCTION

1.1 Definitions

The terms used in this Declaration shall have the meanings ascribed to them in the Act unless this Declaration specifies otherwise, or unless the context otherwise requires and in particular:

- a. "Board" means the Corporation’s Board of Directors;
- b. “By-Laws” means the by-laws of the Corporation enacted from time to time;
- c. “Common Elements” means all of the Property;
- d. “Corporation” means the Condominium Corporation created by the registration of this Declaration;
- e. “Owner” means the Owner or Owners of the freehold estate(s) in Parcels of Tied Lands, but does not include a mortgagee unless in possession;
- f. Rules” means the Rules passed by the Board;
- g. "Parcel of Tied Lands" or “POTLs” means the individual parcels of land described on Schedule ‘D’ hereto which benefit from an interest in the common elements.

1.2 Act Governs The Lands

The Lands and all interests appurtenant to the Lands described in Schedule ‘A’ annexed hereto are governed by the Act. Section 7(2)(a)

1.3 Common Elements Condominium

The registration of this Declaration and the Description will create a common elements condominium corporation.

1.4 Use and Enjoyment Sec. 140

The common elements are for the use and enjoyment of the Owners. Sec. 40(6) and Sch. D to Declaration

1.5 Consent of Encumbrancer

The consent of every person having a registered mortgage against the Property or the POTL'S or interests appurtenant thereto is contained in Schedule "B" attached hereto.

1.6 Common Interest and Common Expenses

Each Owner shall have an undivided interest in the Common Elements as a tenant in common with all other Owners in the proportions set forth opposite each Tied Land number in Schedule "D" attached hereto and shall contribute to the Common Expenses in the proportion set forth opposite each Parcel of Tied Land in Schedule "D" attached hereto. The total of the proportions of the common interests and proportionate contribution to Common Expenses shall each be one hundred (100%) percent.

1.7. Address for Service. Municipal Address and Mailing Address of the Corporation

The Corporation's address for service shall be C/O Somewhere Property Management, Suite 1, 1 Oak Street, Somewhere, Ontario, Z1Z 1Z1, or such other address as the Corporation may by resolution of the Board determine, and the Corporation's mailing address shall be C/O Somewhere Property Management, Suite 1, 1 Oak Street, Somewhere, Ontario, Z1Z 1Z1. The Corporation's municipal address is 3 Oak Street, Somewhere, Ontario, Z1Z 1Z1.

1.8 Approval Authority Requirements

The following is required to be included in this Declaration and executes a condition of approval imposed by the approval authority:

NOTICE: The common elements and all buildings, structures, facilities, and services therein, including, but not so as to limit the generality of the foregoing, drain and supply pipes, lines and conduits, road surfaces, are the property of persons other than the Municipality of Somewhere and it takes no responsibility for any maintenance, repair, replacement or other obligations relating thereto.

1.9 Architect/Engineer Certificates

The certificate(s) of the architect and/or engineer(s) that all buildings and structures have been completed and installed in accordance with the regulations is/are contained in Schedule "G" attached hereto.

ARTICLE II

COMMON EXPENSES

2.1 "Specification of Common Expenses"

"Common Expenses" means the expenses of the performance of the objects and duties of the Corporation and such other expenses, costs and sums of money designated as common expenses in the Act and this Declaration and without limiting the generality of the foregoing, shall include those expenses set out in Schedule "E" attached herein.

2.2 Payment of Common Expenses

Each Owner, including the Declarant, shall pay to the Corporation his/her proportionate share of the common expenses, as may be provided for by the By-laws and the assessment and collection of contributions toward common expenses may be regulated by the Board pursuant to the By-laws. In addition to the foregoing, any losses, costs or damages incurred by the Corporation by reason of a breach of any provision of this Declaration, any By-laws or rules in force from time to time by any Owner, or by members of his/her family and/or their respective tenants, invitees or licensees shall be borne and paid for by such Owner and may be recovered by the Corporation against such Owner in the same manner as common expenses.

2.3 Reserve Fund

- (a) The Corporation shall establish and maintain one or more Reserve Funds and shall collect from the Owners as part of their contribution towards the common expenses, amounts that are reasonably expected to provide sufficient funds for major repair and replacement of Common Elements and assets of the Corporation;
- (b) No part of the Reserve Fund shall be used except for the purpose for which the fund was established. The Reserve Fund shall constitute an asset of the Corporation and shall not be distributed to any Owner except on termination of the Corporation in accordance with the Act; and

2.4 Status Certificate

The Corporation shall provide a status certificate to any requesting party who has paid (in advance) the applicable fees charged by the Corporation for providing same, in accordance with the provisions of the Act, together with all accompanying documentation and information prescribed by the Act. The Corporation shall forthwith provide the Declarant (and/or any purchaser, transferee or mortgagee of a Unit from the Declarant) with a status certificate and all such accompanying documentation and information, as may be requested from time to time by or on behalf of the Declarant (or by any such purchaser, transferee or mortgagee) in connection with the Declarant's sale, transfer or mortgage of any Unit(s), all at no charge or fee to the Declarant or the person requesting same on behalf of the Declarant.

ARTICLE III

COMMON ELEMENTS

3.1 Use of Common Elements

Subject to the provisions of the Act, this Declaration, the By-laws and any rules, each Owner has the full use, occupancy and enjoyment of the whole or any parts of the Common Elements, except as herein otherwise provided.

Save and except as expressly provided or contemplated in this Declaration to the contrary, no condition shall be permitted to exist, and no activity shall be carried on, within or upon any portion of the common elements that:

- (a) will result in a contravention of any term or provision set out in the Act, this Declaration, the By-laws and Rules of the Corporation;
- (b) is likely to damage the property of the Corporation or the common elements, injure any person, or impair the structural integrity of any common element area;
- (d) may result in the cancellation (or threatened cancellation) of any policy of insurance obtained or maintained by the Corporation, or that may significantly increase any applicable insurance premium(s) with respect thereto, or any deductible portion in respect of such policy;
- (e) constitutes a commercial use or other purpose not ancillary to residential purposes.

No one shall, by any conduct or activity undertaken in or upon any part of the common elements, impede, hinder or obstruct any right, privilege, easement or benefit given to any party, person or other entity pursuant to this Declaration, any By-law and/or the Rules.

3.2 Exclusive Use Common Elements

There are no exclusive use common elements in this Condominium.

3.3 Restricted Access

Without the consent in writing of the Board, no Owner shall have the right of access to those parts of the Common Elements used from time to time for the care, maintenance or operation of the Property or any part thereof as designated by the Board from time to time; and

3.4 Modification of Common Elements, Assets and Services

(a) General Prohibition

No owner shall make any change or alteration to the Common Elements whatsoever, including any installation(s) thereon, nor alter, decorate, renovate, maintain or repair any part of the Common Elements.

(b) Non-Substantial Additions, Alterations and Improvements by the Corporation

The Corporation may make an addition, alteration, or improvement to the Common Elements, a change in the assets of the Corporation or a change in a service that the Corporation provides to the Owners in accordance with subsections 97(2) and (3) of the Act.

(c) Substantial Additions, Alterations and Improvements by the Corporation

The Corporation may, by a vote of owners who own at least sixty-six and two thirds (66 2/3 %) percent of the common interests in the Corporation, make a substantial addition, alteration or improvement to the Common Elements, a substantial change in the assets of the Corporation or a substantial change in a service the Corporation provides to the Owner in accordance with subsections 97 (4), (5) and (6) of the Act.

3.5 Pets

No animal, livestock or fowl, other than household domestic pets as permitted by the by-laws of the Corporation are permitted to be on or about the Common Elements. All dogs and cats must be kept under personal supervision and control and held by leash at all times while on the Common Elements. Notwithstanding the generality of the foregoing, no pet deemed by the Board, in their sole and absolute discretion, to be a danger to the residents of the Corporation is permitted to be on or about the Common Elements.

ARTICLE V.

MAINTENANCE AND REPAIRS

5.1 Responsibility of Owner for Damage

Each Owner shall be responsible for all damage to the Common Elements, which is caused by the negligence or wilful misconduct of the Owner, his/her residents, tenants, licensees, or invitees, save and except for any such damage for which the cost of repairing same may be recovered under any policy of insurance held by the Corporation.

5.2 Repair and Maintenance by Corporation

The Corporation shall maintain and repair the Common Elements at its own expense.

ARTICLE VI

INDEMNIFICATION

6.1 Each Owner shall indemnify and save harmless the Corporation from and against any loss, costs, damage, injury or liability whatsoever which the Corporation may suffer or incur resulting from or caused by an act or omission of such Owner, his/her family, guests, visitors or tenants to or with respect to the Common Elements, except for any loss, costs, damages, injury or liability caused by an insured (as defined in any policy or policies of insurance) and insured against by the Corporation. All payments to be made by an Owner pursuant to this Article shall be deemed to be additional contributions toward common expenses payable by such Owner and shall be recoverable as such.

ARTICLE VIII

INSURANCE

7.1 By the Corporation

The Corporation shall obtain and maintain to the extent obtainable, at reasonable cost, the following insurance, in one or more policies:

- (a) “All Risk” insurance: Insurance against “all risks” (including fire and major perils as defined in the Act) as is generally available from commercial insurers in a standard “all risks” insurance policy and insurance against such other perils or events as the Board may from time to time deem advisable, insuring:

- (i) the Property and buildings; and
- (ii) all assets of the Corporation;

in an amount equal to the full replacement cost of such real and personal property, without deduction for depreciation. This insurance maybe subject to a loss deductible clause as determined by the board from time to time, and which deductible shall be the responsibility of the Corporation in the event of a claim with respect to the common elements (or any portion thereof), provided however that if an Owner, tenant or other person with the knowledge or permission of the Owner, through an act or omission causes damage to any portion of the common elements, in those circumstances where such damage was not caused or contributed by any act or omission of the Corporation (or any of its directors, officers, agents or employees), then the amount which is equivalent to the lesser of the cost of repairing the damage and the deductible limit of the Corporation’s insurance policy shall be added to the common expenses payable in respect of such owner’s POTL.

- (b) Policy Provisions

Every policy of insurance shall insure the interests of the Corporation and the Owners from time to time, as their respective interests may appear (with all mortgagee endorsements subject to the provisions of the Act, this Declaration and the Insurance Trust Agreement) and shall contain the following provisions:

- (i) waivers of subrogation against the Corporation, its directors, officers, manager, agents, employees and servants and against the Owners, and the Owners’ respective residents, tenants, invitees or licensees, except for damage arising from arson, fraud, vehicle impact, vandalism or malicious mischief caused by any one of the above;
 - (ii) such policy or policies of insurance shall not be terminated or substantially modified without at least sixty (60) days’ prior written notice to the Corporation and to the Insurance Trustee;
 - (iii) waivers of the insurer’s obligation to repair, rebuild or replace the damaged property in the event that after damage the government of the Property is terminated pursuant to the Act;
 - (iv) waivers of any defense based on co-insurance (other than a stated amount co-insurance clause); and
 - (v) waivers of any defense based on any invalidity arising from the conduct or act or omission of or breach of a statutory condition by any insured person.
- (c) Public Liability Insurance Public liability and property damage insurance, and insurance against the Corporation’s liability resulting from breach of duty as occupier of the Common Elements insuring the liability of the Corporation and the Owners from time to time, with limits to be determined by the board, but not less than TWO MILLION ($2,000,000.00) DOLLARS per occurrence and without right of subrogation as against the Corporation, its directors, officers, mangers, agents, employees and servants, and as against the Owners and any member of the household or guests of any Owner or occupant of the Owner's Tied Land.

7.2 General Provisions

- (a) The Corporation, its Board and its officers shall have the excusive right, on behalf of itself and as agents for the Owners, to adjust any loss and settle any claims with respect to all insurance placed by the Corporation, and to give such releases as are required, and any claimant, including the Owners, shall be bound by such adjustment.
- (b) Every mortgagee shall be deemed to have agreed to waive any right to have proceeds of any insurance applied on account of the mortgage where such application would prevent application of the insurance proceeds to the satisfaction of an obligation to repair. This subparagraph 2(b) shall be read without prejudice to the right of any mortgagee to exercise the right of an Owner to vote or to consent if the mortgage itself contains a provision giving the mortgagee that right;

- (c) A certificate or memorandum of all insurance policies, and endorsements thereto, shall be issued as soon as possible to each Owner, and a duplicate original or certified copy of the policy to each mortgagee who has notified the Corporation of its interest in any Tied Land. Renewal certificates or certificates of new insurance policies shall be furnished to each Owner and to each mortgagee noted on the Record of the Corporation who have requested same. The master policy for any insurance coverage shall be kept by the Corporation in its offices, available for inspection by any Owner or mortgagee on reasonable notice to the Corporation;
- (d) No insured, other than the Corporation, shall be entitled to amend any policy or policies of insurance obtained and maintained by the Corporation. No insured shall be entitled to direct that the loss shall be payable in any manner other than as provided in the Declaration and the Act;
- (e) Where insurance proceeds are received by the Corporation or any other person rather than the Insurance Trustee, they shall be held in Trust and applied for the same purposes as are specified herein; and,
- (f) Prior to obtaining any new policy or policies of insurance and at such other time as the board may deem advisable and also upon the request of a mortgagee or mortgagees holding mortgages relating to fifty (50%) per cent or more of the common interests in the Corporation and, in any event, at least every three (3) years, the Board shall obtain an appraisal from an independent qualified appraiser of the full replacement cost of the assets for the purpose of determining the amount of insurance to be effected and the cost of such appraisal shall be a Common Expense.

7.3 By the Owner

- a) It is acknowledged that the foregoing insurance is the only insurance required to be obtained and maintained by the Corporation. Owners are recommended to obtain, although it is not mandatory, insurance covering:
 - (i) special assessments levied by the Corporation and contingent insurance coverage in the event the Corporation's insurance is inadequate.
 - (ii) Insurance on personal property and chattels present or stored on the Property, including automobiles. Every such policy of insurance shall contain waiver of subrogation against the Corporation, its manager, agents, employees and servants, and against the other Owners and any members of their household or guests except for any damage arising from arson, fraud, vehicle impact, vandalism or malicious mischief caused or contributed by any of the aforementioned parties;
 - (iii) Public liability insurance covering any liability of any Owner or any resident, tenant, invitee or licensee of such Owner, to the extent not covered by any public liability and property damage insurance obtained and maintained by the Corporation;

7.4 Indemnity Insurance for Directors and Officers of the Corporation

The Corporation shall obtain and maintain insurance for the benefit of all of the directors and officers of the Corporation, if such insurance is reasonably available, in order to indemnify them against the matters described in the Act, including any liability, cost, charge or expense incurred by them in the execution of their respective duties (hereinafter collectively referred to as the "Liabilities"), provided however that such insurance shall not indemnify any of the directors or officers against any of the Liabilities respectively incurred by them as a result of a breach of their duty to act honestly and in good faith, or in contravention of the provisions of the Act.

ARTICLE VIII.

INSURANCE TRUSTEE AND PROCEEDS OF INSURANCE

- 8.1 The Corporation shall enter into, and at all times maintain, an agreement (the "Insurance Trust Agreement") with an Insurance Trustee which shall be a Trust Company registered under the Loan and Trust Corporations Act, or shall be a Chartered Bank, which agreement shall, without limiting its generality, provide the following:

- (a) the receipt by the Insurance Trustee of any proceeds of insurance in excess of fifteen (15%) percent of the replacement cost of the property covered by the insurance policy;
- (h) the holding of such proceeds in trust for those entitled thereto pursuant to the provisions of the Act, this Declaration, and any amendments thereto;
- (c) the disbursement of such proceeds in accordance with the provisions of the Insurance Trust Agreement; and
- (d) the notification by the Insurance Trustee to the mortgagees of any insurance monies received by it.

If the Corporation is unable to enter into such agreement with such Trust Company or such Chartered Bank, by reason of its refusal to act on terms acceptable to the Board or otherwise, the Corporation may enter into such agreement with such other Corporation or person authorized to act as a Trustee as the Owners may approve by by-law at a meeting called for that purpose. The Corporation shall pay the fees and disbursements of any Insurance Trustee and any fees and disbursements shall constitute a Common Expense.

8.2 In the event that:

- (a) the Corporation is obligated to repair or replace the Common Elements or any asset insured in accordance with the provisions of the Act, the Insurance Trustee shall hold all proceeds for the Corporation and shall disburse same in accordance with the provisions of the Insurance Trust Agreement in order to satisfy the obligation of the Corporation to make such repairs;
- (b) there is no obligation by the Corporation to repair or replace, and if there is termination in accordance with the provisions of the Act, or otherwise, the Insurance Trustee shall hold all proceeds for the Owners in the proportion of their respective interests in the Common Elements and shall pay such proceeds to the Owners in such proportions upon registration of a notice of termination by the Corporation. Notwithstanding the foregoing, any proceeds payable as aforesaid shall be subject to payment in favour of any mortgagee or mortgagees to whom such loss is payable in any policy of insurance and in satisfaction of the amount due under a Notice of Lien registered by the Corporation against a POTL, in accordance with the priorities thereof;
- (c) the Board, in accordance with the provisions of the Act, determines that:
 - (i) there has not been substantial damage to twenty-five (25%) per cent of the buildings and structures on the Property; or
 - (ii) there has been substantial damage to twenty-five (25%) per cent of the buildings and structures on the Property and within sixty (60) days thereafter the Owners who own eighty (80%) per cent of the Common Interest do not vote for termination, the Insurance Trustee shall hold all proceeds for the Corporation and Owners as their respective interests may appear and shall disburse same in accordance with the provisions of this Declaration and the Insurance Trust Agreement in order to satisfy the obligations to make repairs pursuant to the provisions of this Declaration and the Act.

ARTICLE IX

GENERAL MATTERS AND ADMINISTRATION

9.2 Invalidity

Each of the provisions of this Declaration shall be deemed independent and severable, and the invalidity or unenforceability in whole or in part of any one or more of such provisions shall not be deemed to impair or affect in any manner the validity, enforceability or effect of the remainder of this Declaration, and in such event all of the other provisions of this Declaration shall continue in full force and effect as if such invalid provision had never been included herein.

9.3 Waiver

The failure to take action to enforce any provision contained in the Act, this Declaration, the By-laws or any other rules and regulations of the Corporation, irrespective of the number of violations or breaches which may occur, shall not constitute a waiver of the right to do so thereafter, nor be deemed to abrogate or waive any such provision.

9.4 Interpretation of Declaration

This Declaration shall be read with all changes of number and gender required by the context.

9.5 Headings

The headings in the body of this Declaration form no part of the Declaration but shall be deemed to be inserted for convenience of reference only.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF the Declarant has hereunto affixed its corporate seal under the hands of its proper officers duly authorized in that behalf.

ARTICLE V - MEETINGS OF OWNERS

5.1 Annual Meeting

The annual meeting of owners shall be held within six (6) months following the Corporation's fiscal year end at such place and on such day and time in each year as the board may from time to time determine for the purpose of receiving reports and statements required by the Act, the Declaration and By-laws of the Corporation, electing directors, appointing the auditor and fixing or authorizing the board to fix the auditor's remuneration, and for the transaction of such other business as maybe set out in the notice of meeting.

5.2 The First Annual General Meeting:

Pursuant to subsection 45(2) of the Act, the board shall hold the first annual general meeting of owners not more than three (3) months after the registration of the Declaration, and subsequently within six (6) months of the end of each fiscal year of the Corporation. The owners shall, at such first meeting appoint one or more auditors to hold office until the close of the next annual meeting, and if the owners fail to do so, the board shall forthwith make such appointment. The remuneration of an auditor shall be fixed by the owners (if the auditor is appointed by the owners), or fixed by the board (if authorized to do so by the owners, or if the auditor is appointed directly by the board). The Corporation shall then give notice in writing to an auditor of his or her appointment forthwith after such appointment is made.

5.3 Special Meetings:

The board shall, upon receipt of a requisition in writing made by owners who together own not less than fifteen (15%) per cent of the common interests hold a meeting of the owners within thirty-five (35) days of the receipt of the requisition or if the requisitionists so request in the requisition or consent in writing, add the business to be presented at the requisitioned meeting to the agenda for the next annual general meeting. If the meeting is not called and held within thirty-five (35) days of receipt of the requisition, any of the requisitionists may call the meeting, which meeting shall be held within forty-five (45) days of the day on which the meeting is called. The board may at any time call a special meeting of the owners for the transaction of any business, the nature of which shall be specified in the notice calling the meeting.

5.4 Notices:

At least fifteen (15) days written notice of every meeting specifying the place, the date the hour and the nature of the business to be presented shall be given to the auditor of the Corporation and to each owner and mortgagee entitled to vote and entered on the record twenty (20) days before the date of the meeting in accordance with subsection 47(5) and 70(2) of the Act. The Corporation shall not be obligated to give notice to any Owner who has not notified the Corporation that he/she has become an Owner nor give notice to any mortgagee who has not notified the Corporation of his/her entitlement to vote and address for service.

5.5 Reports:

A copy of the financial statement and a copy of the auditors report shall be furnished to every owner and mortgagee entered on the record at least twenty (20) days before the date of any annual general meeting of Owners. A copy of the minutes of meetings of owners and of the board, shall be furnished to any owner or mortgagee who has requested same, within thirty (30) days of such request upon payment to the Corporation of a reasonable charge for labour and photocopying.

5.6 Persons Entitled to Be Present:

The only persons entitled to attend a meeting of owners shall be the owners and mortgagees entered on the Record, and any others entitled to vote thereat, the auditor of the Corporation, the directors and officers of the Corporation, a representative of the property manager, and others who, although not entitled to vote, are entitled or required under the provisions of the Act or the Declaration and By-laws of the Corporation to be present at the meeting. Any other person maybe admitted only on the invitation of the chairperson of the meeting or with the consent of the meeting.

5.7 Quorum:

At any meeting of owners, a quorum shall be constituted when persons entitled to vote and owning not less than twenty-five (25%) percent of the common interests are present in person or represented by proxy. If thirty minutes after the time appointed for the holding of any meeting of owners, a quorum is not present, the meeting shall stand adjourned and if the meeting was an annual general meeting, the board shall call a further meeting of the owners in accordance with the Act.

5.8 Right to Vote

Subject to the restrictions in paragraphs 5.11 and 5.13 of this Article V, every owner that has the right to vote in accordance with the Act who is entered on the Record as an owner or has given notice to the Corporation, in a form satisfactory to the Chairperson of the meeting, that he/she is an owner shall be entitled to vote. If a common interest has been mortgaged, and the person who mortgaged such common interest (or his/her proxy) has expressly authorized or empowered the mortgagee to vote and exercised the right of the owner to vote in respect of such common interest and such mortgagee has at least four (4) days before the date specified in the notice of meeting, notified the owner and the Corporation of his/her intention to exercise such right, such mortgagee shall be entitled to vote upon filing with the Secretary of the meeting sufficient proof of same. Any dispute over the right to vote shall be resolved by the chairperson of the meeting upon such evidence as the chairperson may deem sufficient. Each owner or mortgagee shall be entitled to only one (1) vote.

5.9 Conduct of Meetings and Method of Voting:

At any meeting of owners, the president of the Corporation (or to whomever the president may delegate the responsibility) or failing him/her, the vice-president, or failing him/her, some other person appointed by the board or failing such appointment, such other person elected at the meeting shall act as chairperson of the meeting and the secretary of the Corporation shall act as secretary of the meeting or, failing him/her, the chairperson shall appoint a secretary. Any question shall be decided by a show of hands unless a poll is required by the chairperson or is demanded by an owner or mortgagee present in person or by proxy and entitled to vote, and unless a poll is so required or demanded, a declaration by the chairperson that the vote upon the question has been carried, or carried by a particular majority, or not carried, is prima facie proof of the fact without proof of the number of votes recorded in favour of or against such question; provided, however, that voting for the election of directors shall be by ballot only, other than in the case of acclamation. A demand for a poll may be withdrawn. If a poll is so required or demanded and the demand is not withdrawn, a poll upon the question shall be taken in such manner as the chairperson shall direct.

5.10 Representatives

An estate trustee, committee of a mentally incompetent person, or the guardian or trustee of an owner or mortgagee (and where a corporation acts in such capacity any person duly appointed a proxy for such corporation) upon filing with the Secretary sufficient proof of his/her appointment, shall represent the owner or mortgagee at all meetings of the owners, and may vote in the same manner and to the same extent as such owner or mortgagee. If there be more than one estate trustee, committee, guardian or trustee, the provisions of paragraph 5.11 of this Article V shall apply.

5.11 Co-Owners:

If a common interest or a mortgage on a common interest is owned by two or more persons, any one of them present or represented by proxy may in the absence of the other or others vote, but if more than one of them are present or represented by proxy, the majority of the owners of the common interests shall decide how the vote is exercised.

5.12 Votes to Govern

At all meetings of owners every question shall, unless otherwise required by the Act, Declaration or By-laws, be decided by a majority of the votes duly cast on the question.

5.13 Entitlement to Vote:

Save and except in those instances where the Act provides or stipulates that the unanimous vote of all owners is required on any matter, issue, resolution or motion, an owner or mortgagee is not entitled to vote at any meeting if any common expenses or other monetary contributions that are payable in respect of the owner's or mortgagee's common interest are in arrears for more than thirty (30) days prior to the meeting, provided however that such an owner or mortgagee may nevertheless vote if the Corporation receives payment, by way of certified cheque, of all the arrears (and all other costs and expenses owing to the Corporation) before the meeting is held.

5.14 Proxies

Every owner or mortgagee entitled to vote at any meeting of the owners may, by instrument in writing, appoint a proxy, who need not be an owner or mortgagee, to attend and act at the meeting, in the same manner, to the same extent, and with the same power, as if the owner or mortgagee were present at the meeting. The instrument appointing a proxy shall be in writing signed by the appointor or his/her attorney authorized in writing, and shall be effective for a particular meeting only. The instrument appointing a proxy shall be deposited with the secretary prior to the start of the meeting.

ARTICLE VI- BOARD OF DIRECTORS

6.1 The Corporation

The affairs of the Corporation shall be managed by a board of directors.

6.2 Number of Directors and Quorum:

The number of directors shall be three (3) of whom two (2) shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business at any meeting of the board. Notwithstanding vacancies, the remaining directors may exercise all the powers of the board so long as a quorum of the board remains in office.

6.3 Qualifications

Each director shall be 18 or more years of age and need not be an owner of a common interest in the Corporation. No undischarged bankrupt or mentally incompetent person shall be a director and if a director becomes a bankrupt or mentally incompetent person, he thereupon ceases to be a director. A director immediately ceases to be a director if a certificate of lien has been registered against a common interest owned by the director and the director does not obtain a discharge of the lien within ninety (90) days of the registration of the lien.

6.4 Consent: No election or appointment of a person as a director shall be effective unless;

- (a) he/she consents in writing to act as a director before his/her election or appointment or within ten (10) days thereafter; or
- (b) he/she was present at the meeting when he/she was elected or appointed and did not refuse at that meeting to act as a director.

6.5 Election and Term

- (a) The directors of the Corporation shall be elected in rotation and shall be eligible for re-election. At the turnover meeting held pursuant to Section 43 of the Act, one (1) director shall be elected to hold office for a term of one (1) year; one (1) director shall be elected to hold office for a term of two (2) years; and one (1) director shall be elected to hold office for a term of three (3) years. Such directors may, however, continue to act until their successors are elected. If more than one (1) of such directors whose terms are not of equal duration shall resign from the board prior to the expiration of their respective terms, those directors shall be replaced at a meeting of owners called for that purpose. The candidate for directors receiving the greater number of votes shall complete the longest remaining terms of the resigning directors. At each annual meeting thereafter a number of directors equal to the number of directors retiring in such year shall be elected for a term of three (3) years.

6.6 Filling of Vacancies and Removal of Directors

- (a) If a vacancy in the membership of the board occurs, other than by way of removal by the owners or as a result of the number of directors being increased, subject to subparagraph (c) of this paragraph 6 the majority of the remaining members of the board may appoint any person qualified to be a member of the board to fill the vacancy until the next annual meeting at which time the vacancy shall be filled by election of the owners.
- (b) Where the number of directors is increased, the vacancies resulting from such increase shall be filled only by election at such meeting of the owners and the director(s) so elected shall not act until the by-law increasing the number of directors is registered.
- (c) When there is not a quorum of directors in office, the director(s) then in office shall forthwith call a meeting of owners to fill the vacancies and, in default, or if there are no directors then in office, the meeting may be called by an owner.
- (d) Any director may be removed before the expiration of his term by a vote of owners who together own a majority of the common interests and the owners may elect, in accordance with the by-laws dealing with the election of directors, any person qualified to be a member of the board for the remainder of the term of the director removed.

6.7 Calling of Meetings

Meetings of the board shall be held from time to time at such place, time, and date, as the President or any two directors may determine, and the Secretary shall call meetings when authorized by them. Notice of any meeting so called shall be delivered personally, by prepaid mail, courier delivery, or electronic communication to each director addressed to him at his latest address, entered on the Record of the Corporation, not less than forty-eight (48) hours (excluding any part of a Sunday or of a holiday as defined by the Interpretation Act of Canada for the time being in force) before the time when the meeting is to be held save that no notice of a meeting shall be necessary if all the directors are present and consent to the holding of such meeting, or if those absent have waived notice of or otherwise signified in writing their consent to the holding of such meeting.

6.8 Regular Meetings

The board may appoint a day or days in any month or months for regular meetings at a place and hour to be named. A copy of any resolution of the board fixing a place and time of regular meetings of the board shall be given to each director forthwith after being passed, but no other notice shall be required for any such regular meeting.

6.9 Teleconference

A meeting of the board maybe held or convened by way of teleconference, or any other form of communication system that allows all of the directors to participate concurrently and to communicate with each other simultaneously and instantaneously, provided that all of the directors participating in a meeting held or convened by such means have consented thereto, and a director so participating in any such meeting held or convened by such means shall be deemed [for the purposes of subsection 35(5) of the Act and this by-law] to be present at such meeting. The board may, by resolution signed by all the directors, provide their consent, in advance, to have meetings of the board conducted in the manner contemplated herein, without the necessity of requiring new consents prior to each and every meeting, provided that such resolution (and the standing consent referred to therein) shall be automatically rendered ineffective from and after (but not prior to) the delivery to the board by any director of a written notice revoking his or her consent to such resolution.

6.10 First Meeting of New Board

The board may without notice hold its first meeting for the purpose of organization and the election and appointment of officers immediately following the appointment of the directors of the first board provided a quorum of directors be present.

6.11 Conflict of Interest

A director shall not be disqualified by reason of his office from contracting with the Corporation. Subject to the provisions of the Act, a director shall not by reason only of his office be accountable to the Corporation or to its owners for any profit or gain realized from a contract or transaction in which he has an interest, and such contract or transaction shall not be voidable by reason only of such interest provided that the provisions in the Act relating to a declaration of interest have been followed.

6.12 Protection of Directors and Officers

No director or officer of the Corporation shall be liable for the acts, neglect or default of any other director or officer or for any loss or expense happening to the Corporation through the insufficiency or deficiency of title to any property acquired by order of the board for or on behalf of the Corporation, or for the insufficiency or deficiency of any security in or upon which any of the monies of the Corporation shall be invested or for any loss or damage arising from the bankruptcy, insolvency or tortious act of any person with whom any of the monies, securities or effects of the Corporation shall be deposited or for any loss occasioned by an error of judgment or oversight on his part or for any other loss, damage or misfortune whatsoever which shall happen in the execution of the duties of his/her office or in relation thereto, unless the same shall happen through his/her own dishonest or fraudulent act or acts.

6.1 3 Indemnity of Directors and Officers

Every director and officer of the Corporation and their respective heirs, estate trustees, successors, and other legal personal representatives shall at all times be indemnified and saved harmless by the Corporation from and against:

- a) any liability and all costs, charges and expenses that the director or officer sustains or occurs in respect of any action, suit or proceeding that is proposed or commenced against him or her for or in respect of anything done, permitted to be done, or omitted to be done, by him or her, in respect of the execution of the duties of his or her office; and

- b) all other costs, charges and expenses that such director or officer sustains or incurs in respect of the affairs of the Corporation;

excluding, however, all costs, charges and expenses incurred directly or indirectly as a result of such director's or officer's own dishonest or fraudulent act or acts, or through or by such director's or officer's gross negligence, recklessness, wilful blindness or intentional misconduct (with all of the liabilities and costs for which each director and officer shall be indemnified being hereinafter collectively referred to as the 'liabilities'), unless the Act or the by-laws of the Corporation provide otherwise, on the express understanding that;

- i) no director or officer shall be indemnified by the Corporation in respect of any liabilities, costs, charges and/or expenses that he or she sustains or incurs arising from any action, suit or other proceeding in which such director or officer is adjudged to be in breach of his or her duty to act honestly and in good faith;
- ii) the Corporation is advised of any such action, suit or other proceeding (and of all liabilities, costs, charges and expenses in connection therewith) forthwith after the director or officer receives notice thereof or otherwise becomes aware of same; and
- iii) the Corporation is given the right to join in the defense of any such action, suit or proceeding.

6.14 Insurance

Subject to the limitations contained in the Act, the Corporation shall purchase and maintain such insurance for the benefit of the directors and officers as the board may from time to time determine.

6.15 Standard of Care

Every director and officer shall exercise the powers and discharge the duties of his or her office honestly and in good faith, and shall exercise the care, diligence and skill that a reasonably prudent person would exercise in comparable circumstances.

6.16 Consent of Director at Meeting

A director who is present at a meeting of directors, or committee of directors, is deemed to have consented to any resolution passed at such meeting or to any action taken thereat, unless such director;

- a) requests that his or her dissent is entered in the minutes of the meeting; or
- b) delivers a written dissent to the secretary of the meeting before the meeting is terminated.

A director who votes for (or consents to) a resolution is not entitled to dissent under or pursuant to the foregoing provisions hereof.

6.17 Deemed Consent of a Director

A director who was not present at a meeting at which a resolution was passed or any action taken is deemed to have consented thereto unless within seven (7) days after becoming aware of the resolution, the director:

- a) causes his or her dissent to be entered into (or annexed to) the minutes of the meeting; or
- b) delivers a written dissent to the Corporation, personally or by registered mail.

ARTICLE VII- OFFICERS

7.1 Elected President:

At the first meeting of the board, after each election of directors and wherever a vacancy in the office occurs, the board shall elect from among its members a President. Until such elections, the then incumbent (if a member of the board) shall hold office.

7.2 Other Elections and Appointments:

The board shall appoint or elect a secretary, a treasurer and such other officers as the board may determine, including one or more assistants to any such officers. The officers so elected need not be members of the board. One person may hold more than one office.

7.3 Term of Office:

The board may by resolution remove at its pleasure any officer of the Corporation.

7.4 President

The President shall, when present, unless he/she has delegated the responsibility, preside at all meetings of the owners and of the board, and shall be charged with the general supervision of the business and affairs of the Corporation. Except when the board has appointed a General Manager or Managing Director, the President shall also have the powers and be charged with the duties of that office.

7.5 Vice-President:

During the absence of the President his/her duties may be performed and his/her powers may be exercised by the Vice-President, or if there are more than one, by the Vice-Presidents, in order of seniority as determined by the board. If a Vice-President exercises any such duty or power the absence of the President shall be presumed with reference thereto. A Vice-President shall also perform such duties and exercise such powers as the board may prescribe.

7.6 General Manager

The General Manager, if one be appointed, shall have the general management and direction, subject to the authority of the board and the supervision of the President, of the Corporation's business and affairs, and the power to appoint and remove any and all employees and agents of the Corporation not elected or appointed directly by the board, and to settle the terms of their employment and remuneration. The terms of employment and remuneration of the General Manager appointed by the board shall be settled from time to time by the board.

7.7 Secretary:

The Secretary shall give or cause to be given all notices required to be given to the owners, directors, auditors, mortgagees and all other entitled thereto; he/she shall attend all meetings of the directors and owners and shall enter or cause to be entered in records kept for that purpose minutes of all proceedings at such meetings; he/she shall be the custodian of all books, paper, records, documents and other instruments belonging to the Corporation, and he/she shall perform such other duties as may from time to time be prescribed by the board.

7.8 Treasurer:

The Treasurer shall keep or cause to be kept full and accurate books of account in which shall be recorded all receipts and disbursements of the Corporation and under the direction of the board shall control the deposit of money, the safekeeping of securities and the disbursement of funds of the Corporation; he/she shall render to the board whenever required of him/her an account of all his/her transactions as Treasurer, and of the financial position of the Corporation; and he shall perform such other duties as may from time to time be prescribed by the board. The offices of Secretary and Treasurer maybe combined.

7.9 Other Officers:

The duties of all other officers of the Corporation shall be as set out in the terms of their employment or as the board further declares. Any of the powers and duties of an officer to whom an assistant has been appointed may be exercised and performed by such assistant unless the board otherwise directs.

7.10 Agents and Attorneys:

The board shall have power from time to time to appoint agents or attorneys for the Corporation with such powers of management or otherwise (including the power to sub-delegate) as may be thought fit.

7.11 Committees

In order to assist the board in managing the affairs of the Corporation, the board may from time to time establish or constitute such advisory committees to advise and make recommendations to the board in connection with any activities undertaken (or under consideration) by the board, including those related to management, budgets, rules and/or any other matters related to the common elements or any facilities, services or amenities (or any portion thereof). The members of such committees shall be appointed by the board to hold office, and may be removed at any time by resolution of the board.

ARTICLE VIII- BANKING ARRANGEMENTS AND CONTRACTS

8.1 Arrangements

The banking business of the Corporation or any part thereof shall be transacted with such bank or trust company as the board may designate or appoint from time to time by resolution, and all such banking business or any part thereof, shall be transacted on the Corporation's behalf by such one or more officers or other persons as the board may designate, direct or authorize from time to time by resolution and, to the extent therein provided, including without restricting the generality of the foregoing, the operation of the Corporations accounts, the making, signing, drawing, accepting, endorsing, negotiating, lodging, depositing or transferring of any cheques, promissory notes, drafts, acceptances, bills of exchange and orders relating to any property of the Corporation; the execution of any agreement relating to any such banking business and defining the rights and powers of the parties thereto; and the authorizing of any officer of such bank to do any act or thing on the Corporation's behalf to facilitate such banking business.

8.2 Execution of Instruments:

Subject to the provisions of the Act, and subject to the provisions of any other by-law(s) of the Corporation specifically designating the person or persons authorized to execute any type or class of documents on behalf of the Corporation, all deeds, transfers, assignments, contracts and obligations on behalf of the Corporation may be signed by any two directors of the Corporation. Any contract or obligation within the scope of any management agreement entered into by the Corporation may be executed on behalf of the Corporation in accordance with the provisions of such management agreement. The manager of the Corporation, any two members of the board, or the Corporation's solicitor, may execute a certificate of lien or discharge thereof. Subject to the provisions of the Act and the Declaration, but notwithstanding any provisions to the contrary contained herein or in any other by-laws of the Corporation, the board may at any time (and from time to time) by resolution direct the manner in which, and the person or persons by whom, any particular deed, transfer, assignment, contract, cheque or obligation, or any class of deeds, transfers, assignments, contracts, cheques or obligations of the Corporation may or shall be signed.

8.3 No Seal

Despite anything contained in this by-law to the contrary, any document or instrument that would otherwise require a seal need not be executed under the seal of the Corporation, provided that it has been duly executed by the person or persons expressly authorized and empowered to execute same on behalf of the Corporation, nor shall any such document or instrument be duly witnessed, in order to be valid, effective and binding upon the Corporation, provided that the name of the signatory, his or her office in the Corporation, and the phrase "I/We have the authority to bind the Corporation" are clearly set out below the signature(s) of the person(s) expressly authorized and empowered to execute same on behalf of the Corporation, and any such duly executed document or instrument shall have the same validly and binding effect on the Corporation (for all purposes) as if same had been duly executed under the seal of the Corporation.

8.4 Execution of Status Certificates:

Status certificates maybe signed by any officer or any director of the Corporation provided that the board may by resolution direct the manner in which, and the person by whom, such certificates may or shall be signed from time to time.

ARTICLE IX - FINANCIAL YEAR END

9.1 Financial Year End:

The financial year end of the Corporation shall end on the last day of the month in which the declaration and description creating the Corporation were registered, in each year, or on such other day as the board by resolution may determine.

ARTICLE X - NOTICE

10.01 Method of Giving Notices

Except as otherwise specifically provided in the Act, the Declaration, this by-law, or any other by-law(s) of the Corporation hereafter enacted, any notice(s), communication(s) or other document(s), including budgets and notices of assessment required to be given, served or delivered shall be sufficiently given or served if given in accordance with the following provisions:

- a) to an owner: [who has notified the Corporation in writing of his or her ownership interest in any common interest, and of his or her name and address for service] by giving same to such owner (or to any director or officer of such owner, if the owner is a corporation) either:

- (i) personally, by courier, or by ordinary mail, postage prepaid, addressed to such owner at the address for service given by such owner to the Corporation; or
 - (ii) by facsimile transmission electronic mail, or by any other method of electronic communication, if the owner agrees in writing that the party giving the notice may do so in this manner; or
 - (iii) delivered at the owner's address or at the mail box for the parcel of tied land, unless the party giving the notice has received a written request from the owner that the notice not be given in this manner; or
- b) to a mortgagee [who has notified the Corporation in writing of his or her interest as mortgagee of any common interest, and of his or her name and address for service, and of his or her right under the terms of the mortgage to vote at a meeting of owners (or to consent in writing) in the place and stead of the mortgagor common interest owner), by giving same to such mortgagee (or to any director or officer of such mortgagee, if the mortgagee is a corporation) either:
- (i) personally, by courier or by ordinary mail, postage prepaid, addressed to such mortgagee at the address for service given by such mortgagee to the Corporation; or
 - (ii) by facsimile transmission, electronic mail, or by any other method of electronic communications, if the mortgagee agrees in writing that the party giving the notice may do so in this manner;
- c) to the Corporation by giving same personally to any director or officer of the Corporation, or by courier or by registered mail, postage prepaid, addressed to the Corporation at its address for service as set out in the Declaration, or as changed in accordance with the requirements of the Act.

10.02 Receipt of Notice

If any notice is mailed as aforesaid, then such notice shall be deemed to have been received (and to be effective) on the second (2nd) day following the day on which same was mailed. If any notice is delivered personally, by courier, or by facsimile transmission or by any other method of electronic communication, then such notice shall be deemed to have been received (and to be effective) on the next day following the day on which same was personally delivered, couriered, telefaxed, or sent by any other method of electronic communication, as the case may be. Except as may otherwise be provided in accordance with the Act, the accidental omission to give any notice to anyone entitled thereto, or the non-receipt of such notice, or any error in any notice not affecting the substance thereof, shall not invalidate any action taken at any meeting of owners or directors held pursuant to such notice or otherwise founded thereon.

ARTICLE XI - ASSESSMENT AND COLLECTION OF COMMON EXPENSES

11.1 Duties of the Board

All expenses, charges and costs of maintenance of the common elements and any other expenses, charges or costs which the board may incur or expend pursuant hereto shall be assessed by the board and levied against the owners in the proportions in which they are required to contribute to the common expenses as set forth in the Declaration. The board shall from time to time, and at least annually, prepare a budget for the property and determine by estimate, the amount of common expenses for the next ensuing fiscal year, or remainder of the current fiscal year as the case maybe, which shall include provision for a reserve fund as required by the Act, the board shall advise all owners promptly in writing of the amount of common expenses payable by each of them respectively determined as aforesaid, and shall deliver copies of each budget on which common expenses are based to all owners and mortgagees entered in the Record.

11.2 Owner's Obligations:

Each owner shall pay to the Corporation the amount of such assessment in equal monthly payments on the first day of each and every month next following notice of such assessment by way of twelve (12) postdated cheques or execution of pre-authorized payment plan, until such time as a new assessment has been provided to such owner.

11.3 Extraordinary Expenditures:

In addition to the annual assessment, extraordinary expenditures not contemplated in the foregoing budget and for which the board shall not have sufficient finds, may be assessed at any time during the year by the board serving notice of such assessment on all owners, as an additional common expense. The notice shall include a written statement setting out the reasons for the assessment. The assessment shall be payable by each owner within ten (10) days after the delivery thereof to him, or within such further period of time or in such installments as the board may determine.

11.4 Default in Payment of Assessment:

(a) Arrears of payments required to be made under the provisions of this article shall bear interest at a rate determined by the board from time to time and in default of such determination shall bear interest at the rate of eighteen (18%) per cent per annum and shall be compounded monthly until paid.

(b) In addition to any remedies or liens provided by the Act, if any owner is in default in payment of an assessment levied against him/her for a period of fifteen (15) days, the board may retain a solicitor on behalf of the Corporation to enforce collection and there shall be added to any amount due all costs of such solicitor as between a solicitor and his own client and such costs may be collectible against the defaulting owner in the same manner as common expenses.

(c) The board when giving notice of default in payment of common expenses or any other default to the owner of the common interest, shall concurrently send a copy of such notice to each mortgagee of such common interest who has requested that such notices be sent to him.

ARTICLE XII - LIABILITY FOR COSTS

12.1 Abatement and Restraint of Violations by Common interest Owners and Liability for Costs:

The owner of a common interest is responsible for any cost incurred to repair:

(a) damage to the common elements or other common interests that may have been caused by either the Owner's use or his/her residents or their visitors use of same; and

(b) damage to the common elements that has been caused by the deliberate or negligent conduct of any owner, resident or their invited guests.

In those cases where it has been determined that the responsibility for payment of the cost to repair is that of the common interest owner, or where an owner requests to repair a common element himself/herself, the board of directors shall approve the selection of the contractor and/or the method of repair. This decision, at the discretion of the board, shall be based on a minimum of two (2) bids, the method of repair, the meeting of standards of uniformity and consideration in the convenience of the owner(s) involved.

12.2 Additional Rights of Corporation

The violation of any provisions of the Act, the Declaration, the By-laws, and/or the rules adopted by the board of directors, shall give the board the right, in addition to any other rights set forth in these by-laws:

(a) to enter the common interest in which or as to which such violation, or breach exists and to summarily abate and remove, at the expense of the defaulting owner, any structure, thing, or condition that may exist therein contrary to the intent and meaning of the provisions hereof, and the board shall not thereby be deemed guilty in any manner of trespass; or

(b) to enjoin, abate or remedy by appropriate legal proceedings, either at law or in equity, the continuance of any such breach, including without limiting the generality of the foregoing, an application for an order for compliance by implementing such proceedings as provided for in Part 9 of the Act.

12.3 Insurance Deductible:

Pursuant to subsections 105(2) and (3) of the Act, where any insurance policy obtained or maintained by the Corporation contains a deductible clause that limits the amount payable by the insurer, then the portion of any loss that is excluded from coverage shall be deemed a common expense, provided however that if an owner, tenant or any other person residing in the owner's common interest with the permission or knowledge of the owner, by or through any act or omission causes damage to such owner's common interest, in those circumstances where such damage was not caused or contributed to by any act or omission of the Corporation or any of its directors, officers, agents or employees, then the amount which is equivalent to the lesser of the cost of repairing the damage and the deductible limit of the Corporation's insurance policy shall be added to the common expenses payable in respect of such owner's common interest, together with all costs and expenses incurred by the Corporation (either directly or indirectly) in resolving such claim and/or having such damage fully rectified (including the increase in insurance premiums, if any, charged or levied against the Corporation by its insurer as a result of such claim or damage, together with all legal costs incurred by the Corporation on a solicitor and client basis), and shall be recoverable from such owner in the same manner (and upon the same terms) as unpaid common expenses.

ARTICLE XIII - PROCEDURES FOR MEDIATING DISPUTES

13.1 Mediation Procedures

For the purposes of complying with sections 125 and 132 of the Act (if and where applicable), the procedure with respect to the mediation of disputes or disagreements between the Corporation and any owner(s) shall be conducted in accordance with the rules of procedure for the conduct of mediation attached hereto as Appendix "A".

RESTRICTION ON USE-VISITORS PARKING

14.1 Restriction

No visitor to the property, other than persons attending on the property with the consent of the corporation for the purpose of making repairs, maintaining the common elements, and the like, shall park or stand any motorized vehicle anywhere on the property.

ARTICLE XV - MISCELLANEOUS

15.1 Invalidity:

The invalidity of any part of this by-law shall not impair or affect in any manner the validity, enforceability or effect of the balance thereof.

15.2 Gender:

The use of the masculine gender in this by-law shall be deemed to include the feminine and neuter genders and the use of the singular shall be deemed to include plural wherever the context so requires, and vice versa.

15.3 Waiver:

No restriction, condition, obligation or provision contained in this by-law shall be deemed to have been abrogated or waived by reason of any failure to enforce the same irrespective of the number of violations or breaches thereof which may occur.

15.4 Headings:

The headings in the body of this by-law form no part thereof but shall be deemed to be inserted for convenience of reference only.

15.5 Alterations:

This by-law or any part thereof may be varied, altered or repealed by a by-law passed in accordance with the provisions of the Act, and the Declaration.

15.6 Conflicts:

In the ease of a conflict between the provisions of the Act and any provision in the Declaration, By-laws or Rules, the Act shall prevail. In the case of a conflict between the provisions in the Declaration and any provision in the By-laws or Rules, the Declaration shall prevail. In the event the provisions of the Act or in the Declaration are silent the provisions of the By-laws shall prevail.

APPENDIX “A” TO BY-LAW #1

ARTICLE 1- PRE-MEDIATION PROCEEDINGS

Prior to submitting a dispute on any question or matter to a mediator appointed by the parties in accordance with Section 132 of the Condominium Act, 1998 as set forth below, and within fourteen (14) days of the dispute first arising, the common interest owner (or common interest owners) and the board of directors shall meet on at least one occasion, and shall use their best efforts to resolve the question or matter in dispute through good faith negotiations conducted at such meeting and, if the parties are able to agree upon the selection of a neutral person who may be and include the Corporation’s property manager and/or a highly regarded member of the community, the meeting shall include such neutral person(s), all acting with a view to securing a resolution of the question or matter in dispute without further proceedings, including the conduct of mediation with the assistance of an outside mediator.

If one of the parties to the question or matter in dispute is unable or unwilling to participate in the initial meeting described in the preceding paragraph, then either party to the dispute may within 5 business days give written notice to the other that it is submitting the question or matter in dispute to the mediation and arbitration procedures set forth below.

If the parties, having met and used their best efforts to resolve the question or matter in dispute through good faith negotiation, have been unable to resolve the question or matter in dispute, then either party may, thereafter, give notice to the other that it is submitting the question or matter in dispute to mediation.

ARTICLE 2 - MEDIATION

Within 30 days following the giving of notice by one party to the other party or parties as set forth above, the question or matter in dispute shall be initially dealt with through mediation proceedings in accordance with Section 132 of the Condominium Act, 1998.

Selection and Role of the Mediator:

The party sending notice of mediation shall set forth in the notice to the other party the names, qualification and experience of two or more mediators from whom the other party may select one, or alternatively, may furnish to the first party its own list of two or more persons qualified to act as a mediator, and within 7 days thereafter, the parties shall communicate directly with one another to select a mediator. If the parties are unable to agree upon the selection of a mediator within 7 days, or within such longer period of time as may be agreeable to the parties then the appointment of a mediator shall be carried by the executive director of the Condominium Dispute Resolution Centre (the “CDRC”) or his/her nominee whose decision in the appointment of a qualified mediator for this purpose shall be final and binding upon the parties.

The mediator selected by the parties or, failing their agreement, appointed by the CDRC, shall not have had any current or past relationship of any kind with any of the parties that might otherwise give rise to justifiable doubts as to his or her impartiality or independence in assuming a neutral role as a mediator to assist the parties in the resolution of their dispute.

The mediator’s role is to assist the parties to negotiate a resolution of their dispute. The mediator will not make decisions for the parties about how the matter should or must be resolved.

Party Confidentiality:

The parties to the question or matter in dispute acknowledge that mediation is a confidential settlement process, and that they are participating in the process with the understanding that anything discussed in the mediation cannot be used in any other proceeding.

Pre-mediation information:

Each of the parties shall provide to the mediator a brief description of the dispute in writing in order to facilitate a more complete understanding of the controversy and the issues to be mediated not less than two (2) days prior to the first mediation session, which date the mediator shall have authority to establish at the earliest possible and convenient date to the parties.

Authority to Settle:

The parties or those representing them at the mediation shall have full, unqualified authority to settle the controversy.

Mediator Confidentiality:

The mediator shall not disclose to anyone who is not a party to the mediation anything said or any materials submitted to the mediator except when ordered to do so by judicial authority or where required to do so by law.

Legal Representation:

The parties may seek legal representation or advice prior to or during the mediation. They may have lawyers present at the mediation, if they so desire. If the mediator selected by the parties is a qualified lawyer, he or she will not provide legal representation or legal advice to any party at any time, and the mediator has no duty to assert or protect the legal rights and responsibilities of any party, or to raise any issue not raised by the parties themselves, or to determine who should participate in the meditation.

Right to Withdraw:

In accordance with Section 132 of the Condominium Act, 1998, it is mandatory that each party to the dispute attend the initial mediation session. Prior to such attendance, each party shall provide the mediator with a brief description of the dispute in writing. Subject to the foregoing requirements, each party shall be entitled to withdraw at and from the initial mediation session.

Costs of the Mediation:

In accordance with Section 132 of the Condominium Act, 1998, each party shall pay the share of the mediator's fees and expenses that the settlement specifies, if a settlement is obtained, or the mediator specifies in the notice stating that the mediation has failed, if the mediation fails.

Notice and Report:

In the event that the parties are unable, with the assistance of the mediator, to settle their dispute, the mediator shall deliver a notice to the parties stating that the mediation has failed, and the parties shall thereafter resolve their dispute by arbitration under the Arbitration Act, 1991 and in the manner set forth below.

Settlement:

In accordance with Section 132 of the Condominium Act, 1998, upon obtaining a settlement between the parties with respect to the disagreement submitted to mediation, the mediator shall make a written report of the settlement which shall form part of the agreement or matter that was the subject of the mediation.

INSURANCE TRUST AGREEMENT

THIS AGREEMENT made the _____ day of _____, 200 .

BETWEEN:

SOMEWHERE COMMON ELEMENTS CONDOMINIUM CORPORATION NO. _____, a corporation created under the laws of the Province of Ontario pursuant to the Condominium Act, 1998, S.O. 1998, c. 19, and amendments thereto (hereinafter referred to as the “Act”),

(hereinafter called the “Settlor”)

OF THE FIRST PART;

- and -

THE BANK OF SOMEWHERE

(hereinafter called the “Trustee”)

OF THE SECOND PART.

WHEREAS the declaration creating the Settlor and registered pursuant to the Act (“Declaration”) provides that the Board of Directors of the Settlor (“Board”) on behalf of the Settlor shall enter into an agreement with an insurance trustee, which agreement shall, without limiting its generality, provide for the receipt by the insurance trustee of any proceeds of insurance payable to the Settlor, the holding by the insurance trustee of such proceeds in trust for the persons entitled thereto and the disbursement by the insurance trustee of such proceeds in accordance with the provisions of the insurance trust agreement;

AND WHEREAS the parties hereto are desirous of entering into this Agreement for the purposes set forth in the Declaration, on the terms and conditions herein;

AND WHEREAS all necessary resolutions have been passed by the Board and all other proceedings taken and conditions complied with to authorize the execution and delivery by the Settlor of this Agreement;

AND WHEREAS the Settlor has obtained certain policies of insurance set forth in Schedule “A” annexed hereto;

NOW THEREFORE this Agreement witnesseth that in consideration of the mutual covenants hereinafter contained, the parties hereto hereinafter covenant and agree to and with each other as follows:

ARTICLE 1.00 - DEFINITIONS

1.1 Words and expressions used herein which are used or defined in the Act, or in the regulations made under the Act have the same meaning herein as they have therein unless otherwise defined herein or unless the context otherwise requires.

ARTICLE 2.00 - APPOINTMENT OF TRUSTEE

2.1 The Settlor hereby appoints the Trustee to act as insurance trustee pursuant to the provisions of the Declaration and By-laws of the Settlor, copies of which are submitted herewith to the Trustee.

ARTICLE 3.00 - ACCEPTANCE OF APPOINTMENT

3.1 The Trustee hereby accepts such appointment as insurance trustee and hereby agrees with the Settlor to carry out and perform its duties hereunder in a faithful, diligent and honest manner.

ARTICLE 4.00 - ACKNOWLEDGEMENT BY TRUSTEE

4.1 The Trustee hereby acknowledges that it is familiar with the provisions of the Act and of the Declaration hereinbefore referred to and acknowledges having received a copy of the Declaration.

ARTICLE 5.00 - PAYMENT BY TRUSTEE

5.1 All insurance proceeds received by the Trustee shall be held by it in trust and paid in accordance with the following terms and conditions:

In the event of:

- (a) damage to the buildings, if the Trustee receives a certificate duly executed by the President or Vice-President and the Secretary of the Settlor certifying:
 - (i) that the Board has determined that less than twenty-five per cent (25%) of the buildings have sustained substantial damage; or
 - (ii) that the Board has determined that twenty-five per cent (25%) or more of the buildings have sustained substantial damage, and that owners who own at least eighty per cent (80%) of the common interests have not voted to terminate within one hundred and twenty (120) days of such determination by the Board; or
- (b) damage to the property or other assets of the Settlor, excluding the buildings, the Trustee shall disburse the proceeds of all insurance in its hands and arising out of such damage towards the cost of repairing such damage, from time to time, as the repairs of such damage progress, upon the written request of the Settlor accompanied by the following:

- (i) a certificate signed by the President or Vice-President and the Secretary of the Settlor dated not more than thirty (30) days prior to such request and counter-signed by the architect or engineer, if any, employed by the Settlor in connection with such repairs, setting forth the following:
 - (a) that the sum then requested either has been paid by the Settlor or is justly due to contractors, architects or other persons who have rendered services or furnished materials for repairs therein specified, the names and addresses of such persons, a brief description of such services and materials, the several amounts so paid or due to each of said persons in respect thereto;
 - (b) that no part of such expenditures has been or is being made the basis of any previous or then pending request for the payment of insurance proceeds then held by the Trustee, or has theretofore been paid out of such insurance proceeds;
 - (c) that the sum then requested, when added to all sums previously paid by the Trustee, does not exceed the value of the services and materials described in such certificate;
 - (d) that except for the amount, if any, stated in such certificate to be due for services or materials, there is no outstanding indebtedness known to the Board, after due enquiry, which is then due for labour, wages, materials, supplies or services in connection with such repairs, which, if unpaid, might become the basis of a lien pursuant to the Construction Lien Act by reason of such repair to the buildings or any part thereof; and,
 - (e) specifying the person(s) to whom the payment requested is to be made and the amount to be paid to each such person(s).

- (ii) an opinion of the solicitor acting for the Settlor, or other evidence reasonably satisfactory to the Trustee to the effect that there has not been filed with respect to the buildings or the property, or any part thereof, any Construction Lien which has not been discharged except such as will be discharged by payment of the amount then requested.

Any balance of proceeds of insurance remaining in the Trustee's hands after payment in full of the cost of the repairs as aforesaid, shall be paid over by the Trustee to the Settlor.

- 5.2 The Trustee shall not be under any duty to enquire as to the correctness of any amounts received by it on account of the proceeds of any insurance, nor shall the Trustee be under any obligation to enforce the payment of proceeds to it.
- 5.3 In the event of damage to the buildings, if the Trustee receives a certificate duly executed by the President or Vice-President and the Secretary of the Settlor, certifying that the Board has determined that twenty-five per cent (25%) or more of the buildings have sustained substantial damage and that owners who own at least eighty per cent (80%) of the common interests have voted for termination within one hundred and twenty (120) days of such determination, that there is termination in accordance with the provisions of the Act, or otherwise, and notice of such termination has been registered in the Office of Land Titles in which the condominium is registered, the Trustee shall disburse any insurance proceeds then in its hands or thereafter received by it in the following order of priority:
 - (a) to any mortgagee or mortgagees to whom such loss shall be payable in any such policy or policies of insurance or who have a mortgage or charge registered in the said Office of Land Titles with respect to the parcel of tied land of an owner, in satisfaction of the amount due pursuant to any liens registered by the Settlor against any such parcels and in satisfaction of any other registered interests in the common interests in order of their respective legal priorities;
 - (b) to the owners of the common interests in the proportion of their respective common interests as set out in the Declaration as registered in the said Office of Land Titles and the names of the common interests owners as registered in the said office of Land Titles shall be conclusive as to the names of the common interests owners and their respective common interests.

The Settlor shall cause a search to be conducted in the records of the said Office of Land Titles by a duly qualified solicitor retained by the Settlor, and the Trustee shall be entitled to rely, without further enquiry, upon the accuracy and completeness of the report of the said solicitor provided only that it is addressed to the Settlor, is dated within ten (10) days prior to the disbursement of funds, that it specifies the priority of the interests of the various parties in each parcels of tied lands and that it specifies the names of owners of the parcels of tied lands and their respective common interests.

- 5.4 In the event that the proceeds of insurance deposited with the Trustee are less than fifteen percent (15%) of the replacement cost of the property covered by the policy pursuant to which the proceeds of insurance were paid to the Trustee, all such proceeds shall be paid to the Settlor forthwith, notwithstanding anything herein contained to the contrary, and the Settlor covenants to apply such proceeds in compliance with its obligations pursuant to the Act and the Declaration and to indemnify the Trustee in respect of all liabilities or obligations in respect of such proceeds. The Trustee shall be entitled to rely, without independent enquiry, upon the certificate of an architect as to whether the proceeds of insurance deposited with the Trustee are less than fifteen percent (15%) of the replacement cost of the property covered by the policy pursuant to which the insurance proceeds were paid to the Trustee and shall be entitled to retain an independent architect at the expense of the Settlor for the purpose of providing such a certificate.
- 5.5 Subject to the terms of this Agreement, in the event that the Trustee is in receipt of proceeds of insurance from or in respect of any liability policy to which this Agreement is applicable, the Trustee shall disburse such proceeds only upon receipt of and in accordance with the written directions of the Settlor executed on its behalf by its President or Vice-President and Secretary.

ARTICLE 6.00 - DEFICIENCY OF INSURANCE PROCEEDS

- 6.1 The Settlor shall be promptly notified of any proceeds of insurance deposited with the Trustee on behalf of the Settlor, and the Trustee shall be under no obligation to make any payments as specified in this Agreement except out of the proceeds of insurance held in trust for the Settlor.
- 6.2 If, upon the receipt of any certificate referred to in section 5.1, the Trustee shall not have sufficient funds to pay the amount due and owing as set out therein, the Settlor shall be so notified by the Trustee, and the Settlor shall further notify the Trustee in writing as to which of the persons or companies set forth in the said certificate are to be paid by the Trustee and in which amounts.

ARTICLE 7.00 - NOTICE IN THE EVENT OF CANCELLATION OF INSURANCE

- 7.1 The Settlor and all mortgagees having an interest in the common interests as shown on the Settlor's records with respect to any common interest shall be promptly notified of any notice of cancellation received by the Trustee. The Trustee shall not have any liability to the Settlor or any other party in the event of its inadvertent failure to provide notice in accordance with the foregoing. The Trustee shall be entitled to rely in any event on the accuracy and completeness of the Settlor's records without independent inquiry.
- 7.2 The Trustee shall not be under any obligation to inquire whether any insurance policy remains in force, it being the express understanding of the parties that it shall be the sole responsibility of the Settlor to obtain all required insurance policies and to ensure that same remain in force at all times.

ARTICLE 8.00 - LIABILITY AND INDEMNIFICATION OF TRUSTEE

- 8.1 The Trustee shall have no duties, express or implied, except those which are expressly set forth in this Agreement and shall in no way be responsible or liable for any loss, cost or damages which may result from anything done or omitted to be done by such Trustee hereunder, except in the case of negligence or bad faith. The Trustee shall be protected in acting upon any certificate, statement, request, consent, agreement or other instrument whatsoever, not only as to its due execution and validity in its effectiveness or its provisions, but also as to the truth and accuracy of any information therein contained, which it shall, in good faith, believe to be genuine, and to have been signed and presented by the proper person or persons. The Trustee shall also be protected and indemnified in acting in good faith upon any advice or legal opinion it may seek from an independent solicitor with respect to its duties, obligations and rights hereunder. The Trustee shall also be indemnified for the reasonable legal fees and disbursements of such a solicitor. Further, the Trustee shall have no responsibility with respect to any cheques deposited with it hereunder except the usual responsibilities with respect to the application of any funds paid by it pursuant to the provisions of this Agreement.
- 8.2 The Settlor shall reimburse the Trustee for all expenses incurred by it in connection with its duties under this Agreement and shall indemnify it and save it harmless against any and all liabilities, costs and expenses including legal fees, for anything done or omitted to be done by it in the performance of this agreement, except as a result of negligence or bad faith.
- 8.3 The Trustee may become mortgagee of any or all common interests together with such other interests as may be attached to the ownership of such common interests and may enforce the covenants in the mortgage relating thereto, notwithstanding that the enforcement may be in conflict with the Trustee's duties hereunder.

ARTICLE 9.00 - TERMINATION OF AGREEMENT

- 9.1 At any time hereafter, the Settlor shall have the sole and unrestricted right to terminate this Agreement by not less than sixty (60) days prior written notice to the Trustee. Following such termination, upon payment to the Trustee of all fees and charges due to the Trustee hereunder, the Trustee shall turn over all sums deposited with it, remaining in its hands, to any successor Trustee appointed by the Board and of which the Trustee has been given written notice, failing which it shall turn over all such sums to the Settlor and thereupon its obligations hereunder shall cease.

- 9.2 The Trustee may, at any time, resign from its duties hereunder by giving to the Settlor and to all mortgagees having an interest in any of the common interests pursuant to a mortgage as shown on the Settlor's records not less than sixty (60) days' notice in writing thereof and its obligations hereunder, except for the payment of any sums remaining in its hands to a successor trustee, as hereinafter provided, shall cease. Following such resignation, the Settlor shall pay to the Trustee all fees and charges due to it hereunder. The Trustee herein shall turn over all sums deposited with it, remaining in its hands, to any successor Trustee appointed by the Board and of which the Trustee has been given written notice, failing which it shall turn over all such sums to the Settlor, all subject to the Trustee's rights pursuant to section 12.2 hereof, and thereupon its obligations hereunder shall cease.

ARTICLE 10.00 - MODIFICATION OR AMENDMENT OF AGREEMENT AND RIGHTS OF THE PARTIES

- 10.1 This Agreement shall not be modified or amended without the written consent of the parties hereto and any mortgagees having registered mortgages against at least ten per cent (10 %) of the Common interests.
- 10.2 Upon being advised of damage to the buildings in excess of the amount set out in section 5.4 hereof, or upon receipt of any moneys in excess of the said amount, in accordance with the terms of this Agreement, the Trustee shall notify all mortgagees having a mortgage or charge as shown on the Settlor's records where the amount received is less than $100,000.00 and shall notify all mortgagees having a mortgage or charge registered in the aforesaid Office of Land Titles against any parcel of tied land where the amount received is $100,000.00 or more. For the purposes of giving notice in the latter event, the Settlor shall cause a search to be conducted in the records of the said Office of Land Titles by a duly qualified solicitor retained by the Settlor, and the Trustee shall be entitled to rely, without further enquiry, upon the accuracy and completeness of the report of the said solicitor provided only that it is addressed to the Settlor, is dated within ten (10) days prior to the disbursement of funds and that it specifies the priority of the interests of the various parties in each parcel of tied land.
- 10.3 Certain provisions of this Agreement are for the benefit of the mortgagees of the common interests and all such provisions are covenants for the benefit of any mortgagee having an interest registered in the said Office of Land Titles against any of the common interests or any part of the insured property and may be enforced by such mortgagee.

ARTICLE 11.00 - ADDRESS FOR SERVICE

- 11.1 Any certificate, declaration or notice in writing given to the Settlor, pursuant to this Agreement, shall be sufficiently given if delivered or mailed by prepaid registered post to the Settlor at its last known address and at:

c/o Somewhere Property Management
1 Oak Street
Somewhere, Ontario, Z1Z 1Z1

or such either address as the Settlor may advise in writing from time to time.

Any certificate, declaration or notice in writing given to the Trustee pursuant to this Agreement shall be sufficiently given if delivered or mailed by prepaid registered post to the Trustee at its last known address and at:

The Bank of Somewhere
5 Oak Street, Somewhere, Ontario
Z1Z 1Z1
Attention: Trust Dept.

or such other address as the Trustee may advise in writing from time to time.

Such certificate, declaration and notice in writing shall have been deemed to have been received on the date of delivery or third clear business day next following the date of such mailing. Each of the parties shall be entitled to rely without further inquiry on the address determined in accordance with the foregoing as being the most current and correct address of the party to whom such certificate, declaration or notice is to be given. Each party further covenants to notify the other, in the manner provided for in this Article 11.00 of any change in its address for service.

ARTICLE 12.00 - REMUNERATION OF TRUSTEE

- 12.1 The Settlor shall pay the Trustee's fees and charges as set out in Schedule "B" attached hereto which fees and charges may be changed from time to time by written notice from the Trustee to the Settlor at anytime. In the event that the Settlor does not agree with any change in fees or charges made by the Trustee, it shall be entitled to terminate the within agreement pursuant to Article 9.00 hereof within sixty (60) days after receipt of the notice of change to fees or charges in which event the change shall not apply and the within agreement shall be terminated in accordance with Article 9.00 hereof. In the event that no notice of termination is delivered pursuant to Article 9.00 within the sixty (60) day period, the fees and charges of the Trustee shall be as set out in its notice to the Settlor until further changed.
- 12.2 The Trustee may deduct all amounts owing to it hereunder from my proceeds of insurance received by it.
- 12.3 In addition to any other rights which the Trustee may have, in the event that any fees, charges, reimbursement of expenses or other amounts due hereunder to the Trustee are not paid when due, the Trustee shall be entitled to enforce payment of same by legal process and all fees, disbursements, expenses or other costs incurred by the Trustee in collecting same (including all legal fees and disbursements on a solicitor and his own client scale) shall be payable by the Settlor to the Trustee.

ARTICLE 13.00 - ADDITIONAL COVENANTS OF SETTLOR

- 13.1 Upon request, the Settlor shall deliver to the Trustee complete and accurate copies of
- (a) all insurance policies, renewals thereof, amendments or endorsements thereto or replacements thereof;
 - (b) the Settlor's records of common interest owners and mortgagees; and

The Trustee shall be entitled to rely, without further enquiry upon the accuracy and completeness of such material.

- 13.2 The Settlor covenants to deliver to the Trustee any amendments to the Settlor's Declaration or By-Laws or any additional By-Laws it may enact.
- 13.3 The Settlor covenants to ensure that losses are payable to the Trustee as insurance trustee under all policies of insurance governed by this Agreement.
- 13.4 The Settlor specifically acknowledges and agrees that the Trustee shall have no liability or obligation to the Settlor or any other party except as is expressly provided for herein and that there are no provisions or obligations between the parties relating to matters governed hereunder, whether oral or written, express or implied except as are expressly set forth herein in writing. The Settlor covenants to indemnify and save the Trustee harmless from and against all claims, demands, liabilities, actions, suits, costs or obligations of any kind or nature whatsoever arising out of or related to the terms of this Agreement unless same results from the negligence or wilful act of the Trustee or a breach by the Trustee of the terms hereof.

ARTICLE 14.00 - ASSIGNMENT OF AGREEMENT

- 14.1 Neither this Agreement nor any rights or obligations hereunder shall be assignable by either party hereto without the prior written consent of the other party. Any attempted assignment without such consent shall be void. Subject thereto, this Agreement shall enure to the benefit of and be binding upon the parties hereto and their respective successors and permitted assigns.
- 14.2 This Agreement shall be governed by and construed in accordance with the laws of the Province of Ontario. The parties hereto hereby irrevocably attorney to the jurisdiction of the courts of the Province of Ontario for all purposes hereunder.
- 14.3 Words importing the singular include the plural and vice versa, and words importing gender include all genders.
- 14.4 The headings contained in this Agreement are included solely for convenience of reference, are not intended to be full or accurate descriptions of the contents thereof and shall not be considered part of this Agreement or affect the construction or interpretation thereof

IN WITNESS WHEREOF the parties hereto have executed this Agreement under the seals of their proper signing officers duly authorized in that behalf as of the * day of , 200*.

NOW THEREFORE THIS AGREEMENT WITNESSETH that in consideration of the premises and the mutual covenants and agreements herein contained and other valuable consideration, the Corporation appoints the Manager and the Manager hereby accepts the appointment as the exclusive Manager of the property and the assets of the Corporation on the terms and conditions hereinafter set forth.

NOMENCLATURE

1.1 Unless a contrary intent is expressed in this Agreement, the terms used herein shall have ascribed to them the meanings contained in the Act and the declaration of the Corporation (the "Declaration").

TERM

2.1 The term of this Agreement shall be for one (1) year from the day of , 200__ to the day of , 200 , unless terminated in accordance with the provisions of this Agreement and the Act.

SUPERVISION BY THE BOARD

3.1 The Manager acknowledges that it is familiar with the Act and with the terms of the Declaration which shall include any agreements referred to therein, and the by-laws registered pursuant to the Act in connection with the Corporation, and the Rules, as of the date of this Agreement. Its management of the Property shall be subject to the specific instructions of the Corporation as expressed by its Board of Directors (the "Board") and to each and every term and condition contained in this Agreement, and it further agrees to carry out expeditiously the instructions of the Condominium Corporation and its Board.

ARTICLE IV MANAGEMENT ASSISTANCE AND DUTIES

- 4.1 The Manager represents it has and shall utilize its experience and knowledge to carry out the management, supervision, control and administration of the Corporation and of the assets of the Corporation. In this regard, the Manager accepts the relationship of trust and confidence established between itself, the Board, and the owners by virtue of entering into this Agreement. The Manager covenants to furnish its best skill and judgment and to co-operate in furthering the interests of the Corporation. The Manager agrees to furnish efficient business administration and supervision and to perform its responsibilities both administrative, financial and advisory, in the best manner, consistent with effective management techniques and in the most expeditious and economical manner consistent with the best interests of the Corporation. The Manager shall conduct its duties in accordance with the requirements of the Act, the Declaration, by-laws and rules of the Corporation specifically, and, in general, consistent with federal, provincial and municipal laws and regulations as they pertain to the operation of the Corporation and of the Property.
- 4.2 Without limiting the generality of paragraph 1 of this Article IV, the Manager shall perform, in particular, the following specific duties, subject to the direction of the Board:

(a) Corporate Funds

To collect, receive, and deposit in trust for the Corporation all moneys payable pursuant to the Act, Declaration and by-laws by the owners or others and to deposit the same forthwith in separate trust account(s) to be opened with a Canadian chartered bank and maintained by the Manager in the name of the Corporation as the Board may from time to time direct. All such moneys shall thereafter be held in trust in the name of the Corporation and be used:

(i) Disbursements

To prepare cheques in payment of all accounts properly incurred by or on behalf of the Corporation, such cheques to be signed by the authorized directors of the Corporation, as per the Banking Resolution approved by the Board. The cheques presented for signing are to be accompanied by properly authorized purchase orders, delivery receipts or such other evidence as the Board may require from time to time;

(ii) Insurance and Appraisals

To arrange and pay for insurance coverage and any appraisals in connection therewith required by the Corporation in accordance with the provisions of the Act, the Declaration and by-laws, and the amounts of such insurance shall be as directed by the Board;

(iii) General Maintenance and Repairs

To repair and maintain or cause to be so repaired and maintained, those parts of the property and assets of the Corporation which require repair and maintenance by the Corporation in accordance with the provisions of the Act, Declaration and by-laws, and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, to arrange for (subject to subparagraph 4.2(1)) the supply as may be required of electricity, water and other services and to arrange through use of Corporation employees and/or independent contractors as in each instance may seem most desirable for the effective and economical operation, maintenance and repair of the Property and its equipment or so as to comply with the enforcement of any regulations and requirements of which the Manager is notified by the local Board of Health, Police, Fire Departments and any other federal, provincial or municipal authorities having jurisdiction which affect the Property, and without limiting the generality of the foregoing, such arrangements shall include where applicable to the Property, removal of litter and disposal of waste, snow and ice removal, landscaping and grounds maintenance, fire hydrant servicing, exterior painting, alterations and any supervision and maintenance necessary in connection with the Property and subject to subparagraph 4.2(1) as aforesaid to maintain such staff on behalf of and at the expense of the Corporation as may be required at all times to promptly and efficiently carry out the foregoing, and any other requirements and instructions of the Board;

(iv) Reserve Fund

To deposit to the credit of the Corporation in a separate account for major repair and replacement of the Common Elements and assets of the Corporation, on a monthly basis, the proportionate amount of the total budgeted expenditure allocated by the Corporation in its budget statement for the establishment of the reserve fund and to ensure that such moneys are not used or employed by the Board or the Manager for the payment of general operating expenses.

The Manager shall prepare annually and for approval of the Board a reserve fund budget statement in accordance with the Reserve Fund Study and the Reserve Fund Plan in accordance with Subsection 94(8) of the Act. In addition, the Manager shall develop and monitor an investment plan as approved by the Board pursuant to subsection 115(8) of the Act (the "Investment Plan") and the Manager shall insert the "surplus" monies in the Corporation's general account(s) and reserve account(s) in accordance with the Investment Plan and subsection 115(6) and (7) of the Act.

(b) By-law Enforcement

To take such action within its power, short of legal action, to enforce the terms of the Act, the Declaration, the by-laws and the rules and amendments to any of the foregoing which may be in force from time to time subject to the direction of the Board; and to retain legal counsel as directed by the Board at the expense of the Corporation.

(c) By-law Advisement

To advise and consult with the Board with respect to any further by-laws and rules which, in the opinion of the Manager, ought to be established to further the harmonious and satisfactory operation of the Property.

(d) Common Element Deficiencies

To use its best efforts to ensure that any building deficiency required by the Corporation to be repaired or rectified is corrected and, if applicable, to pursue the correction of any building deficiency short of legal action under any warranty applicable to the property.

(e) Communication to the Owners

Subject to the instructions of the Board to forthwith after their enactment communicate to all owners the text and import of any further by-laws or rules or amendments thereto.

(f) Insurance Claims

To supervise insurance or other claims by or against the Corporation and to see that the rights of the Corporation in respect to such claims are protected including the filing of notice of claim but not including the adjusting of any loss.

(g) Inadequate Performance by Contractors

To use reasonable diligence to ensure that contracts and agreements between the Corporation and any supplier or service personnel are performed in accordance with the agreed upon terms and to inform the Board in the event performance is considered by the Manager to be inadequate or contrary to the agreed terms and where services are properly performed and/or materials provided in accordance with the contract, to take advantage of all trade discounts by prompt payment of trade invoices.

(h) Construction Liens

To retain or cause to be retained holdbacks required by the Construction Lien Act, R.S. 0. 1990, c. 30 and to use its best efforts to ensure that no claim or lien shall be filed in respect of any work which may be earned out on behalf of the Corporation against the title to the Property and if a claim or lien shall be filed in respect of such work the Manager shall as directed by the Board forthwith take all necessary steps to have the same removed and discharged.

(i) Employee Records

To execute and file all returns and other instruments, maintain proper payroll records and do and perform all acts required of the Corporation as an employer of on-site personnel in respect of unemployment insurance contributions and deductions, Canada Pension Plan contributions and payments, the Income Tax Act of Canada and any other employee and employer contributions or payments required under any social, labour or tax legislation in force from time to time, and in connection therewith the Corporation agrees, upon request, to execute and deliver promptly to the Manager all necessary consents, notices of appointment and like approvals or directors.

(j) Supervision of Employees

To direct and supervise any and all persons employed pursuant to this Agreement, for the operation and maintenance of any equipment in existence or which might be in existence and which the Corporation desires or is obliged to operate and maintain, and shall arrange and be responsible for any technical instructions of personnel employed which may be required for the proper operation and maintenance of such equipment.

Subject to final approval of the Board, the Manager shall negotiate agreements with, supervise and discharge all necessary personnel required to properly and physically maintain the Property. All such on-site personnel shall be employees of the Corporation, and not of the Manager, but such personnel shall be supervised by the Manager. The Corporation's share of all salaries, taxes and other expenses payable on account of such employees shall constitute common expenses of the Corporation and not expenses of the Manager.

(k) Inspection/Work Schedule

To prepare schedules and assignment of responsibilities as maybe necessary to direct on a regular basis the activities of all persons employed to work at the Property and to provide such supervision as may be reasonably necessary and to conduct an inspection, as reasonably required, of the Property and to complete a checklist setting out the status of the ongoing maintenance and repairs to be completed an respect of the common elements, and in compliance by owners with the Act, the Declaration, the by-laws and the rules (i.e. stipulate infractions and the steps taken to correct same) and to make such schedules, inspections and status reports available for inspection by the Board at all reasonable times.

Generally to do and perform and, where desirable, contract as agent for and in the name of the Corporation for all things desirable or necessary for the proper and efficient management of the Property (including the giving of proper attention to any complaints and endeavouring as far as is economical to reduce waste) and to perform every other act whatsoever in or about the Property to carry out the intent of this Agreement provided, however, that the Manager shall not authorize any work, repairs, alterations or maintenance estimated to cost in excess of $1,000.00 for any one item or to have a duration in excess of one (one) month without first obtaining the Board's approval to proceed with such work except for monthly or recurring operating charges. On rare occasions where circumstances warrant, the Board shall provide its approval or other direction to the Manager within a reasonable time of receipt of the Manager's request for approval. Furthermore, if in the Manager's opinion there exists a hazardous situation which could cause personal injury or damage to the property or the Corporation's equipment or chattels or which could impair the value of the owners' interest therein or the owners' equipment, chattels, improvements or Property or which could cause the suspension of any service to the Corporation at a time when the Corporation or its representatives cannot be reasonably located for the purpose of giving approval for such work, or if failure to do such work might expose either the Corporation or the Manager or both to the imposition of penalties, fines, imprisonment or any other substantial liability, the Manager is hereby authorized to proceed with such work as in its discretion it determines to be urgently necessary for the protection and preservation of the Property or the Corporation's equipment or chattels or the owners' interest therein or the owners' equipment, chattels, improvements or property therein or to protect the Corporation or the Manager from exposure to fines, penalties, imprisonment or any other substantial liability subject always to the Act, and the Declaration and By-Laws. The Manager shall in the case of a hazardous situation report to the Board as soon as possible.

(m) Materials, Equipment and Supplies

To purchase, subject to subparagraph 4.2(l) above, on behalf of the Corporation such equipment, tools, appliances, materials and supplies as are necessary for the proper operation and maintenance of the offices and property of the Corporation. All such purchases and contracts shall be in the name of and at the expense of the Corporation.

(n) Inventory

To maintain an inventory of cleaning supplies, pool chemicals, and the like.

(o) Emergency Situations

To keep the Board advised at all times of the telephone number or numbers at which an agent or employee of the Manager may be reached at any time during normal business hours in respect to any infraction of the Act, Declaration, the By-laws, or the rules, or at any time during the day or night in the event of any emergency involving the Property and assets of the Corporation. The Manager will make all arrangements to deal promptly with such infractions and immediately with any emergency arising in connection with the maintenance and operation of the Property and assets of the Corporation. In this regard, the Manager shall deal in the first instance with minor emergencies and infractions and shall forthwith report to the Board of Directors any major emergency or persistent, flagrant or serious violation of the Act, Declaration, the By-laws or the Rules. It is understood and agreed by the parties hereto that the Manager shall, in its discretion, determine whether or not an emergency exists and whether or not such emergency is of a minor or major nature.

(p) Information

To receive in writing (except in ease of emergency) and co-ordinate the disposition of, requests for information and service concerning or related to the duties and obligations of the Manager as provided by this Agreement, in all cases referring to the Board such requests as involve policy decisions or interpretations of the Act, Declaration, by-laws and rules of the Corporation.

(q) Notice of Meetings

At the request of the Board, schedule and arrange the facilities for all annual, general and special meetings of the Owners and deliver to the Owners or such other persons as are entitled to notice pursuant to the Act, Declaration or by-laws, such notices and other information as is required in connection with the holding of such meetings. At the expense of the Corporation and upon request of the Board, the Manager shall prepare notices of meetings and other information in sufficient quantity for distribution to all persons entitled to receive same. With respect to meetings of the Board, the Corporation shall notify the Manager in writing as to the place, date and time of such meetings and a representative of the Manager shall attend all such meetings unless otherwise directed by the Board provided the representative of the Manager shall not be required to attend more than 6 board meetings per fiscal year.

ARTICLE V MANAGEMENT SERVICES

5.1 The Manager agrees that during the term of this Agreement, it will provide all management services required in connection with the undertaking of the Corporation as maybe necessary in the performance of its duties provided, however, that the Manager shall not be responsible for the duties of the Board or of the officers of the Corporation, except as set out in this Agreement.

5.2 Without limiting the generality of subparagraph 5.1 of this Article V, the Manager shall perform the following duties:

(a) Books and Records of Accounts

To keep the Corporation's books and records of accounts and retain full and proper records regarding all financial transactions involved in the management of the Corporation and to forward to the Corporation on or before the 15th day of each month, a statement of receipts and disbursements summarizing the transactions made during the preceding month and as more particularly described in subparagraph 5.2(c). All books and records of accounts kept in relation to the management of the Corporation shall be the property of the Corporation and upon termination of this Agreement shall be forthwith surrendered to the Corporation or to a representative of the Corporation designated in writing. At any time during the term of this Agreement and any renewal period thereof, the said books and records of accounts shall be accessible to the Board, the Officers or the owners of the Corporation, who shall have free access upon reasonable notice at all reasonable times to inspect and examine same. Until termination of this Agreement, the Corporation's books and records of accounts shall be physically kept in the Manager's business office.

(b) Budget

To prepare and present to the Board at least two (2) months before the commencement of each fiscal year during the terms of this agreement an estimated budget in writing for the following year and for the approval of the Board and to consult with the Board whenever it appears desirable or necessary to revise the Owners' contributions to the common expenses.

(c) Financial Reporting

To provide the Board on or before the 15th day of each month with year-to-date monthly itemized unaudited financial statements showing:

- (i) Corporation income on accrual basis;
- (ii) dollar amount of Common Expenses collected;
- (iii) dollar amount of each disbursement as compared with budget expenses by budget categories;
- (iv) the names of the Owners who are delinquent in payment of their required contribution to Common Expenses and the amount of each delinquency;
- (v) amounts of all other delinquent accounts and names of the persons owing such accounts;

- (vi) particulars of accounts, term deposits, certificates and any other instruments respecting investment income and other assets and liabilities of the Corporation in accordance with good accounting principles as at the date of the financial statement.

All accounting and financial reporting which is required under the terms of this Agreement to be provided by the Manager to the Corporation shall be in accordance with the reasonable requests of the Corporation's auditors as to format and shall be provided within the reasonable time limit prescribed by the Corporation's auditors.

(d) The Records

To maintain the Corporation's records in accordance with the Act and to use its best efforts to keep an up-to-date record of the names and addresses of all owners and tenants of whom it has received notice. If the Corporation receives notices or written communication from registered mortgagees or any other persons claiming an interest in a common interest or from an owner providing information with respect to the leasing of the Owner's common interest, the Corporation shall forthwith communicate that information to the Manager. The Records referred to herein shall be physically kept in the offices of the Corporation or in such other location as the Board may from time to time direct.

(e) Access to Books and Records

To make available upon reasonable notice at reasonable times to the Corporation, its auditors, its owners and designated representatives all books and records pertaining to the operation of the Property and the business of the Corporation whenever requested.

(1) Approval of Invoices

To make all disbursements properly incurred for and on behalf of the Corporation with the approval of the Board; provided, however, that the approval of the Board shall not be required prior to payment by the Manager of any items of expense as to which the Manager has discretionary spending authority pursuant to subparagraph

(g) Status Certificates

To prepare for execution by the Corporation or, where an appropriate resolution of the Board has been made, by the Manager status certificates in the form prescribed by regulation pursuant to the Act and to issue and provide status certificates together with the statements and information required pursuant to the Act to any person or persons who request(s) one and has paid the appropriate fee, within the time permitted for the delivery of such certificates, statements and information prescribed in the Act.

The Manager is responsible for the accuracy and completeness of all information contained in the status certificate, however, the Manager shall not be liable for any information within the knowledge of the Board but not communicated to the Manager and which should be included in the status certificate.

The Manager shall be entitled to the fee prescribed by regulation pursuant to the Act for the preparation and issuance of the status certificate and related documentation, and shall bear the costs/disbursements applicable to the issuance of the status certificate and accompanying documentation.

(ii) Preventive Maintenance Program

Establish and thereafter maintain a preventive maintenance program for all major technical and electrical equipment and plumbing systems in accordance with the recommendations of the manufacturers or suppliers thereof. The Manager shall also maintain log books and identification labels clearly numbering all mechanical and electrical equipment and plumbing systems and indicating the nature and frequency of maintenance services performed and shall prepare for the Board's approval general maintenance procedures and schedules to be followed by the Manager and any employees of the Corporation. The Corporation shall make available to the Manager all shop drawings, as-built architectural and structural plans, maintenance and operating manuals for mechanical and electrical equipment and plumbing systems and such other documents as the manager reasonably requires to carry out its duties, that are in the Corporation's possession from time to time.

(i) Manager's Report

Present to the Board as may be reasonably required a Manager's report, to serve as a written form of communication from the Manager to the Board. This Manager's Report shall reflect the directives of the Board to the Manager and shall further reflect the actions of the Manager with respect to those directives. Any and all correspondence received by the Manager with respect to the operation of the Corporation shall be available for examination by the Board.

(j) Fidelity Bond

To arrange, obtain and maintain a Fidelity Bond for and in the name of the Corporation in an amount of not less than TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY THOUSAND ($250,000.00) DOLLARS per occurrence with loss payable to the Corporation only if required by the Corporation. The Corporation agrees that the Manager shall be named as an insured party along with the Corporation and the Fidelity Bond shall not be terminable by either the insurer or the Corporation unless sufficient prior notice of cancellation has been delivered by registered mail to the auditor of the Corporation, the Manager, and to the Board. The premium for the Fidelity Bond, if required, by the Board, shall be an expense of the Corporation.

ARTICLE VI EMPLOYMENT OF CONTRACTORS

6.1 The Manager may contract on behalf of the Corporation with any person, firm or corporation to perform any work or services for the Corporation within the scope of the Manager's duties under this Agreement subject however to the following provisions:

(a) Written Agreements

Any person, firm or corporation employed to perform work or services shall be contracted pursuant to a written contract setting out the essential terms and conditions of such contract.

(b) Approval of the Board

In addition to the requirements of subparagraph 4.2(1), any contract to perform work or services entered into by the Manager shall be for a reasonable consideration usual in the industry and be budgeted for by the Corporation. In the event that any contract for work or service shall be for a consideration in excess of that usual in the industry or in excess of that budgeted for by the Corporation, then prior to entering into such contract the Manager shall first obtain a resolution of the Board approving such contract.

(c) Spending Restrictions

Where the cost of performing such work or services exceeds the sum of $1,000.00 the Manager shall submit at least two (2) written tenders for presentation to the Board and prior to entering into such contract the Manager shall first obtain a resolution of the Board approving such contract.

(d) Filing of Return

MANAGEMENT AGREEMENT

In connection with all contracts to perform work or services entered into by the Manager, it shall execute and file necessary documents and do and perform all acts required under the laws of any federal, provincial, municipal or other governmental body or authority.

ARTICLE VII MANAGER'S COMPENSATION

- 7.1 The Manager shall be paid as compensation for its management services rendered under this Agreement the following fees:

Until terminated in accordance with the provisions of this Agreement and/or the Act, a fee of $350.00 per month during the term of this Agreement payable monthly, in advance. The Manager's fee includes all office expenses directly related to the business office of the Manager with respect to the performance of the duties of the Manager hereunder, but does not include any expenses directly related to the business offices of the Corporation.

ARTICLE VIII PARCELS OF TIED LANDS- REPAIRS

- 8.1 Notwithstanding any other provision of this Agreement the Manager is given no authority or responsibility for maintenance of or repairs to the parcels of tied lands which shall be the sole responsibility of the owners individually.

ARTICLE IX PLANS AND SPECIFICATIONS

- 9.1 If any plans, drawings, specifications and architectural or engineering assistance become necessary or desirable to enable the Manager to discharge its duties pursuant to this Agreement, and if the Board or its designated representative from time to time authorizes the obtaining of the foregoing, before any expense is incurred therefore, then the cost thereof shall be at the expense of the Corporation.

ARTICLE X BOARD CO-OPERATION

- 10.2 The Board agrees to co-operate with the Manager to the extent required to perform expeditiously, efficiently and economically the Manager's services required under this Agreement and to provide such evidence of authority by way of certified resolution or otherwise and such specific directions as the Manager may reasonably require.

ARTICLE XI LIAISON OFFICER

- 11.1 The Board shall advise the Manager in writing from time to time as required of the names of those officers, directors or other representatives not to exceed two individuals who are authorized to act for and on behalf of the Corporation to enable the Manager to consult with the Board or obtain the Board's approval before proceeding with any work, act or actions. The Board may designate from time to time an individual in addition to the President who shall be authorized to deal with the Manager on any matter relating to the management of the Property, and if such designation is made, the Manager is directed not to accept directions or instructions with regard to the management of the Property from anyone else. In the absence of any designation by the Board, or if a designation is revoked then until another designation is made, the President of the Board shall have sole authority.

ARTICLE XII INDEMNIFICATION

- 12.1 The Manager shall, during and after the term of this Agreement, indemnify and save the Corporation completely free and harmless from any and all damages or injuries to persons or property, or claims, actions, obligations, liabilities, costs, expenses and fees, by reason of the negligence or wilful misconduct of the Manager or any of its employees in the carrying out of the provisions of this Agreement.

ARTICLE XIII
COMPREHENSIVE LIABILITY INSURANCE

- 13.1 The Corporation agrees to take out or authorize the Manager to arrange for comprehensive liability insurance on the property to a limit of not less than $1,000,000.00 inclusive and further agrees that the Manager shall be named as an insured party along with the Corporation as their interest may appear in each such policy or policies which shall provide protection against any claims for personal injury, death or property damage or loss for which either the Corporation or the Manager might be held liable as a result of their respective obligations, and the Corporation further agrees, if so requested, to provide the Manager with a Certificate of insurance from its insurers which shall include an undertaking that the insurer will provide the Manager with at least ten (10) days prior written notice of cancellation or any material change in the provisions of any such policy.

ARTICLE XIV
MISCELLANEOUS

14.1 Deficit Financing

Unless the Board has specifically authorized such procedure, under no circumstances shall the Manager advance funds to the Corporation on a temporary loan basis, whether interest is charged to the Corporation or not, in the event of a cash deficit occurring in the Corporation's current account. The Manager shall notify the Board of any anticipated cash deficit and the Board shall take immediate steps to obtain the necessary funds to cover any such deficit pursuant to the by-laws of the Corporation by either utilizing the Corporations over draft protection if any, levying of a special assessment, the delivery of a revised budget, or the exercise of its borrowing authority on behalf of the Corporation.

14.2 Collection of Accounts Receivable Including Common Expenses.

The Manager, without limiting its covenants as hereinbefore contained, shall, in addition to its covenant to enforce the by-laws of the Corporation as hereinbefore contained, actively pursue the collection of outstanding common expenses from owners and tenants respectively at all times and with a view to reducing these receivables to the lowest minimum monthly balance and without incurring additional cost save in those instances where legal action including the filing of certificates of lien pursuant to the Act is required, It is understood that the Manager shall advise the Board of delinquent accounts and upon the instructions of the Board, the Manager shall arrange with the Corporations solicitor for the registration of a certificate of lien in the appropriate Land Registry Office and the providing of the appropriate notices within three (3) months of the default first occurring by the owner.

In the event that the Manager, after instruction from. the Board, fails to provide proper information, adequate notice, and instructions to the Corporation's solicitors for the registration of a Certificate of Lien covering the arrears of common expenses, interest charges and legal costs within the time specified under the Act resulting in any loss or any additional cost to the Corporation, the Manager shall be directly liable for same to the Corporation.

14.3 Fiduciary Relationships

The Manager may engage any parent or subsidiary corporation affiliated or otherwise connected with it (hereinafter called the "affiliate") to perform any work or services for the Corporation within the scope of Manager's duties under the provisions of this Agreement, without being in breach of any fiduciary relationship with the Corporation, provided the Manager discloses to the Corporation that it intends to engage an affiliate corporation and the Manager has obtained at least two additional quotations from other competent suppliers or contractors who are not affiliates of the Manager and the Board has approved the work or service to be performed by the Manager's affiliate.

14.4 Owner Relationship

- (a) The Manager shall promptly deal with all reasonable queries, requests or complaints by the Board or any owner or mortgagee of a common interest relating to the management of the Property or the duties or obligations of the Manager pursuant hereto, and to record in writing any such queries, requests or complaints and the eventual disposition thereof, and report same to the Board.
- (b) The Manager shall maintain businesslike relations with owners whose service requests relating to the common elements shall be received, considered and recorded in systematic fashion in order to show the action taken with respect to each request. Complaints relating to common elements, the maintenance and repair of which are the responsibility of the Corporation, shall be attended to by the Manager in a prompt and diligent manner.

ARTICLE XV TERMINATION

- 15.1 During the term of this Agreement, either party may at its option, without cause, terminate this Agreement upon sixty (60) days written notice to the other and the Corporation shall pay to the Manager any moneys due to it to the date of termination.
- 15.2 The parties agree that the term of this Agreement shall not be allowed to lapse without notice of termination in writing given by either party to the other not less than sixty (60) days prior to the expiration of the term of this Agreement. Should notice of termination not be given sixty (60) days prior to the expiration of the term of this Agreement, as provided herein, the Agreement shall continue on a month to month basis until terminated, as provided herein, and the Manager's fee shall remain the same until renegotiated.
- 15.3 The parties agree that at the expiration of the term of the Agreement resulting in a renewal, the Manager's fee will be renegotiated with the Corporation within sixty (60) days of the expiration of the original term and the revised and agreed upon fee shall be acknowledged in writing by both parties and shall constitute an amendment to this Agreement.
- 15.4 For a period of twelve (12) months after any termination and for the purpose of settling any dispute or defending any claim made against the Manager, the Corporation shall provide access to the Manager at all reasonable times and upon reasonable notice to all relevant contracts, records, files and other documents or information.
- 15.5 In addition to the rights of the parties to terminate upon notice as hereinbefore set out, the Agreement shall terminate upon the happening of any of the following events:
 - (a) the insolvency or bankruptcy of the Manager;
 - (b) the termination of the Corporation;
 - (c) the Manager is insubordinate, reckless or grossly negligent in performing its duties hereunder.
- 15.6 Upon termination of this Agreement:
 - (a) the Manager shall cease to operate the Corporation's bank account and shall execute all necessary documents in recognition thereof as may be requested by the Corporation or the said bank, and shall as soon as possible thereafter render the final accounting to the Corporation:

- (b) the Manager shall surrender to the Corporation all contracts, records, files, bank accounts and other documents or information which may be pertinent to the continuing operation of the property both paper and electronic form, where available, and further shall maintain on behalf of the Corporation any records, files or information related to the Corporation and stored in the computer of the Manager for a period of twelve (12) months or until such earlier time as the Corporation advises the Manager in writing of its permission to destroy such records;
- (c) the Manager shall turn over all keys to the property in its possession or in the possession of any of its employees. The Manager shall also turn over possession of any area (such as management offices) located on the Property under its control;
- (d) if it has not already done so, the Corporation shall assume the obligation of any and all contracts which the Manager has properly made for the purpose of arranging the services to be provided pursuant to this Agreement except those related to the employees of the Manager and to accounting services; and
- (e) the obligation upon the Manager to account shall survive the termination of this Agreement.

ARTICLE XVI NOTICE

- 16.1 Any notice required to be given by either party to the other shall be sufficiently given if delivered or mailed by prepaid registered post addressed (or faxed or sent by other electronic means if both parties have agreed in writing) to the Corporation at the residence of its President or Vice-President from time to time holding office and to the Manager at Suite 1, 1 Oak Street, Somewhere, Ontario, Z1Z 1Z1, and any such notice shall be conclusively deemed to have been given and received at the time of its personal delivery by one party to an officer or director of the other, or in the event of service by mail, on the next business day after the day of such mailing, provided that if normal mail service is disrupted by reason of strikes, walkouts, slowdowns or other irregularities, then so long as such disruptions exist, any notice required or permitted to be given hereunder shall be delivered personally or otherwise shall be deemed to be ineffective for all purposes hereof. Either party may by notice in writing to the other designate another address to which notices mailed more than ten (10) days after the giving of such notice of change of address shall be addressed.

ARTICLE XVII PARTIAL INVALIDITY

- 17.1 If any portion of this Agreement shall be for any reason declared invalid or unenforceable, the validity of any of the remaining portions of this Agreement shall not be thereby affected, and such remaining portions shall remain in full force and effect as if this Agreement had been executed with such invalid portion eliminated.

ARTICLE XVIII SUCCESSORS AND ASSIGNS

- 18.1 This Agreement shall enure to the benefit of and be binding upon the respective successors and assigns of the parties hereto provided always that this contract may only be assigned with the express written consent of the Corporation.

For the purposes of this paragraph, a sale or disposition of the shares, business or assets of the Manager to another person or firm resulting in a change of control of the Manager shall be deemed to be an assignment of this Agreement requiring the express written consent of the Corporation.

G. SIGNIFICANT FEATURES OF CERTAIN AGREEMENTS

1. Management Agreement Sec. 72(3)(n)

The manager for the corporation is intended to be Somewhere Property Management Ltd. The management agreement (the 'agreement') will be for a one year term commencing on the date of registration of the declaration. It will be terminable on 60 days notice by either party and may be terminated without notice by the corporation for cause. The manager's fee will be $350.00 per month and its responsibilities will be to handle revenue and expenses, arrange and pay insurance, make repairs to and maintain the property and assets, hold reserve funds and manage the corporations accounts, enforce the declaration, bylaw and rules short of litigation, advise the board, maintain the records, supervise employees, engage contractors, arrange all meetings, prepare and send notices, and attend up to 6 board meetings per twelve month period. The manager cannot undertake any work which will cost in excess of $1,000.00 or take longer than one month to complete, or engage any contractor at a cost of in excess of $1,000.00 without board approval. A fidelity bond must be provided by the manager.

2. Insurance Trust Agreement

The insurance trustee for the corporation is intended to be The Bank of Somewhere. The insurance trust agreement will provide for the trustee's administration of insurance monies in accordance with the Act, the declaration and the by-laws of the corporation. The trustee's initial fee will include $500.00 to set up the engagement and $300.00 for the first year's stand-by fee. Subsequent years fees will be $300.00 each unless otherwise arranged. The trustee will be entitled to a variable fee in the event insurance proceeds are administered. This fee will vary from 1% of the first twenty five thousand dollars in proceeds administered, .5% of the next $25,000.00, and .1% of any balance. The minimum charge is $150.00 and additional charges may be made for extraordinary time and effort in special circumstances. The agreement is terminable by either party on 60 days prior notice.

H. AMALGAMATION Sec. 72(3)(o)

To the knowledge of the Declarant the corporation does not intend to amalgamate with another corporation and the Declarant does not intend to cause the corporation to amalgamate with another corporation within 60 days of the date of registration of the declaration and description for the corporation;

I. BUDGET STATEMENT Sec. 72(3)(q)

The following is a copy of the budget statement of the corporation for the one year period following the registration of the declaration and description as described in subsection 72(6) of Regulation 48/01.

Reserve Fund Provisions		$1,800.00
Total Expenses		$19,800.00	$19,800.00

Note: The Common Expenses include property taxes as the common elements are a parcel for tax purposes - Section 15(4)

J. Fees or Charges to be paid by the Corporation to the Declarant Sec. 72(3)(s)

The corporation is not required to pay the declarant or any other person any fees or charges.

H. COMMON INTEREST AND PARCELS OF TIED LANDS Sec. 143

The common interests attach to the respective parcels of tied lands as described in Schedule 'D' to the Declaration. The common interests cannot be severed from the parcels of tied lands upon the sale of the parcel or the enforcement of an encumbrance registered against the parcel.

I. COPY OF SECTIONS 73 AND 74 OF THE ACT Sec. 17(1)(a)

Set out below is a reproduction of section 73 and 74 of the Act:

73. (1) A purchaser who receives a disclosure statement under subsection 72 (1) may, in accordance with this section, rescind the agreement of purchase and sale before accepting a deed to the unit being purchased that is in registerable form. 1998, c. 19, s. 73 (1).

Notice of rescission

(2) To rescind an agreement of purchase and sale under this section, a purchaser or the purchaser's solicitor shall give a written notice of rescission to the declarant or to the declarant's solicitor who must receive the notice within 10 days of the later of,

(a) the date that the purchaser receives the disclosure statement; and

(b) the date that the purchaser receives a copy of the agreement of purchase and sale executed by the declarant and the purchaser. 1998, c. 19, s. 73 (2).

Refund upon rescission

(3) If a declarant or the declarant's solicitor receives a notice of rescission from a purchaser under this section, the declarant shall promptly refund, without penalty or charge, to the purchaser, all money received from the purchaser under the agreement and credited towards the purchase price, together with interest on the money calculated at the prescribed rate from the date that the declarant received the money until the date the declarant refunds it. 1998, c. 19, s. 73 (3).

Material changes in disclosure statement

74. (1) Whenever there is a material change in the information contained or required to be contained in a disclosure statement delivered to a purchaser under subsection 72 (1) or a revised disclosure statement or a notice delivered to a purchaser under this section, the declarant shall deliver a revised disclosure statement or a notice to the purchaser. 1998, c. 19, s. 74 (1).

Definition

(2) In this section,

"material change" means a change or a series of changes that a reasonable purchaser, on an objective basis, would have regarded collectively as sufficiently important to the decision to purchase a unit or proposed unit in the corporation that it is likely that the purchaser would not have entered into an agreement of purchase and sale for the unit or the proposed unit or would have exercised the right to rescind such an agreement of purchase and sale under section 73, if the disclosure statement had contained the change or series of changes, but does not include,

(a) a change in the contents of the budget of the corporation for the current fiscal year if more than one year has passed since the registration of the declaration and description for the corporation,

(b) a substantial addition, alteration or improvement within the meaning of subsection 97 (6) that the corporation makes to the common elements after a turn-over meeting has been held under section 43,

(c) a change in the portion of units or proposed units that the declarant intends to lease,

(d) a change in the schedule of the proposed commencement and completion dates for the amenities of which construction had not been completed as of the date on which the disclosure statement was made, or

(e) a change in the information contained in the statement described in subsection 161 (1) of the services provided by the municipality or the Minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing, as the case may be, as described in that subsection, if the unit or the proposed unit is in a vacant land condominium corporation. 1998, c. 19, s. 74 (2).

Contents of revised statement

(3) The revised disclosure statement or notice required under subsection (1) shall clearly identify all changes that in the reasonable belief of the declarant may be material changes and summarize the particulars of them. 1998, c. 19, s. 74 (3).

Time of delivery

(4) The declarant shall deliver the revised disclosure statement or notice to the purchaser within a reasonable time after the material change mentioned in subsection (1) occurs and, in any event, no later than 10 days before delivering to the purchaser a deed to the unit being purchased that is in registerable form. 1998, c. 19, s. 74 (4).

Purchaser's application to court

(5) Within 10 days after receiving a revised disclosure statement or a notice under subsection (1), a purchaser may make an application to the Superior Court of Justice for a determination whether a change or a series of changes set out in the statement or notice is a material change. 1998, c. 19, s. 74 (5). S.O. 2000, c. 26.

Rescission after material change

(6) If a change or a series of changes set out in a revised disclosure statement or a notice delivered to a purchaser constitutes a material change or if a material change occurs that the declarant does not disclose in a revised disclosure statement or notice as required by subsection (1), the purchaser may, before accepting a deed to the unit being purchased that is in registerable form, rescind the agreement of purchase and sale within 10 days of the latest of,

(a) the date on which the purchaser receives the revised disclosure statement or the notice, if the declarant delivered a revised disclosure statement or notice to the purchaser;

(b) the date on which the purchaser becomes aware of a material change, if the declarant has not delivered a revised disclosure statement or notice to the purchaser as required by subsection (1) with respect to the change; and

(c) the date on which the Superior Court of Justice makes a determination under subsection (5) or

(8) that the change is material, if the purchaser or the declarant, as the case may be, has made an application for the determination. 1998, c. 19, s. 74 (6), S.O. 2000, c. 26.

Notice of rescission

(7) To rescind an agreement of purchase and sale under this section, a purchaser or the purchaser's solicitor shall give a written notice of rescission to the declarant or to the declarant's solicitor. 1998, c. 19, s. 74 (7).

Declarant's application to court

(8) Within 10 days after receiving a notice of rescission, the declarant may make an application to the Superior Court of Justice for a determination whether the change or the series of changes on which the rescission is based constitutes a material change, if the purchaser has not already made an application for the determination under subsection (5). 1998, c. 19, s. 74 (8), S.O. 2000, c. 26.

Refund upon rescission

(9) A declarant who receives a notice of rescission from a purchaser under this section shall refund, without penalty or charge, to the purchaser, all money received from the purchaser under the agreement and credited towards the purchase price, together with interest on the money calculated at the prescribed rate from the date that the declarant received the money until the date the declarant refunds it. 1998, c. 19, s. 74 (9).

Time of refund

(10) The declarant shall make the refund,

- (a) within 10 days after receiving a notice of rescission, if neither the purchaser nor the declarant has made an application for a determination described in subsection (5) or (8) respectively; or
- (b) within 10 days after the court makes a determination that the change is material, if the purchaser has made an application under subsection (5) or the declarant has made an application under subsection (8). 1998, c. 19, s. 74 (10).

J. INTEREST RETENTION

Under subsection 82(8) of the Act, the Declarant is entitled to retain the excess of all interest earned on money held in trust over the interest that it is required to pay the purchaser under section 82 of the Act.

K. VISITORS PARKING

There is no visitor parking provided on the property. Visitors to the property will be guests, invitees, and the like of the Owners and will be required to park on the tied land of the respective owner. For greater certainty but not so as to limit the strictness of the foregoing prohibition, visitors will not be permitted to park at any time on the side of the road or in the parking area associated with the community building.

L. MAJOR ASSETS AND PROPERTY TO BE PROVIDED BY THE DECLARANT

The Declarant has indicated it may provide, even though it is not required to do so, the following major assets and property:

- Refrigerator, stove/oven, dishwasher, microwave oven for the kitchen of the community building;
- Two couches, eight tub chairs, two card tables, three coffee tables, one meeting table with eight chairs, for the community building;
- Poly windscreen netting to cover the tennis fence surrounds;
- Two sets of outdoor patio furniture (table, four chairs, and table umbrella X 2);
- Swimming Pool cover and maintenance tools/appliances.

M. PURCHASES AND SERVICES TO BE ACQUIRED, AGREEMENT ETC. WITH DECLARANT

The corporation is not required to purchase any property, acquire any services, or enter into any agreements or leases with the Declarant or a subsidiary body corporate, holding body corporate or affiliated body corporate of the Declarant.

N. ADJACENT LANDS OF DECLARANT-USE, REPRESENTATIONS, APPLICATIONS

The Declarant directly owns Lots 3 to 12 on Plan M-1234 which are the parcels of tied lands relating to the Property, and Lots 1 and 2 on Plan M-1234 which are located on either side of the Property's access (over Block 2, Plan M-1234) to Oak Street. All of these lands are currently vacant. The Declarant has and continues to represent that Lots 3 to 12 will be used in the future for the sites of individual single-family homes constructed by the respective owner (whether the Declarant or a successor in title), directly or under contract. The Declarant has and continues to represent that Lots 1 and 2 will be used for commercial purposes in the future. The Declarant submitted an application for plan of subdivision approval with respect to Lots 1 to 12 on Plan M-1234 and an application to vary the zoning by-law respecting Lots 3 to 12 to permit them to be used notwithstanding they do not directly abut a public highway. These applications were approved and have been finalized by the registration of the plan of subdivision and becoming final and binding.

Hidden Valley Lakeside Condominiums Inc. and Hidden Valley Resort Development Corporation, plaintiffs (defendants to the counterclaim), and Gregory Vercaigne, Craig Ernest Rubie, Valya Kunynetz, Elayne Nora Phillips, Richard Kenneth Hoffman, Mary Elizabeth Hoffman, Gail Sharkey, Lawrence Lavallo, Stuart Boynton, Gwendolyn Mizuguchi, Peter Zalewski, Janice Zalewski, Stephen Paul Montgomery, Kathryn Ann Montgomery and Dr. Bernard Zinman, defendants (plaintiffs by counterclaim)

Ontario Court of Justice (General Division) Feldman J. October 7, 1997.

Counsel: Karen K.H. Bell, for the plaintiffs, defendants to the counterclaim. David G. Stinson and Stephanie A. Brown, for all the defendants, plaintiffs by counterclaim except for Sharkey and Vercaigne.

[1] FELDMAN J.:-- In 1989 the plaintiffs were owners and developers of resort condominiums adjacent to the Hidden Valley Resort Hotel in Muskoka which was owned by a related company. The defendants purchased condominium units in 1989 and 1990, interim closed and used the units in 1990 and 1991, before rescinding their agreements in the summer of 1991 prior to the October closings. The plaintiffs eventually resold the units, but because of the onset of the recession of the early 1990's, the bottom had dropped out of the market, the value of the units had declined substantially, and the plaintiffs suffered a large loss.

[2] The plaintiffs brought this action for damages for the losses sustained as a result of the defendants' failure to close. The defendants' rescission was based on the alleged failure of the plaintiffs to provide all the promised amenities to the condominiums. The statutory regime set out in the Condominium Act provides disclosure obligations on the vendor of condominium units for residential purposes and that an agreement of purchase and sale is not binding on a purchaser if the vendor materially fails to comply. The issues in this case are:

- (1) Were the Hidden Valley units "for residential purposes"?
- (2) If so, did the plaintiffs comply with the disclosure obligations of s. 52 of the Act?
- (3) If not, was the non-compliance so material that the agreements of purchase and sale were not binding on the purchasers?
- (4) In the alternative, were the defendants induced to enter the agreements by misrepresentations and if so, were they thereby entitled to rescind?

FACTS

[3] At the opening of trial counsel provided the court with all Agreed Statement of Facts. This was then supplemented by the evidence of Mr. Morrison, president of the plaintiffs' parent company as the only witness for them. As well, the defendants and/or their spouses gave evidence, together with their former solicitor and a real estate agent called as an expert witness. Based on all of this evidence, there were very few factual matters in dispute. The real dispute is as to the legal significance of those facts.

[4] The following are agreed facts:

- 1) The Plaintiff, Hidden Valley Resort Development Corporation, was at all material times, the owner, developer, and declarant of a resort condominium project ("Project").
- 2) The Plaintiff, Hidden Valley Lakeside Condominiums Inc., was, at all material times, the builder, marketer, and named vendor of the individual accommodation units in the Project.
- 3) Hidden Valley Resort Development Corporation and Hidden Valley Lakeside Condominiums Inc. ("Hidden Valley") are and were, at all material times, subsidiaries of Encor Inc.
- 4) The Project is located near Huntsville, Ontario on lands legally described as part of lot 33, concession 2, part of a one foot reserve adjoining Valley Road, Plan M419, Township of Chaffey (now town of Huntsville), in the district municipality of Huntsville (being parts 16, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23. and 24 of Plan 35R-8715).
- 5) The Project is the only one in Ontario that is situated on a lakefront (Peninsula Lake) and adjacent to a ski hill (Hidden Valley Highlands).
- 6) The Project is adjacent to a year-round hotel facility ("Hotel") owned by Encor Inc. The Hotel has facilities that include an indoor and outdoor pool, tennis courts, exercise room, squash courts, sauna, whirlpool changerooms, beach waterfront and dining facilities. The Hotel has a single dock. In addition, the surrounding area offers access to skiing, snowmobiling and golfing.
- 7) Hidden Valley originally contemplated a total of 100 units to be built in two stages, with one group of 64 units constructed in six blocks, and another group of 36 units to be later constructed in one block.
- 8) The 64 unit portion of the Project was built in 1990 and was registered as Muskoka Condominium Corporation # 35 on August 20, 1991.
- 9) The 36 unit portion of the Project has never been built.
- 10) Each of the Purchasers agreed to purchase a unit in the Project front Hidden Valley.
- 11) Each of the Agreements of Purchase and Sale executed by each of the Purchasers was essentially identical in form and included certain schedules, including Schedule A being a set of the General Terms and Conditions; Schedule B being a copy of the Site Plan; schedule C being certain features of the particular unit purchased; Schedule D being the town of Huntsville By-law 82-91, as amended by By-law 84-92P; Schedule E being a Financial Information Form completed by the particular purchaser (with the exception of Purchasers Stuart Boynton ("Boynton") and Elayne Phillips ("Phillips") who cannot now recall whether they completed a Schedule E); and Schedule F being the proposed Floor Plan of the particular unit purchased. The Agreements of Purchase and Sale, are as set out at Joint Trial Brief, Volumes 1 and 2.

12) Each such Agreement of Purchase and Sale was accepted by Hidden Valley.

13) After purchasing a unit, each of the purchasers Elayne Phillips, Lawrence Lavallo, Richard Hoffman, Gail Sharkey, Peter and Janice Zalewski, Gwendolyn Misuguchi, and Stuart Boynton selected and paid for certain upgrades to be installed. Such upgrades were, in fact, installed as ordered.

14) Each Purchaser received a package of disclosure materials at or about the time of executing an Agreement of Purchase and Sale.

15) Hidden Valley hired Marijka Lazar ("Lazar"), a licensed real estate agent, to act as sales representative on its behalf with respect to the sale of condominium units in the Project.

16) Each of the Purchasers other than Mary Hoffman met with Lazar on one or more occasions prior to executing all Agreement of Purchase and Sale, either at the Hidden Valley site sales office or at the offices of The Rose Corporation (another Encor Inc. subsidiary) in Toronto.

17) During the marketing of the Project to the Purchasers, the Purchasers were permitted to ask any and all questions and review plans and price lists. 18) As part of the marketing efforts, the Purchasers were shown the Site Plan Schedule "B" which depicted a "future outdoor pool" and boat docking facilities. In addition, the Purchasers were provided with various other promotional brochures which referred to the facilities and amenities that would be available to the Purchasers, including the future outdoor pool and boat docking facilities.

19) Hidden Valley has admitted that Lazar represented or may have represented to Purchasers as follows:

(a) Hidden Valley intended to construct the future outdoor Pool and boat docking facilities, more or less as depicted on the model of the Project and on the Site Plan Schedule "B", and in the promotional materials;

(b) Hidden Valley intended that the Hotel would make available to condominium unit owners the tennis courts, squash courts, and other hotel recreational facilities available to guests of the Hotel for a reasonable fee.

(c) Hidden Valley condominium unit owners would have the option of leasing their units out privately or participating in the Leaseback Program. Lazar represented that unit owners could participate in a leaseback program managed by the Hotel with a net rental split 60% in favour of the accommodation unit owner and 40% in favour of the Hotel. The Purchasers may have been told that the Hotel was very busy and that unit owners could expect that their units would be rented out frequently. Lazar represented that Hidden Valley intended to advertise the availability of condominium units in the Project for lease. She may have represented that conventions at the Hotel would assist in the rental of units in the off-season; and

(d) Hidden Valley intended to upgrade the Hotel and the Hotel facilities so as to give it a significant face lift. Hidden Valley intended the Project would be a high calibre four-season resort providing "resort-style living".

20) The Purchasers completed their interim occupancy closings in 1990 and commenced paying occupancy fees on a monthly basis. Those Purchasers who took occupancy in March 1990 were asked to pay only 50% of the monthly fees for March, April, and May, in recognition of the inconvenience of ongoing site construction.

21) The parties dispute whether all Hotel facilities were made available to Purchasers at the time they took interim occupancy. It is agreed, however, that those Hotel facilities that the parties agree were made available to the Purchasers were provided free of charge from the date of interim occupancy through to the time the Purchasers vacated their units in the fall of 1991.

22) The Purchasers Craig Rubie, Valya Kunynetz, Lawrence Lavallo, Stephen Montgomery, and Janice Zalewski each entered Leaseback Agreements with Hidden Valley.

23) Although the Leaseback Agreements provided for a 60/40 split of net revenue, in fact, those Purchasers who participated in the Leaseback Program were credited with 50% of the gross rental income.

[5] What became clear from the evidence was that these condominiums had been conceived and were marketed based on their proximity to a number of recreational facilities including:

(1) the Hidden Valley ski resort;

(2) Peninsula Lake;

(3) golf courses in the area;

(4) the beauty of Muskoka in all four seasons;

(5) the facilities owned by the Hotel including:

(a) an indoor pool and changerooms;

(b) sauna;

(c) squash courts;

(d) tennis courts;

(e) restaurant;

(f) existing outdoor pool;

(g) beach;

(h) future second outdoor pool;

(i) future new boat docks.

[6] What was also clear at trial was that there was no common understanding either by the plaintiffs themselves or by the defendants as to what was promised to the condominium owners as part of their condominium ownership regarding the access and the basis of access to these facilities.

[7] There was no suggestion in the evidence that anyone believed that the developers had control over any of the first four recreational facilities. However, everyone understood that through intercorporate relationships, the plaintiffs did control the Hotel. Furthermore it was clear that the facilities listed under (5) above were all on the Hotel lands and were not to be part of the common elements of the condominium corporation.

[8] Mr. Morrison explained to the court the developer's concept for the project. Mr. Morrison is a lawyer who practised criminal law for a few years before entering the development business. This was not his first project. I found him to be straightforward and sincere.

[9] He said that they (which I understood to mean the plaintiffs and the owner of the Hotel lands) believed that condominium purchasers were very concerned about ongoing maintenance fees, and that they wanted to keep extra, ongoing costs to a minimum and not be saddled with financial obligations for amenities in which they were not interested. Therefore the Hidden Valley concept was to allow maximum flexibility for the purchasers so that they could opt in to paying for whatever amenities they wanted and not for the ones they did not want.

[10] Therefore from Hidden Valley's perspective, the only binding obligation on the condominium owners and the only right of use they were to have was to the existing outdoor pool and to any other outdoor pools that might be built on the Hotel lands, with the cost of operation to be shared on a proportionate basis with the Hotel. All the other facilities of the Hotel could be accessed in the discretion of the Hotel and again for a proportionate cost sharing between the condominium corporation and the Hotel if that was what the corporation voted to do, or by individual health club fee. Access to Hotel facilities would be through a license from the Hotel. Except for the outdoor pool, the idea was to leave everything loose for the benefit of the purchasers.

[11] From the Hotel's point of view, the concept was that the condominium units could enter the leaseback program where they would be part of a pool of units which the Hotel could access for rental to resort guests and to accommodate conventions. Furthermore, to the extent that the condominium units were sharing facilities with the Hotel, they would pay toward the maintenance, upkeep and replacement of such shared facilities, thereby reducing the financial burden on the Hotel for provision of those facilities.

[12] When the plaintiffs bought the Hidden Valley property in 1988, they developed plans for upgrading and expanding the facilities of the hotel. At that point the hotel was "tired" and needed upgrading of the guest rooms and common areas as well as another outdoor pool, tennis courts, expansion of the indoor pool/sauna area, whirlpool, showers, changerooms, childrens' activity room, fitness area, squash courts, exercise room, and increased docking facilities.

[13] When the plaintiffs marketed the condominium units, the written sales brochures, the project model and the site plan all showed a "future pool" as a second outdoor pool and new boat docks. Purchasers were also told about these features and about the proposed upgrading of the Hotel. Some believed they were told by Ms. Lazar that the second pool was to be exclusively for the condominium owners while others understood that it was to be a second pool to be shared with Hotel guests. This apparent misunderstanding was shared by others associated with the plaintiffs. For example, in a letter to one of the defendants who had interim closed in 1990. Mr. David Smith who was the Hotel manager at the time, wrote that "the swimming pool scheduled to be built for use by Condominium Owners" would not be ready that summer and therefore they could use the Hotel pool until "your pool" was ready.

[14] Mr. Morrison told the court that Hidden Valley was "committed" to build the second pool and always intended to build it, although technically it was not obliged to do so. It would decide the timing, based on demand and need. Because of the recession, occupancy of the hotel was down in 1991, and there was already a lot of construction on the site, so by the closing date they had not built the second pool.

[15] With respect to the boat docks, Mr. Morrison said that he considered that they had a similar commitment to build them and they always intended to do so. The existing boat dock facility was not large enough to accommodate residents with boats that needed assigned slip space. However, the anticipated new docks as shown in their various representations were also not intended to be sufficient in number for every condominium owner to have a permanent slip for a boat. Nevertheless, based on their discussions with Ms. Lazar, those purchasers who owned a boat expected to have convenient boat docking facilities and arrangements to accommodate them with the new docks.

[16] The purchasers understood that the second pool and boat docks were to be built. They also were told by Ms. Lazar that they would be able to use the indoor facilities of the hotel. Some believed these were to be provided without charge, while others said they were told that the charge would be very low.

[17] The plaintiffs believed that these units were not "for residential purposes" within the meaning of the Condominium Act because the resort was zoned commercial, so that they did not need to provide the disclosure statement required by s. 52 of the Act. However, based on legal advice as to an abundance of caution, the plaintiffs did provide purchasers with all the documentation required for residential units and in particular the Disclosure Statement required by s. 52 of the Act, together with the budget statement, the declaration, management agreement, insurance agreement, and all proposed by-laws of the corporation including the draft Reciprocal Agreement between the corporation and the Hotel.

RELEVANT PORTIONS OF DOCUMENTS

[18] Portions of these documents must be set out here in detail as they are the written agreement between the parties on the issues in dispute. The following quoted portions are of the documents which were provided to the defendants when they entered into their agreements to purchase in 1989 (exhibit 14).

1. AGREEMENT OF PURCHASE AND SALE

1(a) The Purchaser hereby offers to purchase:

(i) Accommodation Unit ____, Level ____, (the "Unit"), as shown on Schedule "B" attached hereto, finished in accordance with the specifications and conditions, set out in Schedule "C" attached hereto, together with an undivided interest in the common elements appurtenant to such Accommodation Unit in accordance with a proposed description to be registered as a condominium plan with respect to the Building and the Lands (both as defined in Schedule "A"), at a purchase price of ____ (the "Purchase Price"), as adjusted pursuant to the provisions of this Agreement.

[20] Schedule B is the site plan for the project and was attached to each agreement of purchase and sale and is included as an Appendix to this judgment. It shows the condominium lands with the condominium units as well as the Hotel lands, the Hidden Valley Highlands Ski Area and Peninsula Lake. It also depicts on the Hotel lands, the Hotel, the pool and tennis courts as well as the "future pool" and, in the lake, the "boat docking" which is not similar to the old existing docks.

GENERAL TERMS AND CONDITIONS (SCHEDULE "A")

25. ... It is agreed and understood that there is no representation, warranty, collateral agreement, or condition affecting this Agreement, the Accommodation Unit, the Building or the Lands or supported hereby other than as expressed herein in writing whether contained in any sales marketing brochure alleged to be said or represented by any sales representative or agent, or otherwise.

29. The Purchaser should not [sic(note)] that the relevant by-law of The Corporation of the Town of Huntsville, being By-Law 82-91 as amended by By-Law 84-92P is attached hereto as Schedule "D" in the form approved by the Ontario Municipal Board. The purchaser is advised to seek legal advice as to the effect of this By-Law upon the Purchaser's intended use of the premises.

Purchaser understands and acknowledges that the relevant by-law of the Corporation of the Town of Huntsville provides in part that:

"Character of Uses:

(i) Accommodation Units: commercial character, turnover frequency capability exceeds 12 times per year: ..."

The Purchaser agrees to ensure that he or she complies with all relevant Federal, Provincial and Municipal laws.

30. RECIPROCAL AGREEMENT The Purchaser acknowledges that the Condominium Corporation will be under a duty to enter into an Agreement or Agreements (the "Reciprocal Agreement") with Hidden Valley Resort Hotel limited and Hidden Valley Resort Development Corporation which will govern the rights and liabilities of the Condominium Corporation and Hidden Valley Resort Development Corporation and/or Hidden Valley Resort Hotel Limited, and/or a future condominium corporation on the property adjoining the Lands, and the occupants of Accommodation Units in that condominium corporation with respect to the integrated use, operation, repair, reconstruction (if necessary), and maintenance of certain shared facilities including proposed outdoor swimming pools, driveways, roadways and servicing systems with respect to matters which may include, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, provisions relating to: the payment or allocation of taxes or similar governmental charges, the sharing of costs related to insurance, utilities and costs relating to the operation, maintenance and repair in respect of the shared facilities; reciprocal remedies to meet circumstances of the failure of any party to fulfil any obligations pursuant to the Reciprocal Agreement; obligations for maintenance and repair and provisions for failure to make such maintenance and repair; arrangements with respect to the rebuilding of the shared facilities in case of damage or destruction recognizing the statutory rights of condominium unit owners to elect not to rebuild; provisions setting out the cost sharing and maintenance and repair responsibilities in respect of such shared facilities; the securing by lien of the payments required pursuant to the Reciprocal Agreement; and other matters of mutual concern.

The Purchaser covenants and agrees that he shall consent to, approve of and shall not object to the execution and registration of the Reciprocal Agreement if required by the Vendor. The Purchaser hereby irrevocably nominates, constitutes and appoints the Vendor as his agent and attorney in fact and in law to execute any consents or other documents required by the Vendor to give effect to this paragraph. The Purchaser hereby confirms and agrees that this Power of Attorney may be exercised by the Vendor during any subsequent legal incapacity of the Purchaser. The Purchaser covenants and agrees that he shall execute and deliver to the Vendor on the Occupancy Date, the undertaking, covenant and agreement of the Purchaser to be prepared by the Vendor for the benefit of the Vendor and the owners from time to time of the Hotel Lands, whereby the Purchaser agrees, inter alia, that:

(i) the Purchaser shall exercise his right to vote and shall otherwise cause the condominium corporation and its Board of Directors to comply with and perform all of the Condominium Corporation's obligations and covenants under the Reciprocal Agreement, and pay all amounts required to be paid by the Condominium Corporation under the terms of the Reciprocal Agreement;

(ii) the Purchaser shall obtain and deliver to the Vendor the same undertaking and agreement from any subsequent purchaser of the property; and,

(iii) the Purchaser shall comply with and be bound by the Reciprocal Agreement, the Declaration, the By-laws and the Rules of the Condominium Corporation.

2. THE DECLARATION

The declarant is Hidden Valley Resort Development Corporation.

Definitions

"Hotel" or the "Hotel Lands" means those lands located on lands adjacent to the land described in Schedule "A" attached hereto and being described as _____.

"Reciprocal Agreement" means a certain Agreement or Agreements to be entered into between the Corporation, the owner of the Hotel lands and the owner of the adjacent 36 Unit Condominium Corporation Lands, which agreement or Agreements shall govern the rights and liabilities of the parties thereto, including but without limiting the generality of the foregoing, terms and provisions relating to the integrated use, operation, maintenance, cost sharing and repair of certain shared services area, facilities and equipment as defined and more particularly set out therein.

3.01 Meaning of Common Expenses

Common expenses means the expenses of the performance of the objects and duties of the Corporation, and without limiting the generality of the foregoing, such other expenses, costs and sums of money designated as common expenses in the act, or in this declaration, and specifically includes those expenses as set forth in Schedule "E" attached hereto. [Schedule "E" (d) provides: The Corporation's proportionate or allocated share of the costs of operating, maintaining, repairing, servicing, replacing and inspecting the Shared Facilities, all as more fully, described and set forth in the reciprocal Agreement unless such allocations or responsibilities are further adjusted, qualified or amended pursuant to any provisions of the reciprocal Agreement in which event the readjustment or qualified or amended adjustments shall prevail.]

[22] Schedule A is the description of the condominium lands "together with the following easements":

(a) Pedestrian ingress and egress for the use and enjoyment of the Outdoor Swimming Pools to be located upon the Hotel Lands.

(c) Easements over the Hotel Lands for installing, repairing, maintaining, inspecting and altering underground hydro wires and cables, storm and sanitary sewer pipes, electrical conduits and cables, television cables, and telephone lines, water and gas lines, and lawn sprinkler equipment.

and "subject to the following easements":

(b) A pedestrian right of way in favour of The 36 Unit Condominium Corporation for access to the Outdoor Swimming Pools which are situate on the Hotel Lands.

(e) An easement in favour of the Hotel Owner and the 36 Unit Condominium Corporation for pedestrian access to and use of a Shared Beach Area located on The 64 Unit Condominium Lands.

[23] Schedule "C" sets out the boundaries of the "accommodation units" but refers to them as "each residential unit". Schedule "F" also refers to exclusive use items for each unit and again refers to them as "each residential unit".

[24] By Law No. 2 of the Condominium Corporation compels the condominium corporation to enter into the Reciprocal Agreement.

3. RECIPROCAL AGREEMENT

THIS AGREEMENT IS BASED UPON THE FOLLOWING FACTS:

A. The 64 Unit Condominium Corporation is a condominium corporation situated in the Town of Huntsville, in the District Municipality of Muskoka, designated as Parts _____, on Reference Plan. _____ registered in the Land Registry Office of the Land Titles Division of _____ (No. __) as described in Schedule "A" hereto (which lands are hereinafter collectively referred to as the "The 64 Unit Condominium Corporation Lands"):

B. The 64 Unit Condominium Corporation Owners hold legal title to all the units and their appurtenant common interests, as are described in Schedule "A" attached hereto, and are entering into this Agreement to obtain the benefits of and assume certain of the obligations and restrictions contained in this Agreement as set forth herein as appurtenant to all such units and their appurtenant common interests as are described in Schedule "A" attached hereto;

C. The 36 Unit Condominium Corporation Owner owns The 36 Unit Condominium Corporation Lands as described in Schedule "B" attached hereto;

D. Hotel Owner owns the Hotel Lands as described in Schedule "C" attached hereto;

E. The within parties are entering into this Agreement to facilitate and provide for the mutual management and operation of the Shared Facilities which serve The 64 Unit Condominium Corporation Lands, The 36 Unit condominium Corporation Lands and/or the Hotel Lands (as hereinafter defined); to establish a program for the sharing of certain costs of the operation, use, servicing, maintaining, repair and/or replacement of the Shared Facilities, and of certain other mutually shared costs; to define which costs and which responsibilities and obligations for which each of the owners of The 64 Unit Condominium Corporation Lands. The 36 Unit Condominium Corporation Lands and the Hotel will be solely responsible; to confirm certain easements and rights; and for the other related and incidental matters set forth herein.

Definitions:

(f) "Outdoor Swimming Pools" shall mean those lands designated as Parts ___ on Reference Plan No. __ R-___;

(h) "Shared Beach Area" shall mean those parts of Muskoka Condominium Plan No. ___ designated as Parts ___ on Reference Plan No. __ R-___;

(i) "Shared Facilities" means those facilities in respect of which the operation, repair, maintenance, servicing, use and/or replacement, or the cost thereof is shared pursuant to the terms of this Agreement, and includes the Vehicular and Pedestrian Easement areas. The 64 Unit Condominium Corporation Servicing Areas. The 36 Unit Condominium Corporation Servicing Areas, and The Hotel Lands Servicing Areas as defined herein;

(j) The "Shared Facilities Costs" shall mean the costs of the operation, maintenance, servicing, repair, use and/or replacement of the Shared Facilities, the cost of insurance allocated in respect of the Shared Facilities and any other costs or expenses which are allocated to a party to this Agreement pursuant to any provision of this Agreement;

4. DISCLOSURE STATEMENT

[26]

2. GENERAL DESCRIPTION OF THE PROPOSED CONDOMINIUM PROJECT

General Description of the Property and Types and Numbers of Buildings

The six (6) proposed condominium buildings (the "Buildings"), now designated as Blocks B through G, will be located adjacent to the existing Hidden Valley Resort Hotel (the "Hotel") or the "Hotel Lands", in the Town of Huntsville, in the District Municipality of Muskoka and being composed of part of lands described as Part of Lot 33, Concession 2, part of a one foot reserve adjoining Valley Road, Plan M419, Township of Chaffey (now Town of Huntsville in the District Municipality of Huntsville, being part of Parts 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23 and 24, Plan 35R-8715. The Buildings will contain sixty-four (64) condominium "Accommodation Units" (as more particularly described and defined in By-Law 82-91, as amended, of the Corporation of the Town of Huntsville), a copy of which is attached hereto as Schedule "B".

NOTE: See attached Map for a visual representation of the location of the property.

The division of the sixty-four (64) Accommodation Units among the Buildings will be as follows: (a) Blocks E, F, and G will contain a total of twenty-four (24) conventional townhouse Accommodation Units (E-8, F-8, G8) with surface parking (one space per Accommodation Unit);

(b) Block C will contain seven (7) one level Accommodation Units directly under seven (7) three storey Accommodation Units in a "stacked townhouse" configuration, with enclosed garage parking (one space per Accommodation Unit) under the stacked Accommodation Units:

(c) Block D will contain eighteen (18) Accommodation Units comprising nine (9) two storey Accommodation Units directly under nine (9) one storey with mezzanine Accommodation Units in a "stacked townhouse" configuration, with enclosed garage parking (one space per Accommodation Unit) under the stacked Accommodation Units; and,

(d) Block B will contain a total of eight (8) Accommodation Units comprising four (4) one storey with lower level walk-out Accommodation Units, two of which are under two (2) two storey Accommodation Units, and the other two of which are under (2) two storey with mezzanine Accommodation Units, in a "stacking townhouse" configuration with surface parking (one space per Accommodation Unit).

The area of the site upon which the Buildings will be located, is approximately 198,000 square feet (approximately 18,400 square metres), with the Buildings occupying part of that area.

The proposed Condominium property will be adjacent to the existing Hidden Valley Resort Hotel.

Each Accommodation Unit will have the exclusive use of:

(i) a parking space:

(ii) a balcony or balconies to which the Accommodation Unit provides direct and sole access; and

(iii) an electrical or mechanical equipment pad.

As well certain Accommodation Units (Accommodation Units 1 - 4 and 21 - 44 on Level 1) will have the exclusive use of a patio.

The owner or owners of the Hotel Lands will have architectural control over the exterior of the Buildings and, will retain architectural control over any modifications to the exterior of the Buildings and upon reconstruction, in the even of destruction of the Buildings.

There will be a total of approximately ninety (90) common element parking spaces. Each of the sixty-four (64) Accommodation Units will have the exclusive use of one (1) of these parking spaces. The remaining twenty-six (26) parking spaces will be designated as visitor parking for use of visitors and guests to the Accommodation Units.

The 36 Unit Condominium and the Possible 100 Unit Condominium It is anticipated that there will be a second condominium corporation (the "36 Unit Condominium") on land adjacent to this land and Unit forming part of the 64 Unit Condominium, which will consist of either:

- (i) one (1) building containing thirty-six (36) two (2) bedroom "walk-up" apartments (also Accommodation Units); or,
- (ii) thirty-six (36) stacked townhouse Accommodation Units.

In either case, there will be at least fifty (50) parking spaces, some of which will be enclosed garage parking spaces and some of which will be surface parking spaces.

The area of the site upon which the building comprising the 36 Unit Condominium will be located, is approximately 49,600 square feet (approximately 4,600 square metres) with the building occupying part of that area.

Therefore, the total area of the site in respect of both condominium corporations is approximately 247,600 square feet (approximately 23,000 square metres).

It is possible that the declarant may decide to combine the 64 Accommodation Units in the 64 Unit Condominium and the 36 Accommodation Units in the 36 Unit Condominium to create one large condominium corporation containing 100 Accommodation Units (referred to herein as the "100 Unit Condominium Corporation").

The main body of this disclosure statement has been prepared on the assumption that there will be two condominium corporations. However, purchasers should refer to Schedule "C" attached hereto which explains many of the material differences in this disclosure statement and the accompanying documents if in fact the declarant proceeds to register the 100 Unit Condominium, instead of registering the 64 Unit Condominium and the 36 Unit Condominium.

Due to the inter-relationship between the Hotel Lands, the 36 Unit Condominium and the 64 Unit Condominium, various easements, licenses and/or rights of way will be required to be granted between the Hotel Lands, the 36 Unit Condominium and/or the 64 Unit Condominium over and in respect of various parts of the site and the adjacent Hotel Lands, as may be necessary and/or desirable

For example, it anticipated that title to the 64 Unit Condominium may be subject to certain easements, including, but not limited to; sanitary sewers and water mains and any shared services generally; easements required for the construction, repair and maintenance or utility lines, cables and conduits for telephone, cable television and transmission lines and ally other similar services; easements for ingress to and egress from the Hotel Lands, the 36 Unit condominium and any shared use areas; casements for the purposes of access.

Furthermore, it is anticipated that the 64 Unit Condominium will enjoy similar casements over the Hotel Lands and/or the 36 Unit Condominium, if and as may be necessary or desirable.

It is also anticipated that there will be easements granted over the 64 Unit Condominium lands for the purposes of the provision of municipal services pursuant to development and/or subdivision agreements entered into between the Declarant and the relevant governmental authorities.

For example, the District of Muskoka will require right of access by registered easement to any utility corridors provided for water and sewer purposes within the proposed Buildings.

Types and Numbers of Accommodation Units

There will be sixty-four (64) condominium Accommodation Units (more particularly described and defined as "Accommodation Units" in By-Law 82-91, as amended, of the Corporation of the Town of Huntsville).

At the present time it is anticipated that there will be approximately seven (7) one bedroom Accommodation Units, nine (9) two bedroom Accommodation Units, forty-four (44) three bedroom Accommodation Units and four (4) four bedroom Accommodation Units. Please note however that Purchasers of the three bedroom Accommodation Units are being offered the option of upgrading their Accommodation Unit by the addition of a fourth bedroom in the loft.

The Declarant reserves the right to decrease the number of Accommodation Units in the 64 Unit Condominium, and/or vary the unit mix and the size of the area within the various Accommodation Units.

Prospective Accommodation Unit purchasers should note that the relevant by-law of The Corporation of the Town of Huntsville, being By-Law 82-91 as amended by By-Law 84-92P is attached hereto as Schedule "B" in the form approved by the Ontario Municipal Board. Purchasers are advised to seek legal advice as to the effect of this By-Law upon that Purchaser's intended use of the premises. Purchasers should note that the said By-Law provides in part as follows:

"Character of Uses: i) Accommodation Units: commercial character, turnover frequency capability exceeds 12 times per year: ..."

Accommodation Unit purchasers should note that in that the definition of Accommodation Unit includes a turnover frequency capability exceeding twelve (12) times per year, the other Accommodation Units will be occupied by non-owners from time to time. Furthermore, it is intended that the declarant or a related corporation or corporations will make available its services as exclusive managing agent for some or all of the Accommodation Unit owners who wish to avail themselves of such services. In essence, this voluntary arrangement will be for the purposes of making the Accommodation Units available for rental to non-owner guests on a short term basis.

Accommodation Unit purchasers must ensure that they comply with all relevant Federal, Provincial and Municipal laws.

Recreational and Other Amenities

The following Recreational and other amenities will be available to Accommodation Unit owners:

1. It is anticipated that the Accommodation Unit owners of the 64 Unit Condominium Corporation, together with their families and guests, will have the right to use an outdoor swimming pool or pools which use will be shared with the Accommodation Unit owners of the 36 Unit Condominium, together with their families and guests and with the guests of the Hotel. This swimming pool or pools will be located on the Hotel Lands, however the costs of the operation, maintenance and repair of this swimming pool or pools will be shared by the 64 Unit Condominium Corporation, the 36 Unit Condominium and the Hotel and will be dealt with in the Reciprocal Agreement. The use of the swimming pool or pools may be subject to such reasonable rules concerning their use as may be determined by the owner of the Hotel Lands from time to time in its sole discretion. 2. Subject to the discretion of the Hotel Owner from time to time, condominium Accommodation Unit owners, their families and guest may have reasonable right of passage over, but not the recreational or other use of designated beachfront areas which form part of the Hotel Lands, and such right of passage and/or use may be subject to rules and/or user fees imposed by the Hotel Owner from time to time in its sole discretion.

3. The lakefront area adjacent to the 64 Unit Condominium Lands (to the high water mark only) will be part of the common elements of the 64 Unit Condominium, the use of part of which may be shared with the owners of the 36 Unit Condominium, their families and guests and with guests of the Hotel, subject to such reasonable rules as the 64 Unit Condominium Corporation may pass with respect to the use of this area.

4. NOTE: There will be additional recreational facilities and equipment on the Hotel Lands which will be for the use of Hotel guests and which may be available for the use of Accommodation Unit owners. It should be noted however that the final determination of the use that Condominium Accommodation Unit owners, their families and guests will have of these facilities, and/or any fees for the use thereof, will be in the sole discretion of the owner of the Hotel Lands (from time to time) and that such use may not be available from time to time or at all. For example, at the present time, it is anticipated that Accommodation Unit owners, their families and guests, will have access to and the use of tennis courts and a boat docking area located on the Hotel Lands, subject to such rules regarding the access to and the use thereof, and such fees for the access to and the use thereof as the Hotel Owner may determine from time to time in its sole discretion, however this is subject to change in the sole discretion of the Hotel Owner.

Conditions that Apply to the Provision of Amenities

Other than as may be set out in this disclosure statement, at the present time, the only conditions that apply to the provision of amenities are the compliance with the Condominium Act, the Declaration, By-Laws and Rules of the 64 Unit Condominium and the Reciprocal Agreement, however the Declarant reserves the right to set further conditions for the provision of amenities.

4. SCHEDULE OF PROPOSED COMMENCEMENT AND COMPLETION DATE OF AMENITIES

It is anticipated that the commencement date of the construction of amenities will be on or before August 1, 1989, and the completion date for the construction of amenities will be on or before December 31, 1990.

5. BRIEF NARRATIVE DESCRIPTION OF THE SIGNIFICANT FEATURES OF THE PROPOSED DECLARATION, BY-LAWS AND RULES AND ACCOMMODATION UNITS, AND OF ANY TO TERMINATION OR EXPIRATION UNDER SECTION 39 OF THE CONDOMINIUM ACT

Proposed By-Law No. 2 Proposed By-Law No. 2 authorizes, ratifies, sanctions and confirms the terms and conditions of the Reciprocal Agreement and authorizes its execution by the appropriate corporate officer.

The Condominium Corporation will be under a duty to enter into an Agreement or Agreements (the "Reciprocal Agreement") with Hidden Valley Resort Hotel Limited, the owner of the Hotel Lands and of the land upon which the 36 Unit Condominium will be built, which will govern the rights and liabilities of the Condominium Corporation, the owner of the 36 Unit Condominium Lands (and the 36 Unit Condominium when it comes into existence) and the owner of the Hotel Lands with respect to the integrated use, operation, repair, servicing and maintenance of certain shared areas, facilities, services and/or equipment (referred to therein as the "Shared Facilities"), with respect to matters which may include, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, provisions relating to: the equitable sharing of costs relating to the operation, maintenance use, servicing, replacement, repair and insuring the Shared Facilities; the confirming and/or granting of easements and/or rights-of-way for such matters as the provision of services, repair and maintenance of services and of the property and/or access; architectural control by the Hotel Owner over the exterior of the Buildings; reciprocal remedies to meet circumstances of the failure of any party to fulfil any obligations pursuant to the Reciprocal Agreement; obligations for maintenance and repair in respect of the Shared Facilities and provisions for failure to make such maintenance and repair; the securing by lien of the payments required pursuant to the Reciprocal Agreement; conditions as to the use of the Shared Facilities; and other matters of mutual concern.

FACTS AFTER THE AGREEMENTS OF PURCHASE AND SALE

[27] After the units were constructed during 1990, the purchasers completed their interim occupancy closings, began paying monthly occupancy fees, and were granted access to all existing and operating hotel recreational facilities at no charge. The new pool and docks were not constructed but the developer still intended to do so. A small and very informal steering committee of purchasers was formed to meet with the representative of the developer. Brian Hoyes, to address various matters relating to the development.

[28] In 1991 Mr. Hoyes convened a series of meetings with the purchasers and with the steering committee to provide status information with respect to the project and to discuss certain changes to it. At the first meeting on February 27, 1991 Mr. Hoyes advised purchasers that construction of an additional outdoor pool on Hotel lands was still contemplated, but its location and construction date were not fixed. He also told them that the Ministry of Natural Resources had refused a permit for construction of the new boat docks so that the developer would not be proceeding with those.

[29] In April 1991 Anne Kavander, the onsite representative of the developer to deal with day to day matters with condominium purchasers wrote to the purchasers with respect to the second pool that "some owners have expressed the view that something else of equivalent value would add more value to the property", and suggested a three- part plan for consideration which included enlarging and refurbishing the change rooms in the Hotel, improving the landscaping including a barbecue pit, and returning some money to existing purchasers on closing.

[30] At the next meeting of purchasers on May 28, 1991 Mr. Hoyes confirmed that there would be no new boat docking facilities and discussed the three part plan to replace the second outdoor pool. He also told the purchasers that the agreement documents did not oblige the developer to build the second pool or docks. He also discussed the proposed cost for purchasers to access the Hotel recreational facilities after closing on a cost sharing basis. Mr. Hoyes suggested that the condominium owners would pay 40% of the costs of maintenance and upkeep of the recreational facilities including the pools, sauna, squash courts etc., which worked out to approximately $40,000 for the condominium corporation or $ 1,000 per unit, and that there would be a clause to ensure continued access to the facilities if the hotel were to be sold. In lieu of the second outdoor pool, Mr. Hoyes suggested that there be more landscaping and a payment by the developer of $20,000 to be divided among the owners.

[31] In other words, at the same time the developer's representative was telling the purchasers that Hidden Valley had no legal, contractual obligation to construct a second pool or additional boat docks, in lieu of constructing that pool the developer was offering compensation to the condominium owners in the form of extra amenities and cash. It is unclear why the developer got so deeply involved in proposals to replace the second pool rather than just building it, except that unit sales had come to a standstill and the recession was setting in. After this meeting, the promotional material for the unsold units no longer referred to a future pool or new docks.

[32] At the same meeting, another representative of Hidden Valley. Mr. Whittaker, advised the purchasers that because the market had dropped, the developers unsold units would be offered for sale at a price reduction of 30% to 40%.

[33] Many of the purchaser/defendants testified that when they entered into their agreements they understood that Hidden Valley was obliged to build the second outdoor pool and the additional boat dock's, so that the information at this meeting was contrary to their understanding. Furthermore they were now uncertain as to their rights of access to Hotel facilities and the cost to them of such access. As a result of this meeting an owners' committee was formed to meet with Mr. Hoyes and discuss options with respect to access to facilities and with respect to the pool. In the meantime some purchasers were organizing on their own to consider their options in light of the situation. It was clear on the evidence that the decline in the market value of the condominiums was one major catalyst for this movement together with the new position being taken by the developer with respect to amenities.

[34] The owners' committee held three meetings with Mr. Hoyes in June 1991, the third on June 18. At one of then, Mr. Hoyes provided a new draft Reciprocal Agreement to the committee members which refers to only one outdoor pool and clearly sets out the rights of access of the condominium owners to that pool and to other Hotel facilities and the cost sharing arrangements therefor. It is a substantially different document in that regard from the form of Reciprocal Agreement provided to the purchasers as part of the disclosure documents.

[35] Mr. Hoyes prepared and distributed a memorandum of June 19, which purports to summarize the proposal put forward by the majority of the committee and its recommendation to all purchasers, although in their testimony, some of the committee members denied that they were truly agreeable to the proposal. The memorandum goes on to say that if the summary is correct then Mr. Hoyes would obtain the developer's official response, then hold a meeting to have all owners confirm the proposal. This proposal refers to a new Reciprocal Agreement providing access to certain Hotel facilities but not others, for $34,000. per year (down from $40,000. at the May 28 meeting), but with no responsibility on the owners for repairs or replacement of those facilities: the Reciprocal Agreement would be registered on the title to the Hotel and the condominium: the developer would refurbish the change rooms to the sauna and whirlpool as part of the shared facilities: the developer would contribute $20,000 to the condominium corporation plus pay the first year amenities fee, although the committee wanted a $24,000 contribution: the committee wanted the developer to expand the deck around the outdoor pool; the committee wanted the developer to seek permission for two floating long narrow docks (these are lesser docks than the ones contemplated when the agreements were entered into) and to supply them. The last point in the memo provides:

All of the foregoing will be implemented without the addition of a future pool for the exclusive use of condominium owners. Although the developer did not intend to oblige itself to provide any additional outdoor pool, it would agree to provide the additional items requested above at its expense as a goodwill gesture in recognition that many owners believed another pool would be constructed. Owners will acknowledge that this arrangement represents a compromise to settle the additional pool issue.

[36] By mistake Mr. Hoyes sent the memorandum to the Zalewski's who were not members of the committee. Mr. Zalewski faxed a concerned response to Anne Kavander as requested in the memo and in response, Mr. Hoyes sent a further letter to them on June 24. In that letter Mr. Hoyes includes the following:

It is clear from the disclosure statement that owners are obliged to share costs for the outdoor pool and the waterfront as well as maintaining certain easements over Hotel lands. Currently condominium owners have no right to use the indoor pool, tennis courts and other hotel amenities. In 1991, the estimated share of those costs that the condominium corporation would pay would run around $23,500.00. The condominium would be obliged to pay its share of repair and replacement costs as well.

An additional future outdoor pool used solely by the condominium would cost approximately $ 19,000 per year to maintain and operate, all of which would fall on the condominium corporation. Total annual costs in 1991 terms would thus run around $42,000.

The reference to no rights to use the other amenities must be meant to refer to after closing because for the interim occupancy period, the condominium purchasers were allowed to use all the Hotel facilities at no charge.

[37] On July 5 Mr. Hoyes sent a letter to all the purchasers enclosing a document entitled "Summary" containing a more detailed explanation of the June 19 memorandum and inviting them to a meeting on July 11 to discuss it. The Summary referred to a Disclosure Statement of May 28, 1991 delivered to all owners, however there was no such document delivered. The plaintiffs had an Addendum to Disclosure Statement dated May 31, 1991, which reflected the Hoyes' meetings to date, but it had not been distributed. The Summary was subsequently amended to refer to the original Disclosure Statement of 1989, and redistributed.

[38] The Summary offers to purchasers the full package of everything the committee was shown as wanting in the June 19 memorandum. A rationale for this proposal is set out as well. It points out that at the last owners' meeting (May 28) the developer had proposed a sharing of all amenities including the costs of repair and replacement on a 60/40 split with the hotel paying 60%, and that "an average outdoor pool for use by the condominium would cost approximately $ 19,000 to operate in 1991 ... All of the operating cost would fall on the condominium if a pool were built." I note that although Mr. Morrison was very clear in his testimony that the future additional outdoor pool which Hidden Valley always intended to construct on the Hotel lands was for the use of both the hotel guests and the condominium owners, by this time at least Mr. Hoyes was discussing the future pool as a pool only for the condominium owners.

[39] The final part of the Summary lists the benefits of this new proposal: no liability on the condominium owners for repair and maintenance costs (earlier in the Summary the reference was to "repair and replacement costs"), a fixed fee, deeded access to amenities, enhancements to the facilities by the developer, covers the bulk of Hotel facilities, access to the indoor pool, but any future pool to be at the developer's discretion.

[40] In the meantime, in late June one of the purchasers. Mr. Boynton, had written to the others expressing his concern that the developer had greatly reduced the price of the remaining unsold units and suggesting that they all form an alliance. In response to both that suggestion and the correspondence from the developer through Mr. Hoyes, the purchasers had arranged their own meeting for the same night. July 11. Very few purchasers showed up at Mr. Hoyes' meeting. At their own meeting they decided to retain a lawyer to help them, address their concerns including the pool, the boat docks, access to hotel amenities, and the reduced value of the property plus others.

[41] Upon receipt of the Summary, one of the purchasers, Mr. Zinman, consulted a lawyer who wrote to the developer rescinding his agreement on the basis that the Summary constituted a material amendment to the Disclosure Statement. As a result, Hidden Valley became very concerned and in particular. Mr. Morrison began to take a hands-on involvement in the issues surrounding the negotiations with purchasers. A letter was written from Mr. Hoyes to all purchasers withdrawing the Summary and advising that Hidden Valley would now "proceed literally in accordance with the disclosure statement distributed to each of you at the time you agreed to purchase your unit."

[42] By letter dated August 22, 1991 to Cassels Brock, solicitors for Hidden Valley, Mr. Michael Spears, a lawyer retained by several purchasers including all of the defendants except Mrs. Phillips at that time, advised Hidden Valley that the disclosure statement provided to the purchasers violates s. 52 of the Condominium Act, and therefore the agreements of purchase and sale were not binding. Consequently he demanded return of their deposits with interest and suggested they agree on a date for vacant possession.

[43] Hidden Valley responded in a letter of August 27 requesting particulars of the problems with the disclosure, statement, expressing surprise at the tone of the letter when Hidden Valley had been negotiating with the purchasers to try to reach an acceptable arrangement with them over amenities, and advising that Hidden Valley expected the purchasers to live up to their agreements.

[44] Mr. Spears sent a detailed letter in response the next day setting out three areas of deficiency in the disclosure material: (1) no full and accurate disclosure of amenities in the disclosure statement and reciprocal agreement because the pools and docks promised in pre-purchase literature and in the site plan had not materialized, and the references to amenities in the disclosure documentation were contradictory and confusing and did not make the same promises as the literature: (2) the budget statement required by s. 52(7) of the Act does not include the cost of amenities: (3) the reciprocal agreement is not summarized in the disclosure statement but merely attached to it, with schedule "D" too incomplete to be meaningful. Furthermore, the May, 1991 revised draft reciprocal agreement make changes, but then in Mr. Hoyes last letter, the developer said that it would now proceed in accordance with the original disclosure statement.

[45] Because of this mass rescission by purchasers, Hidden Valley was now very concerned about its closings, and on September 4, Mr. Morrison called Mr. Spears to try to determine the real substance of the complaints of the purchasers. Mr. Spears indicated that there were only three issues of importance to his clients: (1) the second pool: (2) the boat docking: and (3) access to hotel facilities with clarity about the fees and the time period for access. As a result of this initial discussion they agreed to meet to attempt to work out the terms of a settlement, and did meet on September 6.

[46] At this point in the trial, counsel for the defendants took the position that all discussions, meetings and letters where Mr. Morrison and Mr. Spears discussed settlement were without prejudice and therefore could not be revealed in court. Counsel for the plaintiff submitted that although the negotiations were initially without prejudice, they became with prejudice when Mr. Morrison put his offer on the record open for acceptance by any purchaser and when Mr. Spears relied on that offer to assert a new right to rescind. As a result of these positions the evidence of the negotiations and what followed between Mr. Spears and Mr. Morrison was heard as a voir dire with the court reserving its ruling. Having heard all of the evidence. I agree with the position taken by counsel for the plaintiff and hold that the evidence of what transpired between Mr. Spears and Mr. Morrison is admissible for two reasons: (1) Ultimately Mr. Morrison put his offer to the purchasers in writing and "with prejudice" because he felt that having made the offer publicly, it was open for acceptance by anyone who wanted to accept it and to close on that basis. In cross-examination, Mr. Spears acknowledged that he also believed that Mr. Morrison's offer was open for acceptance by any individual purchaser, and this was clearly contemplated in his September 10 letter which refers to what would happen if 80% of his clients accepted the proposal: (2) Once the offer was made formally by Mr. Morrison. Mr. Spears took instructions from those of his clients who did not wish to accept it and close their transactions, and took the position that the offer constituted a material change which gave a new right of rescission for 10 day's and upon which his clients relied. In other words, the negotiations having been acted on by acceptance by some purchasers and legal reliance by others, the original without prejudice nature of the negotiations as discussions upon which each side would consider compromise is subsumed in the outcome and no longer need be shielded from revelation to the court. In any event they are admissible as part of the narrative to explain the events which followed.

[47] Following a lengthy meeting on September 6. Mr. Morrison and Mr. Spears reached all agreement for a proposal from the developer that Mr. Spears felt would meet the concerns of his clients and which he was therefore prepared to recommend to them. Mr. Morrison testified that at that point he was prepared to build the second pool for the following summer. Furthermore Hidden Valley had persisted with its application to the government authorities for permission to build the docks and now had all approvals except from the Coast Guard and was prepared to build new docks as soon as that approval came through. Hidden Valley was also prepared to allow condominium owners to use the maximum Hotel facilities for the longest period of time with the appropriate cost sharing arrangement. Mr. Morrison also wanted to retain his original concept of building in the maximum flexibility for the condominium owners so that they would have the choice whether to opt in to various amenities or opt out and save the financial obligation. Mr. Spears also liked the concept of allowing flexibility. Therefore the plan or proposal which they agreed to put to the purchasers included this flexibility rather than a straight commitment by Hidden Valley to build the pool and docks essentially as contemplated in the site plan.

[48] The proposal as formulated was set out in a "without prejudice" letter from Mr. Spears to Mr. Morrison and contained four components:

(1) The Docks

[49] Because the developer had by this time obtained all approvals for docks except from the Coast Guard. Which approval seemed fairly certain, it was prepared to erect floating docks to accommodate all additional 20 boats at a cost of $25,000 to $30,000 by the 1992 boating season. (My understanding was that these were not the type of docks shown in the site plan). However, the alternative was offered of a cash payment in the same amount by the developer to the Condominium Corporation, which could choose to use the money for any purpose including asking the developer to build some boat slips as needed, thereby saving the balance of the money for other purposes such as its Reserve Fund. (2) Pool on Hotel Lands

[50] The developer said it would build the pool if that was the decision of the Condominium Corporation. The cost was estimated at $50,000 or more subject to sitting. The Condominium Corporation could take a cash payment of $50,000. which would be made immediately after the Condominium Corporation was formally organized with the first election of a Board of Directors and a bank account, and elect to return that money to the developer to build the pool. Or it could negotiate with the developer for an increased payment, then use the increase for the Reserve Fund or use it to build a pool on the common elements of the condominium corporation.

(3) Hotel Recreational Facilities

[51] The cost of operating all of these facilities in 1990 was $110,000. The split for shared costs would be 40% for the condominium corporation and 60% for the Hotel, amounting to $44,000 for the condominium corporation or $750 per unit, subject to inflation and to an extra shared cost for repairs and replacement. The Condominium Corporation could decide which of the facilities it wished to opt into and pay the appropriate 40% cost sharing for those. The matter would be covered in the Reciprocal Agreement.

(4) Reciprocal Agreement

[52] Once the new Board was in place and had decided on an amenities package, a new Reciprocal Agreement would be registered on title to the condominium and the Hotel lands. However, the use of the shared facilities would still be subject to the discretion of the Hotel owner. Therefore for security of tenure of the condominium owners, there would be a ten-year term for use of the facilities with a right of first refusal in the event of the sale of the Hotel. There would also be an option for the developer to buy out the remainder of the term on reasonable notice for a price tied, to the amount of time remaining in the ten-year term, with the initial price being $250,000 and declining by $25,000 per year.

[53] The Board of Directors would have until the earlier of six months after the turnover of the corporation to the Board or July 31, 1992 to make its decisions regarding use of the funds and the amenities. During that period all amenities would be available to the condominium owners at no charge.

[54] The developer would also pay $12,000, to reimburse the purchasers for legal costs to date.

[55] The proposal also contained an agreement that Mr. Morrison would attend a purchasers' meeting on September 11 at Sunnyview School to present the proposal and answer questions, and that Mr. Spears would recommend the proposal to his clients and would not continue to act if 80% of them accepted.

[56] Mr. Morrison did attend the meeting and presented the proposal to the purchasers. His impression was that it was not well received and that most of the questions which followed were not about the amenities but consisted of angry comments and questions about the price reduction on the units, the condition of the Hotel and the fact that it needed refurbishing, and the anticipated difficulty with arranging mortgage financing because of the reduced value of the units. There was also a dispute on the evidence between Mr. Morrison and Mr. Spears as to whether Mr. Spears did in fact recommend the proposal to his clients as he had undertaken to do.

[57] Following the meeting Mr. Morrison did not hear right away from Mr. Spears about his clients' instructions, but Hidden Valley received some calls from purchasers indicating that based on the proposal they were prepared to close. When they did speak. Mr. Spears ultimately advised Mr. Morrison that very few of his clients wished to put their agreements into good standing. In the meantime, Mr. Morrison decided that as he had made the proposal to the purchasers in an open meeting, some purchasers were prepared to accept it and on that basis close their transactions, and since Hidden Valley was prepared to abide by it, he would formalize the proposal in a "with prejudice" letter of September 13, 1991.

[58] Mr. Spears testified how surprised he was to receive this letter because he believed the entire exercise had been without prejudice. However, once he did receive it, he had to act in the best interests of his clients. In his letter of September 18 on behalf of an amended group of purchasers which now included the Phillips', Mr. Spears took the position that the proposal in the Hidden Valley letter of September 13 including "significant additions to the Corporation's assets" and the new Reciprocal Agreement could constitute material amendments to the original disclosure statement and therefore that his clients were exercising their ten day right of rescission. There was evidence from the several of the purchasers that at this point they no longer trusted Hidden Valley and some were unhappy that the pool and docks were not going to be built as committed, but only if the Condominium owners decided to do so. Upon receipt of this correspondence Mr. Morrison felt outrage and betrayal and commenced action against Mr. Spears which was resolved before this action came to trial and therefore is not a subject for the comment of this court.

[59] In the face of the defections by some purchasers, and as a thank-you and incentive to those who were going to close. Hidden Valley sent out a letter which offered price reductions to those purchasers who went ahead with their closings and in the same letter explained that the ongoing problem with the provision of amenities was determining what amenities the majority wanted and were prepared to pay for. In the result, Hidden Valley advised that it was proceeding to provide $75,000 to the Condominium Corporation which could later decide whether to ask the developer to build the pool and docks with that money or to do whatever it decided with the money including distribute it to the owners. The letter also set out the terms for access to the Hotel amenities based on 4000 of the actual operating costs of whatever facilities the corporation sought to access for 10 years including a buy-out option for the developer, and free use of the Hotel facilities during the interim period until the decision was made. These new arrangements were ultimately carried out by the plaintiffs for the purchasers who did close. As well the plaintiffs eventually completed the refurbishing of the hotel.

[60] The defendants failed to close their units and the plaintiffs moved to mitigate the damages by undertaking new programs to attempt to market the units. Unfortunately because of the recession, for a time there was virtually no market for them. Eventually they sold at a considerable loss to the plaintiffs. I find that the plaintiffs properly mitigated their damages. In the case of Mr. Boynton's unit, Hidden Valley elected to allow another purchaser to swap his unit for the Boynton unit, then resold the other unit and claimed the loss on it against Mr. Boynton. In light of my disposition of this action, there is no need to rule on the legal consequences of this position. ISSUES

(1) Section 52 of the Condominium Act requires certain disclosure material when the condominium units sold are "for residential purposes." The plaintiff takes the position that the Hidden Valley units were not "for residential purposes".

(2) If s. 52 applies, did the plaintiffs comply with the disclosure requirements of that section?

(3) If not, was the non-compliance so material that the agreements of purchase and sale were not binding on the purchasers?

(4) In the alternative, were the purchasers induced to enter into their agreements by misrepresentations which allowed them to rescind?

(1) Were the units "for residential purposes"?

Section 52(1) provides:

An agreement of purchase and sale entered into after the 1st day of June, 1979 by a declarant or proposed declarant of a unit or proposed unit for residential purposes is not binding on the purchaser until the declarant has delivered, to the purchaser a copy of the current disclosure statement and all material amendments thereto.

There is no definition in the Act of the term "residential" or the phrase "for residential purposes".

[62] The plaintiff's position is that the Huntsville by-law which governs the Hidden Valley lands provides that the permitted uses were "commercial accommodation units with normal rental character of interval ownership type character", and that the character of use was "a commercial character, with turnover frequency capability exceeding twelve times per year." No expert evidence nor Town of Huntsville witness was called to explain the meaning or intent of this by-law. However, Mr. Morrison understood that the purpose of this type of by-law in a resort area was so that the municipality would not need to provide the full level of service to the development as it would for permanent homes.

[63] Because the development is considered commercial from a zoning point of view and because the units were not to be inhabited full-time but only on vacation visits, the plaintiffs assert that they do not qualify as units "for residential purposes" and subject to s. 52. The plaintiffs say they received legal advice to fully comply with the disclosure requirements of s. 52 voluntarily out of an abundance of caution. What the plaintiffs did not do was advise any prospective purchasers directly that the development was not "for residential purposes" and therefore that the rescission rights in s. 52 did not apply. Nor did they ever take that position in any of the dealings with the purchasers or with their lawyer until this action.

[64] In my view the plaintiffs' argument cannot succeed. the Condominium Act is consumer protection legislation and must be interpreted in order to give effect to that purpose, while striking a fair balance between the rights and obligations of developers and purchasers: Abdool v. Somerset Place Developments of Georgetown Ltd. (1992), 10 O.R. (3d) 120 at 137 and 145; Windisman v. Toronto College Park Ltd., [1996]. The character of the units is to be determined from examining all of the circumstances including the intention and understanding of the parties.

[65] Clearly the units themselves are full, self-contained "homes" where the owners could live independently if they so chose. Although the development was as a four season resort, there is nothing in any of the documents which expressly prohibits an owner from using the unit 365 days per year. Nor is an owner required to lease out the unit. Owners had the option to join the hotel lease-back program, to rent the units out independently, or not to rent them out at all. Therefore although the development is zoned commercial, any commercial element is not mandatory, nor is owners' use restricted.

[66] The plaintiffs also rely on the endorsement of the Court of Appeal in Re Brunott v. Coolmur Limited (1983), 22 A.C.W.S. (2d) 509 (C.A.) where the court held that a particular purchaser's intended use of the unit is irrelevant and that the court must see how the unit is described in the documents. In this case, the plaintiff attempted to amend all its documents to refer to the units as "accommodation units" and not "residential units". However, by oversight or otherwise numerous references to "residential" remain in the documents. For example Budget Note 2, to the Budget Statement states: "The water expense includes water consumed in the residential units ..."; and in Schedule "C" to the Declaration which is a description of the boundaries of the unit, the units are described as "residential unit" throughout the Schedule. Regardless of the success or lack thereof of these amendments, the court must still determine the true character of the units based on all the circumstances: Re Ramsay and Heselman (1983), 42 O.R. (2d) 255 at 257 (Ont. Div. Ct.)

[67] In its documents Hidden Valley refers to other sections of the Condominium Act which are applicable only to proposed units for residential purposes. For example, paragraph 3 of the Agreement of Purchase and Sale: "Interest on Purchaser's Deposit" provides:

The Vendor agrees that the Purchaser shall be credited, on the final statement of adjustments as at the Unit Transfer Date, with such interest as the Purchaser is entitled to pursuant to the provisions of s. 53(3) of the Condominium Act R.S.O. 1980 ch. 84, as amended.

That section deals with interest on deposits during interim occupancy and pending closing on residential units. It would be extremely misleading to purchasers to include such a provision, then take the position later that no amount was owing because s. 53(3) does not apply because the units are commercial. There was no evidence to suggest that the plaintiffs had any intention of taking such a position at any time. This reinforces one of the relevant circumstances that the vendor in fact treated the units as residential and subject to the sections of the Act which apply to residential units.

[68] The plaintiffs also rely on the definition of "residential premises" in s. 1 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, R.S.O. 1990 c. L.7., which excludes "accommodation provided to the travelling and vacationing public in a ... resort ... cottage or cabin establishment ...", as providing guidance as to what is not considered to be residential. In this case however, the accommodation was not intended necessarily for the travelling public but for the condominium owner to use or rent out. When an individual owns a cottage and decides to rent it out for part of a season. Part IV of the Landlord and Tenant Act may not apply, but the residential character of the cottage for the owner does not change. In that case the Legislature has determined that it is not appropriate for Part IV of the Landlord and Tenant Act to apply. However, the court must assess the intention of the Legislature in respect of the application of the particular piece of legislation before it which may be different from another Act. In this case it is the Condominium Act, and in particular the application of the consumer protection disclosure requirements of s. 52.

[69] The plaintiffs also point for guidance to the Ontario New Home Warranty Plan Act which excludes "dwellings built and sold for occupancy for temporary periods or for seasonal purposes". (s. 1) However, in looking at all the circumstances, the court may again take into account the fact that Hidden Valley did have the development registered under the New Home Warranty Plan while the defendants were involved, (although after the original closings, the unsold units were ultimately removed from the Plan), and complied with all of the disclosure requirements of s. 52 of the Condominium Act.

[71] Finally, the court must consider the intention of the Legislature in the context of the consumer protection purpose of the Act. Adapting the analysis of Sharpe J. in Windisman, supra, at p. 9, it is difficult to see why a consumer would receive the protection of the Act when buying this type of unit as a vacation home where there is no municipal by-law which designates the zoning as commercial, but not receive protection where there is such a by-law in place.

[72] In my view, the units in this development are clearly "for residential purposes" and therefore s. 52 of the Act applies to them.

(2) Did the Hidden Valley Disclosure Material comply with the requirements of s. 52?

[73] Subsection 52(6) provides:

The disclosure statement referred to in subsection (1) shall contain and fully and accurately disclose. ... (b) a general description of the property or proposed property including the types and number of buildings, units and recreational and other amenities together with any; conditions that apply to the provision of amenities;

(c) a budget statement for the one year period immediately following the registration of the declaration and the description;

(d) a brief narrative description of the significant features of the existing or proposed declaration, by-laws and rules governing the use of common elements and units. and of any contracts or leases that may be subject to termination or expiration under s. 39;

(f) where construction of amenities is not completed, a schedule of, the proposed commencement and completion dates;

(g) any other matters required by the regulations to be disclosed.

By Regulation 96 s. 34 the declarant is required to provide the following documents under s. 52(6)(b) with the disclosure statement:

(1) the declaration or proposed declaration;

(2) the by-laws or proposed by-laws;

(3) the rules or proposed rules;

(4) any insurance trust agreement or proposed version thereof

[74] In this case the Reciprocal Agreement is in the form of a by-law and therefore had to be provided as part of the disclosure, as it was.

[75] Section 52(7) provides:

The budget statement mentioned in clause (6)(e) shall set out.

(a) the common expenses;

(b) the proposed amount of each expense;

(c) particulars of the type, frequency and level of the services to be provided;

(h) any current or expected fees or charges to be paid by unit owners or any of them for the use of the common elements or part thereof and other facilities related to the property;

[76] In the Abdool case, the Court of Appeal described the intention of the disclosure statement to be "no more than an incomplete description of the documents and a condensation of their significant features". (p. 137) In other words, the intent of the disclosure statement is to put into readable and understandable language what is contained in the other documents which set out the terms of the "deal". There the disclosure statement does not comply with subsection (6), there is no agreement of purchase and sale binding on the purchaser. (p. 138)

[77] In this case, the terms of the deal as set out in the other documents were not clear, coherent or consistent with respect to the issue of amenities, nor did those terms reflect the purchasers' understanding of the access to Hotel amenities based on the promotional literature, their dealings with the Hidden Valley agent, Ms. Lazar, nor the site plan included in each agreement of purchase and sale. The disclosure statement merely compounded the confusion by modifying rather than summarizing the other documents.

[78] Therefore the first problem in this case is that the terms of the "deal", that is, the legal obligations of the developer, in respect of recreational amenities were not set out clearly in writing anywhere. It follows that the disclosure statement could not "fully and accurately disclose" a description of those amenities. The problem is compounded by the representations made to purchasers during the pre-agreement sales promotions that there would be two outdoor pools, new docks and a refurbished hotel with access for the condo owners to all the facilities for a modest or no fee. To the extent that the disclosure statement is unclear, the significance of the failure of the agreement to reflect the pre-contractual representations is also unclear.

[79] In Abdool, the Court of Appeal emphasized that before a defect will warrant a declaration that a signed agreement of purchase and sale is not binding on the purchaser, the defect must be "of such substance as to render the disclosure statement defective in a material respect." Furthermore, the Act's purpose being to promote fair dealing between the parties, it ought not to be applied so that one party is allowed to renege from the agreement "on grounds that are unfair, unreasonable or capricious." Because a purchaser has had the 10 day cooling off period and not rescinded, the onus is on that party later to show that the defect in the disclosure statement is so significant as to make the agreement non-binding. (p. 138) The standard that the purchaser must meet is therefore described as follows:

To discharge this onus and prove materiality of the complaint, in my opinion, the purchaser is obliged to establish objectively that had the information that was not disclosed, or that was inaccurately or insufficiently disclosed, been properly disclosed in the disclosure statement at the time it was delivered to the purchaser, a reasonable purchaser would have regarded the information as sufficiently important to the decision to purchase that he or she would not likely have gone ahead with the transaction but would instead have rescinded the agreement before the expiration of the ten day cooling off period. (p. 139)

[80] The issue in this case is further complicated by the fact that the recreational amenities of this development were not to be part of the common elements on the condominium property but on the adjacent Hotel lands. Because subsection 52(6)(b) refers to a general description of the property, it is arguable that any amenities not on the property are not covered by this section. "Property is defined in s. 1, to mean:

the land and interests appurtenant to the land described in the description, and includes any land and interests appurtenant to the land that are added to the common elements.

However, the general language later in the subsection which refers to "any conditions that apply to the provision of amenities", together with the requirement for disclosure of the Reciprocal Agreement by-law which in this case includes the amenities, and the requirement of the Act (ss. 52(7)(h)) for the Budget Statement to disclose fees for the use of "the common elements or part thereof and other facilities related to the property", satisfies me that the section must be read to include amenities provided as adjuncts to the use of the units even if not on the condominium property or part of the common elements. Furthermore in this case, where the Reciprocal Agreement was to be registered to give effect to the mutual easements, at least the outdoor pools and beach may be considered to be "interests appurtenant to the land".

(3) Was the non-compliance material?

[81] The critical portions of the documents delivered to purchasers are set out earlier in this judgment.

[82] 1. In the Agreement of Purchase and Sale there is attached as Schedule "B" the site plan which depicts the existing pool and the future pool and the new boat docks. The Agreement makes reference to the Reciprocal Agreement with the Hotel regarding "the integrated use, operation, repair, reconstruction (if necessary), and maintenance of certain shared facilities including proposed outdoor swimming pools, driveway's, roadway's and servicing systems ..." There is no mention of boat docking or use of other hotel facilities in the Agreement of Purchase and Sale. To the extent that reference is made to shared access to outdoor pool facilities, the reference is to more than one pool and this is consistent with the site plan. (emphasis added)

[83] 2. The Declaration makes reference when dealing with Common Expenses to the Reciprocal Agreement and the cost of shared facilities referred to there. Schedule "A" describes easements affecting the condominium lands and refers to all easement "for the use and enjoyment of the Outdoor Swimming Pools to be located upon the Hotel Lands", and to an easement in favour of the Hotel for access to a shared beach area located on the 64 unit condominium lands. Again there is no reference to boat docking or other hotel amenities, and the only reference to outdoor pool facilities is to more than one pool. (emphasis added)

[84] 3. The Reciprocal Agreement provides a definition "Outdoor Swimming Pools". "Shared Facilities" is also defined and includes various easement and other servicing areas of the condominium and Hotel lands, but the definition does not mention boat docks or other hotel amenities. The various easements are set out and described. Over the hotel lands all easement is granted for use of the "Outdoor Swimming Pools." Then under the heading "Cost Sharing and Responsibilities" is the only reference to the outdoor pool facilities:

4.02(ii) During any period of time that the licences in Articles 2.05 and 2.06 are in existence. Hotel Owner hereby covenants and agrees to be primarily responsible for operating, inspecting, maintaining and keeping in good repair the Outdoor Swimming Pools provided that the cost of maintaining and repairing same shall be shared as set out in Schedule "D". (emphasis added)

Again the reference is only to "pools" in the plural, and as there are no Articles 2.05 or 2.06, the effect of this clause is unclear at best. (emphasis added)

[85] Stopping at this point, the documents which constitute the agreement between the parties refer only to the grant of an easement by the Hotel to the condominium for use of more than one outdoor pool as well as easements for the shared beach. There is no mention at all of boat docks or other Hotel facilities, nor is there any reference to refurbishing the Hotel.

[86] 4. The Budget Statement includes nothing which covers fees to be paid by unit owners for the use of facilities related to the property or for cost sharing. In the only reference to shared facilities with the Hotel, the statement mentions that the adjacent owners will have to contribute for the use by them of certain services. Mr. Morrison made the point that the budget turned out to be well in excess of what was spent in the first year for everything. This does not alter the failure of the disclosure to provide the information required to be given to purchasers in accordance with s. 52(7)(h) of the Act.

[87] 5. The Disclosure Statement is intended to be a readable description outlining what is in the other documents. Under the "General Description of the Property and Types and Numbers of Buildings", there is no reference to amenities. This may be because none of the amenities the beachfront in front of the 64 unit condominium lands are on condominium lands, but rather they were all to be Hotel amenities to be used by the condominium owners.

[88] Under the heading "Recreational and Other Amenities" condominium purchasers are told that it is anticipated that they will share the use of "an outdoor pool or pools" on Hotel lands with Hotel guests, and will share the cost of operation, maintenance and repair in accordance with the Reciprocal Agreement. This is the first reference to one pool in any of the documents. This reference does not add that the construction of a second pool would be at the discretion of the hotel. At best this reference is unclear and confusing. At worst, it is all attempt not to summarize the other documents but to resile from them, and in particular to resile from the reference in the documents to provide access to two outdoor pools as part of the amenities of the resort.

[89] On the issue of beach access, the disclosure statement states that the condo owners may walk over the Hotel beach but not use it, while the shared beach is in front of the condominium. No issue was made about the beach by the purchasers before the action, as I understand it because they were using the Hotel beach without issue throughout.

[90] Finally there is a "Note" dealing with additional recreational facilities. This is the only reference to the Hotel facilities (other than the outdoor pool(s) and beach), and to the boat docks anywhere in the documents. The Note says that the use and fees for use of these facilities (without describing them) is in the total discretion of the Hotel and that at the present time the condominium purchasers could access the tennis courts and boat docks subject to Hotel rules and fees set by the Hotel.

[91] The disclosure statement sets out the conditions for use of amenities (which conditions are required to be set out by ss. 52(6)) as compliance with the Act, the By-Laws, the Rules, the Reciprocal Agreement, and any further conditions set by the declarant.

[92] There is also a schedule for commencement and completion of construction of amenities (without listing them) set from August 1, 1989 to December 31, 1990. Since the only amenities to be built were the second outdoor pool, the new boat docks, and possibly the clearing of the beach in front of the condominium lands and the refurbishment of the Hotel, it is open to infer that this schedule was intended to reflect the construction of those features.

[93] Finally there is a description of By-law No. 2 which is the Reciprocal Agreement, and refers back to the Shared Facilities as defined in that document.

[94] I am satisfied, and so find, that the disclosure statement does not provide full and accurate disclosure to the condominium purchasers of the amenities or conditions of provision of the amenities. Read in the context of the other documents and in the context of the representations made to purchasers about the amenities: a high calibre resort Hotel, two outdoor pools, increased boat docking, access to Hotel recreational facilities, the disclosure statement does not set out clearly exactly what access the condominium owners will have and to what amenities. It is confusing at best.

[95] In particular, the documents refer to access to pools in the plural, which the purchasers would understand to be the two pools referred to throughout. The disclosure statement says "pool or pools" without explanation of whether that is intended to denigrate from the two pools promised. The documents make no reference to the indoor hotel facilities or to any concept of a decision by the condominium owners as to what facilities they would access based on cost sharing. The explanation in the disclosure statement is at odds with the entire concept of the condominiums as part of the Hotel resort complex. Furthermore, there is no reference to cost sharing for these facilities, but only to a fee. The purchasers learned from Mr. Hoyes that these amenities were to be made available on the cost sharing formula, similar to the outdoor pool(s). The documents also make no reference to boat docks, either existing or to be constructed. The disclosure statement refers only to the existing docks and fails to disclose the new ones to be built. This is at odds with the intention of Hidden Valley which was to obtain the necessary approvals to build the docks, which they attempted to do. It is also at odds with the representations regarding boat docking for purchasers and the site plan made Schedule "B" to the Agreements of Purchase and Sale.

[96] The deficiencies which I have noted might and arguably should have caused some concern to purchasers and their lawyers due to the confusion. Had they questioned Hidden Valley within the 10 day cooling off period as to the extent of its legal commitment to provide amenities, one may only speculate on what the response might have been. However, in determining the legal consequences of the deficiencies in the Hidden Valley material and of the purchasers' failure to rescind within the 10 day cooling off period, the initial obligation is on the declarant to comply with s. 52 of the Act. Having failed to comply, the onus is on the purchasers to establish that the non-compliance was material.

[97] In other words, had the discrepancies between what the purchasers believed the amenities were to be and what the developer was legally committed to provide as opposed to its "intention" or non-binding "commitment" been clearly spelled out in the disclosure statement, would a reasonable purchaser have rescinded the agreement? In my view the answer is yes.

[98] This development is a Muskoka resort where the natural and constructed recreational facilities are an integral part of the lifestyle that is purchased with the unit. Furthermore, the price of the units reflected the presence of the amenities as represented. In her excellent presentation, plaintiffs counsel argued that the purchasers got substantially what they purchased because they got access to the lake, the ski hill, the ability to swim in a pool or lake, to boat, and to have some access to the Hotel facilities; so that if there was only one outdoor pool and not two, or old docks with no slips for permanent or semi-permanent docking available for boat owners, or a tired Hotel facility instead of a refurbished one, those were minor differences only. I disagree. Those features make a significant difference in the type of resort the purchasers thought they were joining, and for which they paid a particular price. With the recovery of the market, the value of the units would be reflective again of the number of amenities and of the style of the resort.

[99] This is not a situation as has happened in many of the reported cases from recessionary times, where purchasers saw the value of their units plummet and combed through the disclosure material for a way to resile from the agreement. Here the drop in equity in the units was certainly a factor in the decision of many of purchasers to rescind, and of course in a rising market a purchaser would have the option to close and resell if the condominium development was not as it was supposed to be. However, in this case the non-disclosure of the true legal obligations of the developer with respect to the provision of amenities was of concern to the purchasers from the first meeting with Mr. Hoyes when the intended effect of the disclosure statement was first articulated by Hidden Valley and continued to be of concern to many of them right through all the meetings and negotiations in the summer and fall of 1991.

[100] In finding that the complaints of the purchasers were material, I put no weight on the evidence of Mr. Marvin, the real estate agent from Huntsville tendered by the defendants. His evidence was based on dealing with many purchasers of resort condominiums in Muskoka and what they said they were looking for in their purchases. Besides being a report of hearsay and anecdotal information, this is not the type of evidence for which the court requires an "expert".

[101] Because the disclosure statement did not comply with the requirements of s. 52, the Agreements of Purchase and Sale of the defendants were never binding on them on August 22, 1991, when all defendants except the Phillips' rescinded their agreements.

[102] In light of this finding, there is no need to deal with the issue of the duty to deliver amended disclosure statements from time to time, or the issue of rescission based on pre-contractual misrepresentation.

The Letter of September 13, 1991

[103] Setting aside the circumstances which led Mr. Morrison to send this letter, was this letter a material amendment to the disclosure statement, or indeed a disclosure statement which complied with the requirements of the Act, thereby starting a 10 day period to run during which the purchasers could rescind their agreements?

[104] Clearly this letter set out terms by which Hidden Valley was prepared to be bound and was bound. It set out new terms clarifying under what circumstances there would be new docks and a second pool as well as access to hotel amenities. Given that a) these matters were demonstrably unclear up to this time, and b) the terms, although very fair and accommodating, were also new and different from the original deal and not necessarily acceptable to purchasers who did not want a majority vote but wanted to be sure that the second pool and docks would be installed. I find that this letter would have constituted a material amendment had there been a complying disclosure statement to amend. Therefore the Phillips' were entitled not to close based either on the fact that their agreement was not binding or that they exercised a right of rescission within 10 day's of receiving the September 13 letter.

[105] In making these findings, I note that this is a case where once the problems came clearly to light through the purchasers' lawyer, the developer made significant and what I perceived to be good faith efforts to try to deal with the purchasers' concerns. However, those efforts cannot have the effect in law of saving the transactions when there has been material non-compliance with s. 52(6) of the Act.

Conclusion on the effect of material non-compliance

[106] The court was advised that the actions and counterclaims of the defendants Gregory Vercaigne and Dr. Bernard Zinman have been settled. The defendant Gail Sharkey was not represented by counsel and did not appear at the trial. It was unclear whether the court had notified her before the trial at her last known address. As a result she was notified at the beginning of the trial by regular and by registered mail to her last known address in the jurisdiction. The registered letter came back during the trial marked "moved, address unknown". The information provided to the court at trial was that Ms. Sharkey had moved to Florida without leaving a forwarding address. The plaintiffs elected to proceed with their action against her.

[107] Therefore the action of the plaintiffs against all defendants except the two who have settled is dismissed.

[108] The counterclaim was pursued by all the remaining defendants except Gail Sharkey. On the counterclaim the defendants are entitled to return of their deposits plus interest plus return of agreed amounts regarding upgrades of units, plus certain lease back adjustments, all as agreed in the Agreed Statement of Facts. Although Ms. Sharkey did not appear or proceed with her counterclaim, in light of the trust provisions of s. 53 of the Act, a question arises as to what order, if any, the court ought to make in respect of her deposit funds. Counsel are invited to re-attend to briefly address this issue.

Rebate of Occupancy Fees

[109] The defendants also claim a rebate on the occupancy fees they paid after the interim closings, based on the failure of Hidden Valley to provide all the amenities during that time including the second pool and boat docks and a refurbished hotel. They also complain that the beach was unusable during the 1990 season due to a silt curtain which the Hotel was obliged by the authorities to install in the water due to run off of soil from construction from the site into the water. The defendants complain that the indoor facilities of the hotel were at times closed off and unavailable pending renovation. They also point to the fact that the make-shift boat docking arrangements for those with boats were inconvenient as boats could not easily be put in and out of the water or tied up for any period of time.

[110] Counsel advised that there are no cases under the Condominium Act where an abatement of occupancy fees has been awarded. All cases are under the Landlord and Tenant Act. The relevant sections of the Condominium Act are ss. 51(6) which sets out the maximum monthly occupancy fee based on three components: a) mortgage interest, b) municipal taxes, and c) projected monthly common expense contribution, and ss. 51(7) which provides that the declarant must provide the services which the condominium corporation will have a duty to provide after closing.

[111] In this case the amenities connected with the Hotel were provided during the interim occupancy period at no charge. The only component of the interim occupancy fee that is referable to provision of services is the common expenses contribution, part of which may be referable to the shared beach in front of the condominium units. In an exhibit filed with the court (exhibit 153A) a table shows that a very small proportion of the monthly fee collected was attributable to common expenses, referred to as "maintenance" on the exhibit.

[112] In my view any abatement of this fee should be in a token amount only. Most defendants who elected to use their units enjoyed them while they had them in spite of some inconvenience during construction. Any rebate would be based on the failure to provide the second pool and docks during that period. In this case, this was not a matter of delay in construction about which the cases have been indulgent, but election by the developer not to provide the amenities at the time due to its interpretation of its obligations. As these were material matters, some rebate of occupancy fees is warranted. However, because the maintenance portion of the monthly fees is a very small percentage, only a token amount of $10.00 per month reduction on those fees from January 1, 1991 is appropriate.

Lavalle Upgrade

[113] Mr. Lavalle elected to install electric heating in some of the floors of his unit. This was not an upgrade offered by the developer but work he did himself. Mr. Lavalle indicated that he had the permission of the developer, however Mr. Morrison said that this renovation was totally voluntary on the part of Mr. Lavalle. The amount he seeks is $2493. which was the cost of labour and materials. In my view the purchaser cannot force an unusual alteration on the developer for compensation in this situation. He chose to invest money in the unit before closing and had use out of this investment before electing not to close. There will be no refund of this amount.

Costs

[114] The costs of the action will follow the event, subject to any offers of settlement that may have been made. If the parties are unable to agree on the costs, a reasonable amount will be fixed after further brief submissions within three weeks of release of these reasons.

Vernon George Mackin, Walter Brent Jones, Gail Sharon Jones, Alice Ruth Elliot, and John Alexander Elliot, petitioners, and The Owners, Strata Plan 1374, respondent

Victoria Registry No. 98 0158

British Columbia Supreme Court Victoria, British Columbia Hutchison J. Heard: December 11, 1998. Judgment: filed December 17, 1998.

Counsel: R.C. di Bella, for the petitioners. David Perry, for the respondents.

[para1] HUTCHISON J.:-- This petition raises a new twist on an old problem - the leaky condominium.

[para4] In brief, both sides say they "do not do windows".

[para5] Under Part V of the Condominium Act s. 115 defines the obligations of an owner who must do the following:

(c) repair and maintain the strata lot, including windows and doors, and areas allocated to the owner's exclusive use, and keep them in a state of good repair, reasonable wear and tear and damage by fire, storm, tempest or act of God excepted. (Emphasis added)

[para6] The next section, 116, defines the obligations of a strata corporation which must do all of the following:

(f) maintain and repair the exterior of the buildings, excluding windows, doors, balconies and patios included in a strata lot, including the decorating of the whole of the exterior of the buildings. (Emphasis added)

[para7] In 1991 severe leaking problems occurred at The Dolphins, particularly in the penthouse and a report was obtained from Levelton Engineering Ltd.

[para8] At that time no firm decision could be, or was, arrived at as to whose responsibility, the strata corporation's or the owners', the replacement of these windows became. At a meeting of the strata corporation on 17 April 1991, a classic Canadian compromise was entered into and each side agreed to pay 50% of the cost by the strata corporation levying a special assessment. Since the owners of the new windows in units 303, 401, 403, 501, 504 and 600 were all assessed, it meant, in fact, they paid somewhat more than 50% of the total repair bills charged to the owners' account.

[para9] The present issue arises as a result of the special resolution put to the 1991 annual meeting calling on the strata corporation to pay 50% of the cost of window replacement. A "sunset" clause was added by way of an amendment to the original resolution to which notice had been given. That amendment provided as follows:

After April 1, 1995, a new resolution on window repairs and/or replacement will be required.

[para10] While it would appear that some of the petitioners voted for the amendment, needless to say, the petitioners now seek indemnification for 50% of the costs of replacing their windows after April 1, 1995. The strata corporation is resisting payment and takes the position that they are not responsible for the repair and replacement of windows. [para11] In passing, it is significant that an owner is responsible to keep the windows in a state of good repair "reasonable wear and tear and damage by fire, storm, tempest or act of God excepted". It is arguable that the leakage in this case is caused from reasonable wear and tear or damage by storm or tempest. The material before me shows that when a south-east storm comes in off the Straits of Juan de Fuca in full force on the face of this apartment building, the rain falls horizontally rather than vertically. This adds to the problems of owners on the southerly side of the building, as compared to owners on the northerly side, who naturally do not wish to pay for the benefit of upgrading their southern neighbours. It is also of some moment in the interpretation of s. 116 to note that s-s. (d) reads as follows:

(d) maintain and repair, including renewal where reasonably necessary, pipes, wires, cables, chutes and ducts existing in the parcel and capable of being used in connection with the enjoyment of more than one strata lot or common property.

This is some indication that the draftsman regards renewal where reasonably necessary to be something different than maintenance and repair. Sub-section (f) provides for "maintain and repair of the exterior of the buildings, excluding windows,".

[para12] One of the conundrums caused is the fact that in today's modern building methods windows are no longer re-glazed but simply replaced, inclusive of the aluminum frames which, in the case at bar, are apparently the cause of the difficulties. However, that being said, 11 of the units still have their original windows installed during the construction of the building in 1980.

[para13] While there are no relevant cases in the Province of British Columbia, according to counsel, Mr. di Bella cites and relies on a decision of Master Quinn of the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta, in action number 92/0304276, which seems much on point.

[para14] A summary of the problem facing Master Quinn is contained in the first two paragraphs of his judgment which read as follows:

This application arises from a Petition by the Owners: Condominium Plan Number 762 1072 ("the Condominium") concerning a problem that has arisen with the windows of the individual units in the condominium.

The opinion of the Board of Directors of the condominium is that the windows, window frames and window sills in all of the individual units need to be removed and replaced due to their age and their deteriorated condition. The directors believe that if the said replacement is not done soon the structure of the units may be seriously affected by leakage, rotting and related deterioration.

He continues by pointing out that there is an obvious need in some units for replacement, and in others the problem was not then pressing.

[para15] It is interesting to note that in the Alberta case it was the condominium corporation which sought to replace all the windows and some of the owners, presumably those whose units did not need new windows immediately, threatened to sue the condominium corporation for replacing windows which they submitted were the responsibility of the individual owners.

[para16] Master Quinn was dealing with the Alberta Condominium Property Act which provided, in s. 7(2) that "all doors and windows of a unit are part of the unit unless otherwise stipulated in the condominium plan". Needless to say, nothing was stipulated in the plan. The question became one of, what constitutes a window within the meaning of the Act which gives, as our Act, no definition of windows.

[para17] Master Quinn concluded that "window" in the context of s. 7(2) should be interpreted to mean the glass pane. His reasoning, contained at pp.4-5 of his judgment, seems apposite to the case at bar, where he said as follows:

As previously mentioned, some of the unit owners take the position that the windows (meaning the window assembly including the sills and frames) are the property of the unit owners. That notion may come from By-law 2 (c) which provides that an owner shall: 2 (c) repair and maintain his unit and all windows in, attached to or immediately adjacent to the unit (whether or not such windows or party (sic) thereof are part of the common property), damage by fire, storm, tempest or act of God excepted;

That By-law does not really say the windows are the property of the unit owner. If the unit owner owned them, there would be no reason for exempting him from the duty to repair where the damage was caused by fire, storm, tempest or act of God. The By-law lays a duty on the owner to repair the windows even though he may not own them, but relieves him of the duty where the damage was not caused by his own fault.

[para18] The learned Master then goes on to say:

By-law 9(k)(i) provides that the condominium corporation shall maintain and keep in a good repair "all outside surfaces of the units " but "excluding windows" which shall be the responsibility of the unit owner.

This By-law does not specify who owns the windows but merely confirms that the duty of keeping the windows in a good state of repair is the duty of the unit owner.

[para19] The learned Master then goes on to point out that a condominium corporation is required to insure, as it is in British Columbia, the building for full replacement value, and other fixed improvements comprising the condominium under the relevant Alberta Act.

[para20] The learned Master then goes on, at p.6 of his reasons, to say:

The window assembly must surely fall within the scope of "fixed improvements". It would be inconsistent with that concept for it to be held that the window assembly is owned by the unit owner. I am informed, though there is no evidence of it before me, that insurers have advised the condominium that they would not insure window assemblies for unit holders, and that a unit holders "tenant's" policy covers glass only. He then goes on to say that, in his opinion, the window assembly should be deemed to be "outside hardware" under the relevant bylaw in Alberta, and that it is the duty of the condominium corporation to keep them in a good state of repair.

[para21] When one compares the Alberta Act to the British Columbia Act, they seem to be in para materia.

[para22] Master Quinn's reasoning seems to be that if a particular unit in a condominium be inhabited by teenage baseball players, the individual owner must replace the window pane if baseball or bat goes through it. If the repair of the pane involves, as a more economical method, the popping out of the aluminum frame and its replacement with a new frame, so be it.

[para23] If, however, the frame starts to leak and the whole window assembly requires to be replaced, inclusive of glass, as being the most economical method of repairing, then the condominium corporation shall pay, despite the owner being presented with new glass.

[para24] The difficulty of interpretation in the case at bar is not unlike that which faced the English Court of Appeal in The Holiday Fellowship Ltd. v. Viscount Hereford, [1959] 1 All E.R. 433. There, Viscount Hereford had demised his premises for a term of 21 years and had covenanted to keep the "main walls" of the demised premises in good repair and condition. The question before the court was whether or not the landlord had responsibility to maintain and keep in good repair the windows and their casements. Lord Justice Ormerod, at p.437, said this:

In most buildings it is necessary to have means of ingress and egress, and, of course, some means of admitting light: therefore, the walls form the setting of the necessary doors and windows which certainly a dwelling house and a very large number of other buildings must have. But to say that those doors and windows, inserted in those settings, are part of the main walls of the building seems to me to be going very much further than the ordinary use of language would require or allow.

The tenant was left with the responsibility to maintain the windows.

[para25] In his judgment Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice Evershed, at p.434, said this: We are not concerned with any question of repair to the brick or stone structure containing the actual windows. For the purposes of this case and of the question raised in the originating summons, I take "windows" to mean, and to be confined to, the glass panels and the wooden framework and apparatus in which the glass is placed; and the question is whether, for the purposes of the lease, "main walls" ought to be treated as including the windows as I have attempted to define them.

[para27] Lord Evershed, at p.435, is critical of a statement taken from Boswell v. Crucible Steel Co. (supra) in Woodfall on Landlord and Tenant where, in the 25th edition, 1954, at p.760, the learned author says:

It would appear that windows in the outer walls of a building are themselves to be regarded as part of the walls and therefore the external parts.

Lord Evershed goes on to point out as follows:

That passage is based, and based exclusively, on Boswell v. Crucible Steel Co. (supra). With all respect to the learned editor, I think that is an overstatement or over-simplification of the matter. I think that it would be correct to say: "It would appear that windows in the outer walls of a building may, in certain contexts and for certain purposes, be regarded as part of the walls; but I do not think that Boswell v. Crucible Steel Co. justifies any more extensive proposition. Nor can I agree with counsel for the tenants that, because in Boswell's case, (supra), the conclusion is regarded as a matter of law, therefore it is impossible to say, as a matter of fact or degree in another case and in another context, that windows are not to be regarded as part of the main wall: the one thing by no means follows from the other. So far, therefore, I am unable to hold (and I agree entirely with Harman, J., that Boswell v. Crucible Steel Co. (supra) does not bind us to hold) that these windows are part of the main walls of this edifice for the purposes of this lease.

[para28] In the result then, the trial judgment of Harman J. was upheld and the landlord "did not do windows".

[para31] In determining the meaning of the legislature in the Condominium Act (supra) the pragmatic approach taken by Master Quinn in Alberta seems to be the one best suited to the case at bar. In my view the legislation was intended to put a duty on the unit owners to keep their outside windows clean and glazed. This despite the theoretical boundary between theirs and the common property being right through the middle of the window panes, or with thermal windows, as in the case at bar, the air space between the panes. I hold the owner of a unit must keep windows of their unit built on the outside of the condominium corporation's walls sealed and caulked. The duty on the strata corporation under s. 116 requiring it to; "maintain and repair the exterior of the buildings, excluding windows" etc. "including the decorating of the whole of the exterior of the buildings" includes, rather than excludes, the window casings and sills. Thus when repainting is required the strata corporation would not be required to break out the cost of painting window frames and casings in order to bill each individual owner. Those with the smallest unit entitlement might well have the greatest number of windows on the outside walls and thus be required to carry more of repainting costs than those with the largest suites which seems unfair and against the scheme of the Act.

[para33] I am not prepared to pro-rate costs as suggested by counsel but I think costs follow the event on scale 3 in favour of the Petitioners. I am not prepared to give the individual petitioners judgment in the amounts claimed at this time due to not being aware of exactly what Mr. Phillips did and whether all of the work was window replacement. It would also be unfortunate if judgments were taken and registered before the strata corporation had time to review the bills and these reasons. Thus I grant liberty to apply if the parties are unable to work out an appropriate finish to this interesting dispute.

Between Niagara North Condominium Corporation No. 46, applicant, and Raymond Chassie and Muriel Chassie, respondents

Court File No. 40,448/98 Ontario Court of Justice (General Division) St. Catharines, Ontario MacDonald J. Heard: September 17, 1998. Judgment: April 7, 1999.

Counsel: Paul Bauerle, for the applicant. Muriel Chassie, for the respondents.

[1] MacDONALD J.:-- The Applicant, Niagara North Condominium Corporation No. 46, (the N.N.C.C.), has applied to this Court for an order directing the Respondents, Raymond and Muriel Chassie, to remove their cat from their Unit, being Unit 203 of the condominium building, within 30 days of the Order. In other words, the N.N.C.C. seeks to evict Mineau, a 16-year-old Siamese cat, from her home with the Chassies in the condominium complex, which is located at 3 Towering Heights Boulevard in St. Catharines.

THE ISSUE AND POSITIONS OF THE PARTIES

[2] The issue, as set out in the Applicant's Factum, is:

"Should the Respondents be required to have the cat removed from their unit and, if they fail to do so, may the cat be removed as directed by the Board of Directors, and at the expense of the Respondents?"

[3] The position of the Applicant is that the Respondents should be required to remove the cat from the premises because the residence of the cat in the Respondents' unit is contrary to the Declaration and Rules and Regulations of the N.N.C.C. Counsel for the Applicant submitted that the prohibition is contained in the condominium Declaration as well as in the Rules, both of which are binding on the unit owners, and that there is a strong presumption as to the validity of the Declaration. Further, the Board of Directors of a condominium corporation has a statutory obligation to enforce the Declaration and Rules. Also, contrary to her assertions, Mrs. Chassie was not misled about the pet prohibition in view of the fact that she signed a form acknowledging receipt of the Rules. While he acknowledged that the Human Rights Code relied on by the Chassies is a quasi-constitutional law, he submitted that the Code should not be applied herein. He argued that, for the Code to apply, there must be a physical reliance on an animal, as in the case of a blind or deaf person. The mere emotional attachment to a companion animal is not sufficient to evoke the Code, he said.

[4] I would summarize the defence of the Respondents, who appeared in person, as being lack of reasonableness, acquiescence by the Board in respect of the presence of pets and delay in the enforcement of the Declaration and Rules and Human Rights Code considerations.

[5] In support of their position that keeping a cat in their unit is reasonable, the Respondents, in their response to the Application, submitted that:

"2(f) In recent years, the benefits of pet ownership have become common knowledge to the extent that the Attorney General saw fit to revise the Landlord and Tenant Act to void the prohibition of pet ownership."

Also, Mrs. Chassie stated, in her affidavit of September 10, 1998:

"14. My husband and I visited eight condominium buildings in this region that were similar to our building and asked them about their pet by-law. All condominiums that we visited deemed it "reasonable" for residents to keep a cat as a pet."

She appended to her affidavit the relevant provisions of the Declaration or Rules of the eight Niagara North or South condominium corporations that she visited. In all instances, a cat or dog or, in one case, a cat and dog and, in another case, a dog and one or two cats were permitted. These provisions were all subject to restrictions providing for eviction in the event of the pet creating a nuisance and, in some instances, to other restrictions such as on the use by pets of certain common areas and the weight of the pet. There was also, in one instance, a prohibition respecting a dangerous animal or pet.

[6] Secondly, the Respondents take the position that the condominium Board "has knowingly set a precedent by not enforcing the no pet by-law for 8 years" and has now singled them out for enforcement with "no attempt to apply the no pet by-law fairly". They submitted that they were not notified of the no pet rules before presenting an Offer to Purchase and, indeed, saw cats in several windows and units at various times during their visits to the premises. The details of these allegations are set out below under the heading THE FACTS.

[7] Finally, in support of their position, the Respondents rely on the Ontario Human Rights Code. They submitted that:

"2(a) To cause the Respondents to give up their cat is cruel and inhumane. The cat is 16 years old and they have owned it all its life. Respondent Muriel Joan Chassie suffers mental and physical health problems and removal of her cat would be deleterious to her health."

Further, in her affidavit of September 10, 1998, Mrs. Chassie stated:

"15. In conclusion, our cat has been a beloved, loyal pet for 16 years and is very much part of our family. When I was sick for a very long period of time, she was my constant companion. Her love and devotion helped me through a long depression, a condition I have had, unfortunately, for many years. As well, I suffer from high blood pressure. I find my cat to be a calming presence and influence. To no avail, I have brought this to the attention of the Board in letters from my doctors."

THE FACTS

[8] The facts, which are for the most part not in dispute, are that, about June 1, 1989, a Declaration was registered by a developer under the Condominium Act creating the N.N.C.C. The condominium complex consists of 92 units on twelve floors. Section 23 of the Declaration states:

"No animal, reptile, livestock or fowl, other than small caged birds and/or small fish, shall reside or be kept within any unit, nor be allowed to enter the condominium building. The foregoing restriction on pets shall not be deemed to apply to any specially trained "seeing-eye" dog owned by a visually impaired owner, tenant, resident, or invitee of any dwelling unit."

Section 20 of the Rules and Regulations of the N.N.C.C., as contained in Schedule A to By-law No. 1 thereof, provides similarly:

"No animal, livestock or fowl, other than small caged birds and/or small fish, shall be kept within any unit, nor allowed to enter the condominium building. The foregoing restriction on pets shall not be deemed to apply to any specially trained "seeing-eye" dog of an owner who is visually impaired."

[9] Mr. and Mrs. Chassie purchased and moved into Unit 203 in the condominium complex on or about June 13, 1997, bringing with them their cat, Mineau. In the fall of 1997, it was brought to the attention of Peter Greco, the Vice-President of Cannon Greco Management Limited, which has been the Manager of the N.N.C.C. since its appointment on April 28, 1994, that the Chassies were keeping a cat in their unit contrary to the Declaration and Rules and Regulations. Mr. Greco wrote to the Chassies on December 1, 1997, to ask that the cat be permanently removed from the building by December 15, 1997. On December 15, 1997, Mr. and Mrs. Chassie replied, in part, as follows:

"Further to my telephone conversation of December 3, 1997, at which time I asked for copies of the letters of complaint regarding our cat, you indicated to me that there were no letters of complaint.

We were not made aware of Section 23 until after we purchased our unit. Frank Coy [the real estate agent] or Mr. & Mrs. McGee [the vendors] did not inform us of this Declaration before we purchased. As a matter of fact, when we were looking at a number of units at 3 Towering Heights, we observed two cats in windows and one in a unit we were shown. We, therefore, thought cats were allowed in the building. Had we known cats were not allowed, we would not have purchased.

Our cat is a quiet cat that never leaves our unit. It does not in any way interfere with the comfort and enjoyment of our neighbours.

I am aware of three condo owners with cats in this building that did not receive a letter from you and I am sure there are others that I am not aware of. There have been cats in this building since the very beginning (9-10 years) and there will always be cats in this building. This is an impossible situation to police.

Your letter of December 1, 1997 has upset me greatly and caused me many sleepless nights. Our cat is almost 16 years old and a part of our family."

[10] Mr. Greco replied to the Chassies' letter on December 16, 1997 stating that, while there were no written complaints on file regarding their cat, it is the responsibility of the Board of Directors to enforce the Declaration and the Rules. He added that he would "address" their letter with the Board at the Board meeting in January, 1998.

[11] The Chassies did not comply with the demand to remove the cat. However, on January 11, 1998, Mrs. Chassie again wrote to Mr. Greco. She stated:

"Further to my letter of December 15, 1997, I attach a letter from my Doctor, Dr. J. Henry, for your consideration.

Shortly after moving into our unit, Audry Martin [a Board member] stopped by to welcome us to Southgate. She saw our cat and I remarked that we were not aware of the no pet rule until after we purchased. She stated that Mrs. McGee had already informed her of this and that she was on the Board and they were aware of other cats in the building. She told me not to worry, if there were no complaints, there would be no problem.

Because the no pet provision was not enforced from the beginning, the Board sent a clear message that this "No Pet" rule was not being enforced.

I believe that a reasonable solution to this problem would be to "grandfather" the Rule. When our pet dies, we will not replace it. This is a more peaceful and humane approach."

[12] The January 9, 1998 letter from Dr. Henry states in part:

"Mrs. Chassie's cat has been her companion for 16 years. In my opinion, to force her to abandon it, would cause her extreme emotional distress. I would appeal to the "powers that be" to show compassion and try to find a compromise to this situation."

[13] On January 16, 1998, Mr. Greco wrote one more time to the Chassies reiterating that it is the responsibility of the Board to enforce the Declaration and Rules and informing them that 78% of the owners were in favour of a no pet building and threatening legal action if the cat were not to be removed from the building by January 30, 1998.

[14] On March 27, 1998, at a meeting of the Board of Directors of the N.N.C.C., it was decided to commence a legal action against the Chassies. Mr. Greco, in his affidavit dated April 29, 1998 in support of this Application, stated:

"As far as I am aware, the Respondents are the only unit holders in the condominium building who are contravening the no pets clause contained in the Declaration and in the Rules and Regulations."

[15] While Mr. Greco's statement may, possibly, reflect the state of affairs at the condominium building as of the date the affidavit was sworn, I do not believe it accurately reflects the level of pet ownership in the condominium building over the years or even at the date of his first letter of December 1, 1997, to the Chassies. I am of this opinion partly because of the December 15th letter of the Chassies above and, also, by reason of other evidence submitted by them. This evidence includes excerpts from the Minutes of two meetings of the Board of Directors. In respect of a meeting on September 20, 1995, almost two years before the Chassies purchased their unit, the Minutes state:

"18(f) Mr. Smith commented that there were several cats in the building and asked if it should be allowed to continue. Peter Greco stated that either this issue should be ignored or a complete crackdown on animals in the building be made."

In respect of a meeting on November 25, 1996, the Minutes state:

"Mr. Greco spoke to Glenn Parker who suggested sending letters to all pet owners mentioning this is against the Rules and Regulations. When existing pets cease to reside in the building no new pets will be allowed in the building.

Dr. Wood presented a note submitted to the Board from Mrs. Hazelton (#505) stating she was being harassed over this issue.

Mr. Greco stated that Mrs. Hazelton is moving out of the building at the end of January. Mr. Greco explained that because the Rule has not been enforced up to this point, a precedent has been set and thus it may not stand up in a court of law.

Dr. Wood read a statement submitted by Ray Moen stating that something should be done about this Rule as the Board was elected to uphold the Rules and Regulations.

Brian Neil suggested that a reminder be sent to the owners restating the policy regarding the Rule of pets and trust that the owners will be in compliance of this section of the Declaration.

The Board was in agreement with this suggestion."

[16] There is no evidence that any action was taken pursuant to this suggestion at that time. Indeed, the evidence is that pets continued to remain in the building until and after the Chassies purchased their unit in 1997. Mrs. Chassie stated, in her affidavit of September 10, 1998, as follows:

"1. Prior to purchasing Unit 203 of #3 Towering Heights Boulevard on June 13, 1997, we went several times to this condominium building over a two year period with two different Real Estate agents, one being Nancy Philbrick of Sally McGarr Realty and Sam Cino of Re/Max. On each occasion, from the parking lot, we saw cats in the windows. One of the units through which we were shown had a cat. We assumed that cats were allowed. We would not have purchased in this building if we had known cats were prohibited ...

2. On June 9, 1997, prior to our moving into our unit, the Superintendent, Gwen Biggins gave me an abbreviated list of the Rules and Regulations. When I saw the "No Pets Rule", I told her we had a cat. She replied "So do eight others in the building". This statement reassured me that this By-law was not being enforced.

3. We purchased our unit from Mr. and Mrs. Donald McGee. Mr. McGee had been a Board member and President of NNCC#46 for 3 years. Although he mentioned a number of By-laws, at no time prior to our signing our offer to purchase, did he say that cats were prohibited. Later, when we learned of the By-Law, we told him we had seen cats in the windows and assumed they were allowed. Mr. McGee told us not to worry, that he had been on the Board for several years, and knew there [were] cats in the building from the very beginning (1989). He basically said that the Board was not enforcing the By-Law ...

4. On June 27, 1997 Audrey Martin, a current member of the Board, elected August 13, 1990, came to our unit to welcome us to the condominium. I pointed to our cat and explained we had assumed that cats were allowed because we had seen them in various windows. She said that the McGees had already informed her that we had a cat, but as long as there were no complaints she could see no problem."

[17] From the other available evidence, the above dates appear to correctly reflect the sequence of events except that Mrs. Chassie may have received the abbreviated Rules on June 6 and signed them on June 9. The Offer to Purchase was not included in the evidence but the Land Titles Transfer of Land form was signed by the vendors, Mr. and Mrs. McGee, on May 27, 1997, and probably reflects the approximate date of the Agreement for purchase and sale.

[18] Mrs. Chassie continued her affidavit of September 10, 1998, by stating that she knew that the December 1, 1997 letter to them and a letter of even date to one other resident, Sally Barton of Unit 701, were the first letters the Board had sent to any cat owners respecting the animal by-law because, on June 15, 1998, she had searched through all the Board minutes since 1989 and because, on August 20, 1998, she had confirmed with Mr. Greco that there had been no prior letters.

[19] The allegations of Mrs. Chassie as to the presence of cats on the premises were supported by a number of people. Sam Cino, the real estate sales representative for the Chassies, stated, in an affidavit dated June 25, 1998, that he saw several cats in apartment windows and observed a cat in one of the units he had shown them. John MacPherson, the owner of Unit 502 since August, 1997, stated, in an affidavit dated June 25, 1998, that he had "witnessed" cats in the windows of more than one unit at various times. Mr. Chassie, in an affidavit dated September 10, 1998, stated that the owner of Unit 503, Jim Atcheson, told him that he had kept his cat in his unit (picture of cat in window attached) since purchasing his unit in 1989. Sally Barton, the owner of Unit 701 since 1996, and the only other owner to receive letters from the Board dated December 1, 1997, and January 16, 1998, ordering her to remove her cat stated, in an affidavit dated June 23, 1998, that she is "permanently wheel chair bound" and felt unable, for health reasons, to fight the issue on her own. Consequently, she had her cat taken to a friend's house. When her husband, who works on the boats, comes home, he brings her the cat for the two or three weeks he is there. She stated further:

"My cat is a loved companion and helped me through a severe depression after my 1994 car accident. I miss my cat and am depressed by the Board's insis tence that I get rid of my pet. I think the present Board is being very unreasonable in enforcing a rule which they had not enforced since the condominium was registered in 1989."

[20] While, clearly, there have been more cats living in the building over the years than Mr. Greco was willing to acknowledge, it is also evident that the majority of unit owners are opposed to pets. Dr. Norman Wood, a unit owner since 1988 and a member of the Board of Directors of the N.N.C.C. who chaired the annual meeting of unit owners in September of 1997, in his affidavit of July 15, 1998, stated that the Board of Directors [on October 21, 1997] sought the views of all unit owners respecting the no pet rules and received 66 responses which represents 71% of owners. Of these owners, 49 opposed changing the pet rules and 17 said they would agree with a conditional change. Some owners indicated that they bought units there on the basis of the no pet rules and three owners indicated that they are allergic to cats. Dr. Wood also stated that a no pets sign has been posted on the front door of the condominium complex since about January, 1997.

[21] In her response to the affidavit of Dr. Wood, Mrs. Chassie restated some of her allegations about cats being in the complex over the years to the knowledge of the Board. She also submitted that, since each unit is "concrete enclosed with its own heating and air-conditioning system", a cat "should pose no health problem to someone allergic to cats". In support of this argument she appended a letter from Dr. Donald A. Hitch, M.D.F.R.C.S.[C] of Dundas, Ontario, dated June 22, 1998 which reads as follows:

"Many people are allergic to cat antigen, some suffering violent reactions, in their respiratory tract. In order to have a reaction, the sensitive person has to contact the cat or rooms where the cat has resided.

If a cat were confined to a room or rooms, and that cat never allowed to venture beyond those rooms, there is no possibility that cat antigen could go beyond this restricted area except through a common air circulation system."

[22] Before leaving the facts, I wish to refer in more detail to the subject of Mrs. Chassie's health. In paragraph 2(a) of her responding material and paragraph 15 of her affidavit of September 10, 1998, (both set out above). Mrs. Chassie referred to her mental and physical health problems (depression and high blood pressure) and submitted that removal of her cat, which she finds to be a calming influence, would be deleterious to her health. Further, she submitted several letters from medical practitioners to support her allegations. The letter of Dr. J. Henry, her family physician, dated January 9, 1995, (set out above) refers to the "extreme emotional distress" loss of her cat would cause her. Dr. Henry wrote two further letters dated May 15 and August 8, 1998. They read as follows:

"Mrs. Chassie suffers from high blood pressure. The emotional well-being she gets from her cat are an important component of her treatment.

To separate her from her cat would cause severe emotional and physical detriment to this lady."

"Mrs. Chassie has been under my care since 1995. She has a history of depression dating back to approximately 1977.

More recently she has experienced severe episodes of depression in the spring of 1996, and again in January of 1997.

Mrs. Chassie was receiving treatment, including psychotherapy (sic) and antidepressants (Paxal 20 mg, po OD) from January through April of 1997.

The emotional trauma caused by the legal proceedings surrounding her cat have precipitated a worsening of her depression and antidepressants were initiated in December 1997. (Paxal 30 mg, po OD)."

Further, her former, now retired, family physician, Dr. F. Gillian Richards, wrote a letter dated May 29, 1998 which reads, in part, as follows:

"I was Mrs. Chassie's family physician for many years until the end of 1995 when I retired. I treated her throughout her long debilitating episode of myalgic encephalitis complicated by depression. During the years of her illness, her cat was a constant companion and great source of comfort.

I understand that she has been told to get rid of this cat. However, the animal is sixteen years old (elderly, I understand, for a cat) and unlikely at this age to adapt to a new home. Forcing Mrs. Chassie to put her loyal pet to sleep, or otherwise remove it, will make her feel guilty and could precipitate a relapse of her depression. This seems to be taking an unnecessary risk when the animal is likely to die soon of old age and when it bothers no-one.

I wish to emphasize that I am no long (sic) Mrs. Chassie's doctor, but I write as her former family physician. I recall vividly the years of despair she went through."

Finally, a letter from the Director of Human Resources of Mrs. Chassie's employer, Niagara College, confirms that she was on sick leave from February 13, 1991 to August 9, 1991, inclusive, after having been diagnosed as having myalgic encephalitis and depression.

THE LAW

[23] The Condominium Act provides as follows:

3(3) ... a declaration may contain,

(a) ...

(b) provisions respecting the occupation and use of the units and common elements;

12(3) The corporation has a duty to effect compliance by the owners with this Act, the declaration, the by-laws and the rules.

(5) Each owner ... has the right to the performance of any duty of the corporation specified by this Act, the declaration, the by-laws and the rules.

29(1) The board may make rules respecting the use of common elements and units or any of them to promote the safety, security or welfare of the owners and of the property or for the purpose of preventing unreasonable interference with the use and enjoyment of the common elements and of other units.

(2) The rules shall be reasonable and consistent with this Act, the declaration and the by-laws."

[24] Section 28 of the Condominium Act provides authority for a condominium board to pass by-laws. I have not quoted that section because it would appear, from a reading of subsection 28(1), that restrictions respecting pets are more properly provided for by rules under section 29. In any case, pursuant to subsection 28(4), the by-laws, like the rules, are required to be reasonable and consistent with the Act and the declaration. Subsection 49(1) provides for the corporation and any owner, inter alia, to bring an Application for a court Order to require the performance of any duty and subsection 49(2) provides as follows:

"49(2) The court may by order direct performance of the duty and may include in the order any provisions that the court considers appropriate in the circumstances."

[25] Ontario has recently enacted new legislation entitled the Condominium Act, 1998 which received Royal Assent on December 18, 1998. However, it has not yet been proclaimed. The new Act has amended and clarified the above provisions to some extent. For example, clause 3(3)(b), which provides that a declaration may contain "provisions respecting the occupation and use of the units and common elements", has been replaced by the more specific authority for a declaration to contain "conditions and restrictions with respect to the occupation and use of the units or common elements" (emphasis added). However, the new Act, like the present Act, does not contain any specific provisions relating to pets. Presumably, the law remains unchanged in this regard and declarations and rules will continue to be subject to the interpretations imposed by case law deriving from the present Act. It would appear that it is to remain the responsibility of the court to determine whether a pet prohibition or restriction in a declaration or rule is consistent with the Act and, to the extent required by the Act or case law, reasonable.

1. The Reasonableness of Pet Prohibitions and Restrictions

[26] John Mascarin, Assistant Town Solicitor, Markham, Ontario, in a case comment on York Condominium Corp. No. 382 v. Dvorchik, [1992] 24 R.O.R. (2d) 19, entitled The Enforceability of No Pet Clauses in Condominium Documents, [1992] 24 R.P.R. (2d) 24, reviewed and commented on the law respecting no pet clauses as expressed in that and other cases. It should be noted that this case comment was published before the 1997 Court of Appeal decision reversing the trial decision in Dvorchik. He stated at p. 24:

"No pets" clauses in condominium documents can be found either in the rules, by-laws or declarations of residential condominiums. In considering the validity of such provisions, the courts have typically drawn a distinction in determining the enforceability of such restrictions or prohibitions depending on the mechanism which is used to create the restriction or prohibition. Thus, the decisions have tended to create a varying or sliding scale test depending on the nature of the condominium document creating the regulation. This whole area has been very substantially influenced by recent developments in the law of landlord and tenant."

[27] I agree with Mr. Mascarin's summary of the condominium law respecting the enforceability of no pets provisions and I shall elaborate on these matters further below. At this point, I would simply say that it would appear that a distinction in the enforceability of such provisions arises because both condominium by-laws and rules are required to be reasonable. On the other hand, the Condominium Act does not specifically require a condominium declaration to be reasonable although the case law has, to a certain degree, imputed a requirement for reasonableness into the law respecting declarations. However, any imputed requirement for reasonableness is tempered by a strong presumption as to the validity of declarations.

[28] Mr. Mascarin's statement that the whole area has been substantially influenced by recent developments in the law of landlord and tenant is also interesting. Although he has probably modified his view in the light of the reversal by the Court of Appeal of the trial decision in Dvorchik, his statement raises the question of the extent to which modifications in the law and changes in societal attitudes in one field can influence the law in another related field. Since the subject under consideration is reasonableness and that is a criterium that, in all fields, has evolved over the years, as society has developed, I think it worthwhile, in the context of the present case, to look into the external influences, both legal and societal, that may have some impact on the interpretation of the Condominium Act at this time, as we head into a new millennium.

[29] If outside legal and societal influences have an impact on the interpretation of the Condominium Act in respect of pet prohibitions and restrictions, they do so because they reflect changing values and opinions as to what constitutes reasonable rules for community living. Nowhere are the changes in the attitudes of society respecting the reasonableness of pet prohibitions and restrictions more apparent than in the cases under the former Part IV of the Landlord and Tenant Act and the new Tenant Protection Act, 1997 and in the amendments to the law itself. Therefore, I shall review the developments in the landlord and tenant law before proceeding to consider reasonableness in the broad social sense and in the context of the condominium law.

(1) The Landlord and Tenant Act and Tenants Protection Act, 1997

[30] The cases under the Landlord & Tenant Act, prior to its amendment in 1990, for the most part, subjected the rights of pet owning tenants to the concerns and preferences of landlords and other tenants. These concerns are thoroughly summarized by Gotlib, D.C.J., in her February 2, 1989, judgment in Cassandra Towers v. Ryll, an appeal from which was dismissed without reasons on July 7, 1989. In that case, which is popularly known as the "Fluffy" case, the Respondents, after signing a lease with a no pets clause, kept their cat, Fluffy, in their apartment. While there were no complaints that the cat was bothering other tenants, the landlord applied the no pets clause without exception and brought an Application under clause 109(1)(c) of the Landlord and Tenant Act which provides for eviction where "(c) the conduct of the tenant ... substantially interferes with the reasonable enjoyment of the premises for all purposes by the landlord or other tenants." The position of the Applicant was that allowing pets would increase maintenance costs in the common and private areas. Also, the Applicant expressed concern for the safety of the tenants and the possible damage that might be caused by an animal.

[31] The position of the Respondents was that they should be allowed to keep their cat because there was a lack of affordable housing and they had a great emotional attachment to the cat, which had been their pet for 16 years. Their evidence was that the cat never left their apartment except to go to the veterinarian and had never created any odour or caused a problem of any kind. There were no complaints about it. Evidence was also given that Mrs. Ryll was in poor health to the point of requiring a wheel chair at times and that it was likely that, if the cat were to be evicted, "the inevitable result would be that she would have to be put down or euthanised".

[32] Despite her "sympathy" for Mrs. Ryll, and although "mindful of the public issues involved", Gotlib, J., observed that the duty of the Court is "to apply the law as it exists both by way of statute and decided cases". Accordingly, on the basis of the case law and because the landlord had consistently enforced the no pets provision and all the tenants had signed the same no pets agreement and expected that there would be no animals on the premises, she found that the Rylls' conduct in keeping the cat substantially interfered with the reasonable enjoyment of the premises by the landlord and the other tenants. On those grounds, the Application by the landlord was allowed and an Order made that, if the cat were not to be relocated before a specific date, a writ of possession was to issue.

[33] In support of her decision, Gotlib, J., cited various cases. In one of those cases, Kay v. Parkway Forest Development (1982), 35 O.R. (2d) at 392, Linden, J., for the Divisional Court, stated that the court, in deciding whether to enforce a no pets clause, should consider "the nature of the conduct complained of, its duration, its extent and its seriousness". In that case, a no pets clause, alone, was held to be insufficient to cause the eviction of a dog loved by all the tenants. In the Kay case, and some other cases cited by Gotlib, J., the decision was based on whether, regardless of a no pets clause, the conduct complained of was contrary to the Landlord and Tenant Act in that it actually substantially interfered with the reasonable enjoyment of the premises by the landlord and other tenants. However, in many other cases, it was held that simple evidence of complaints made by tenants, or the strict and consistent enforcement of a no pets rule by a landlord, was sufficient grounds to establish substantial interference on the basis that the landlord and other tenants had a right to have the covenants enforced. Further, in at least one case, judicial notice was taken that some people are allergic to or have an aversion to cats.

[34] After the Ryll decision, there was considerable public and press sympathy for the plight of the Rylls and concern about the arbitrary limitations on the right of tenants to possess pets, even long term members of the family. One further decision the next year, 1990, added to the momentum for change. In Montcrest Towers v. Withers, [1990], a decision by Rapson, D.C.J., on May 31, 1990, an Application for the termination of the tenancies of three different tenants was granted. As stated in the head note to the case:

"The court accepted the evidence that animals allowed on the premises caused allergic problems, dirt, noise, odour and increased the landlord's maintenance costs. There was a reasonable expectation of all tenants that they would be living in a pet free environment. Taking all factors into consideration, the court concluded that the presence of pets amounted to a substantial interference with the reasonable enjoyment of the premises by other tenants and the landlord. Under the circumstances the court refused to exercise its discretion under section 121 of the Landlord and Tenant Act and granted the landlord the writs of possession."

[35] The Withers case was very quickly followed by amendments to the Landlord and Tenant Act designed to provide criteria to be used by the courts when considering Applications for the termination of tenancy agreements where the mere keeping of pets by a tenant was the landlord's main complaint. On introducing the amendments in Legislature, the then Attorney General of Ontario, the Honourable Ian Scott, referred to the decisions in the Withers and Ryll cases and explained the purpose of the Bill (as quoted by Cusson, J., in Couch v. Deopersaud, on February 14, 1991) as follows:

""The purpose of the Bill is to protect tenants from eviction if they have well-behaved pets that have not caused harm and are not dangerous.

Until last year it was clearly understood that breach of a no-pet provision in a lease was not a sufficient ground for eviction. Eviction is only permitted if the landlord proves that one of the grounds sets out in the Landlord and Tenant Act has been met. Eviction is possible if, for example, a pet has substantially interfered with other tenants.

On May 31 of this year, however, a judge evicted three tenants although there were no complaints about behaviour of their pets. The judge decided in a wide-ranging decision, that the mere presence of a pet, even a harmless pet, could amount to a substantial interference with others. The judge relied heavily on the fact that all tenants had signed leases prohibiting pets. A similar result in a narrower framework occurred in a case last year.

The amendments in this Bill will ensure a careful balancing of the rights of landlords and tenants.

The amendments recognize that in a building where animals have caused problems, it may be difficult for the landlord to identify specifically which pet or pets are responsible. If a landlord is seeking to evict a tenant because of a pet, therefore, the amendments will require the landlord to prove [that] animals of the same species as the tenant's have caused problems."

[36] He concluded his remarks as follows:

"I believe these amendments strike a fair balance that will permit action to be taken against irresponsible pet owners but will protect tenants whose pets are well behaved, do not cause harm and are not dangerous.""

[37] The amendments continued the prior law in that they permitted a landlord to apply for the termination of a tenancy where:

"107(c) the conduct of the tenant or a person permitted in the residential premises by the tenant is such that it substantially interferes with the reasonable enjoyment of the premises for all usual purposes by the landlord or the other tenants;

(d) the safety or other lawful right, privilege or interest of any other tenant in the residential premises is or has been seriously impaired by an act or omission of the tenant ..."

However, while those provisions were similar to the provisions of the previous law, the amendments went further to provide specifically for the manner in which the law was to be applied where an Application for termination of a tenancy agreement was based on the presence, control or behaviour of an animal on the premises. The amendments prescribed a double test that must be met before an eviction order could be made, whether or not there was a no pets agreement in place. Firstly, pursuant to subsections 107(6) and 108(1), the judge must be satisfied that:

"(a) the past behaviour of an animal of that species has substantially interfered with the reasonable enjoyment of the premises for all usual purposes by the landlord or the other tenants;

(b) the presence of an animal of that species has caused the landlord or another tenant to suffer a serious allergic reaction; or

(c) the presence of an animal of that species or breed is inherently dangerous to the safety of the landlord or the other tenants."

Even where one of the general tests set out in subsection 107(6) or clause 108(1) (a) or (b) was met, an Order still could not be issued if the judge was satisfied that the particular animal kept by the tenant did not cause or contribute to the substantial interference or to the allergic reaction. The general test relating to danger was not made subject to the second test relating to the particular animal. Further, pursuant to subsection 109(1), the provisions of a tenancy agreement respecting pets could not be considered in making a determination pursuant to section 107 or 108.

[38] The 1990 amendments to the Landlord and Tenant Act were somewhat lengthy and cumbersome. This is possibly why the law was clarified and refined in the Tenant Protection Act, 1997, which replaced Part IV of the Landlord and Tenant Act, effective June 17, 1998. It provides, in part, as follows:

"No pet" provisions void

15. A provision in a tenancy agreement prohibiting the presence of animals in or about the residential complex is void.

Termination for cause, reasonable enjoyment

64(1) A landlord may give a tenant notice of termination of the tenancy if the conduct of the tenant, another occupant of the rental unit or a person permitted in the residential complex by the tenant is such that it substantially interferes with the reasonable enjoyment of the residential complex for all usual purposes by the landlord or another tenant or substantially interferes with another lawful right, privilege or interest of the landlord or another tenant.

Termination for cause, act impairs safety

65(1) A landlord may give a tenant notice of termination if,

(a) an act or omission of the tenant, another occupant of the rental unit or a person permitted in the residential complex by the tenant seriously impairs or has seriously impaired the safety of any person; and

(b) the act or omission occurs in the residential complex.

Application based on animals

74(2) If an application based on a notice of termination under section 64 or 65 is grounded on the presence, control or behaviour of an animal in or about the residential complex, the Tribunal shall not make an order terminating the tenancy and evicting the tenant without being satisfied that the tenant is keeping an animal and that,

(a) subject to subsection (3), the past behaviour of an animal of that species has substantially interfered with the reasonable enjoyment of the residential complex for all usual purposes by the landlord or other tenants;

(b) subject to subsection (4), the presence of an animal of that species has caused the landlord or another tenant to suffer a serious allergic reaction; or

(c) the presence of an animal of that species or breed is inherently dangerous to the safety of the landlord or the other tenants.

Same

(3) The Tribunal shall not make an order terminating the tenancy and evicting the tenant relying on clause (2) (a) if it is satisfied that the animal kept by the tenant did not cause or contribute to the substantial interference.

Same

(4) The Tribunal shall not make an order terminating the tenancy and evicting the tenant relying on clause (2)(b) if it is satisfied that the animal kept by the tenant did not cause or contribute to the allergic reaction."

This is the current law applicable to landlords and tenants. It sets standards for eviction that have a reasonable basis and are not merely founded on the preferences of landlords and some anti-pet tenants. The standards are basically nuisance (reasonable enjoyment), health (allergic reaction) and danger.

[39] The landlord and tenant cases since 1990 reflect the need to show substantial interference with the enjoyment of the premises that goes further than a mere no pets agreement and constitutes actual substantial interference. For instance, an Application to terminate a tenancy agreement was allowed in Denewood Apartments v. Dodds [1993] wherein the issue was the noise caused by the three dogs kept by a tenant. On the other hand, an Application was, in effect, not allowed in Thunder Bay District Housing Authority v. Stephens (1990), 12 R.P.R. (2d) 247 decided by Kurisko, D.C.J., while the amendments to the Act were pending. In that case, two cats were kept by a tenant contrary to a no pets clause in a lease. Similarly, in Dassios v. Budai (1996), 2 R.P.R. (3d) 206, Pitt, J., found that the mere presence of a dog in a rental unit was not sufficient grounds to terminate a tenancy notwithstanding a no pets clause in the rental application signed by the tenants. He found that the dog was quiet and well behaved and did not interfere with the reasonable enjoyment of the premises.

[40] As is apparent from the above statutory amendments and case law, the attitudes of the law and society respecting the reasonableness of pet prohibitions and restrictions in the landlord and tenant field have evolved significantly over the years so that, no longer, can mere anti pet preferences result in a finding that the presence of a pet in a residential complex constitutes substantial interference with the reasonable enjoyment of the complex by other people. Now, the balance of rights based on the test of reasonableness, at least in this field, has shifted to favour tolerance of pets in a residential complex unless there is a genuine substantial reason for their exclusion, such as nuisance, the potential for allergic reactions or danger.

(2) The Therapeutic Value of Pets

[41] As stated above, the attitudes of society respecting the reasonableness of pet prohibitions and restrictions have evolved significantly over the years as is particularly evident from developments in the landlord and tenant laws. Before leaving the topic of the evolution of social attitudes, I should like to briefly direct attention to current expressions of views outside the legal system as to the value of domestic animals.

[42] In considering what are the present attitudes of society towards pets and their value for physical and mental therapeutic purposes, I have paid close heed to recent newspaper reports respecting domestic animals. It has long been recognized that seeing eye or guide dogs are vital helpmates to their owners and should be allowed to accompany them everywhere. But what about other animals? Let me refer to some of the recent articles I have noted, all of which, except the last one, were published in the St. Catharines Standard.

[43] In his syndicated column, "Dr. Game", W. Gifford Jones, in an article published September 14, 1998, entitled "Dog's bark warns of epileptic attack", commented on reports of various disability support animals including a schnauzer which invariably warns its owner about 40 minutes before an epileptic attack and a brown Labrador dog which has been trained to assist and restrict some activities of an autistic child much as a guide dog does for a blind person. He explained that the Labrador dog was trained by a Burlington, Ontario, not-for-profit organization founded in 1996 to provide service dogs for Canadians suffering from epilepsy, hearing loss, physical disabilities and autism. Surely, animals trained to assist persons with physical disabilities are as necessary to the owners who rely on them as seeing eye or guide dogs and should be widely accepted.

[44] Let me now turn to what is currently being said about animals which might be termed companion or comfort animals and their value to the mental well being of people. The growing awareness of the extent to which animals improve the mental and physical well being of people has been recognized by the St. John Ambulance Society by its institution of its Therapy Dog Program. An article entitled "Dr. Champ", published January 9, 1999, describes the program and the regular visits of a German shepherd named Champ and his owner, Henry Clement, to two homes for seniors in St. Catharines. The article states in part:

"During regular visits to hospitals and nursing homes, program members and their dogs provide companionship to the sick and the lonely ...

A small dose of Champ goes a long way toward improving a resident's physical and mental well-being. Therapy dogs have been shown to lower blood pressure and help people relax, Clement said.

Since its inception in Ontario, thousands of pets have become therapy dogs.

"It's a very, very worthwhile program," said Manzuk. [Kevin Manzuk, coordinator for the program in St. Catharines] "It's amazing to see what these dogs do. They lift people's spirits; they bring people out of their shells."

[45] Other organizations, as well as the St. John Ambulance Society, have recognized the importance of animals for mental therapy. I take judicial notice of the fact that many seniors homes in St. Catharines and elsewhere retain at least one resident dog or cat and I have been informed of a senior's home in St. Catharines that keeps a cat as a pet on every floor. Further, I have personally observed how the faces and eyes of sick or wheelchair bound seniors in hospitals and homes light up when they are approached by a friendly animal. They can hardly wait to pat or cuddle it. Objections are rare.

[46] Turning from animals as guests or residents in institutions to companion animals in the home, I would refer to an article by the syndicated columnist, Dr. Robert Wallace, published in late 1998 and entitled "Some Therapists can purr or bark". In the article, Dr. Wallace refers to "what some professionals have to offer on this subject" [pets]:

"Pets make you laugh and take your mind off your troubles. They are marvellous therapeutic agents," says Dr. James Lynch, professor of psychology at the University of Maryland and an expert on loneliness ...

The day may soon come when pets are prescribed instead of pills, says Dr. Leo Bustad, dean of Veterinary Medicine at Washington State University. Scientists, psychologists and physicians all around the world are finding that the companionship of pets can improve your health and even help you live longer."

[47] Finally, I would refer to an article on the St. Petersburg Times of Florida dated November 27, 1998, entitled "Troubled juveniles to train dogs for elderly companions." The article describes how, pursuant to an idea conceived by an appeals court judge, teens (now boys and soon girls) incarcerated in Florida correction centres are being trained, in a program called FETCH, to teach dogs intended to be donated as companions for elderly people. The program provides further for special benefits such as free dog food and veterinary care to be provided to recipients of dogs who enlist them in a community service program.

[48] While the above newspaper reports and other observations could hardly be called empirical scientific evidence, I think they do give some indication of developing professional and social attitudes as to the value of pets for therapeutic purposes both in the sense of the reliance on the animals for assistance with physical disabilities and in the sense of the mental and physical comfort provided by a loving pet.

[49] In deciding to incorporate into this judgment, both under this heading and in my conclusions respecting the reasonableness of pet prohibitions, facts not proved in the evidence, I have been influenced by the thinking of the Honourable Mr. Justice Thomas A. Cromwell of the Nova Scotia Court of Appeal, as set out in a Paper prepared for presentation at the Ontario Court (General Division) Education Seminar "Judging in a Diverse Society" held October 28-30, 1998. He stated:

"The great American evidence scholar, James Bradley Thayer wrote in 1898 that in judicial reasoning, as in any other kind of reasoning "... not a step can be taken without assuming something which has not been proved." Judges and juries must bring to their task a wide array of facts and a multitude of understandings about the nature of things -- in short, common knowledge and common sense. Resort to facts not proved in evidence is, in this sense, necessary because the task of judging is impossible without it. Reliance on extra-record facts is, therefore, not something which is suspect, but something which is essential.

The use of extra-record facts is necessary in another sense. Judges and juries are permitted -- indeed required -- to know what is known to intelligent persons generally in the community. This is required not only for the proper carrying out of judicial duties, but for maintaining public confidence in the process. The results reached by judges and juries are not likely to be respected if they appear to be ignorant of things that everybody else knows.

Not only is use of extra-record facts necessary in both of these ways, it is also desirable. As Edmund M. Morgan put it in his leading article, "Judicial Notice" (1944), 57 Harv. L. Rep. 269, "... if the common law is to grow through adaptation to changing conditions by means of judicial decisions, the device by which knowledge of the changed conditions becomes part of the court's working equipment is judicial notice." The flexibility and adaptability of the common law depend, at least in part, on the use of evolving conceptions of common knowledge and common sense."

(3) The Condominium Act

[50] Subsection 3(3) of the Condominium Act, set out above immediately after the heading THE LAW, provides that a declaration may contain provisions respecting the occupation and use of the units and common elements. Further, subsection 29(1) provides that the board of a condominium corporation may make rules respecting the use of common elements and units to promote the safety, security or welfare of the owners and property or for the purpose of preventing unreasonable interference with the use and enjoyment of the common elements and of other units. The rules are specifically required to be reasonable and the case law indicates the declaration should be reasonable. As I stated above, there may be some distinctions in enforcement depending on whether a pet prohibition is contained in the declaration or in the rules of a condominium. Because, in the present case, the prohibition is in the Declaration as well as in the Rules and, because the presumption of validity is stronger in respect of provisions in declarations, I shall direct my attention more to the cases relating to prohibitions in declarations than to those in condominium rules.

[52] In Peel Condominium Corporation No. 78 v. Harthen et al (1978), 20 O.R. (2d) 225, the Declaration creating the condominium corporation contained a prohibition against pets. Because some unit owners were either misled by representatives of the developer or actually assured by them that pets would be permitted, some 22 out of 204 unit owners acquired or continued to possess pets after moving in the complex and resisted attempts to have them comply with the prohibition. Misener, Co. Ct. J., held that, although the change in the proposed declaration by the developer to include a no pets provision might be unfair or unjust, it was a deliberate change and the condominium corporation had a duty to effect compliance. Also, since the great majority of the owners had adhered to the prohibition, he decided that he was duty bound to exercise his judicial discretion in favour of allowing the Application.

[53] In Re Carleton Condominium Corp. No. 279 and Rochon et al (1987), 59 O.R. (2d) 545, (C.A.) the respondents, in purchasing a penthouse unit from the condominium developer, included in the agreement the right to install a satellite dish on the roof. This arrangement was not included in the Declaration and, as the existence of the dish was opposed by the condominium corporation after the unit owners had taken control of it, an Application was brought for its removal. The Court of Appeal allowed an appeal from an Order dismissing an Application to remove the dish. Finlayson, J.A., stated at p. 552:

"The declaration, description and by-laws, including the rules, are therefore vital to the integrity of the title acquired by the unit owner. He is not only bound by their terms and provisions, but he is entitled to insist that the other unit owners are similarly bound. There is no place in this scheme for any private arrangement between the developer and an individual unit owner. If an individual arrangement is made, it must be disclosed in the declaration (s. 3(1)(f))."

He stated further at p. 553:

"I do not believe that the declarant can unilaterally change the declaration, cause the corporation to change it, or excuse individual unit owners from compliance therewith."

He went on to conclude at p. 555 that, while an order of this nature is discretionary, he was not persuaded that this was a proper case for the court to exercise its discretion in favour of the Respondents.

[54] In Metropolitan Toronto Condominium Corp. No. 776 v. Gifford (1989), 6 R.P.R. (2d) 217, a unit purchaser who was confined to a wheel chair and who relied on his small poodle for comfort and support acted, in bringing the dog into his unit, on the statement of a developer's agent that small dogs were permitted in the condominium whereas, in fact, pets were prohibited by the Declaration. An Application to remove the dog was allowed although no complaint about its behaviour had been made. Herold, D.C.J. first considered the Ontario Human Rights Code and found that subsection 46(2) (now 47(2)) of the Code does not apply to cause the Code to prevail over the Declaration because subsection 46(2) of the Code provides only that the Code prevails over an Act or a Regulation and a declaration is not such an enactment. Further, although Mr. Gifford suffered from a handicap, as it is defined in the Code, he was not being discriminated against pursuant to section 10 of the Code in that no person (handicapped or otherwise) was allowed to have a pet on the property. He added at p. 222:

"Even if this were not so I would have found that the exception contained in section 10(1)(a) of the Code which excepts those requirements, qualifications or factors which are reasonable and bona fide in circumstances would apply ..."

He then turned to the Declaration and found that the no pets clause was reasonable in that it was agreed to by the majority of the occupants. Also, the covenant did not seem unfair to him in that it was not simple a blanket arbitrary no pets clause but rather permitted a guide dog, one cat, fish and certain caged birds and animals. He concluded that his discretion should be exercised in favour of enforcing the Declaration. Referring to the misleading information provided by the agent of the developer, he followed the Court of Appeal decision in Rochon, above, in stating that there is no place for a private arrangement between a developer and an individual owner that is not disclosed in the Declaration.

[55] In York Region Condominium Corp. No. 585 v. Gilbert [1990], dated January 23, 1990, Gilbert, D.C.J., followed the reasoning in Gifford in enforcing a no pets provision in a condominium declaration and ordering the eviction of a Collie dog about which there had been several complaints. The unit owners had been made aware of the provision before purchasing the unit and taking possession of it. Gilbert, D.C.J., quoted the judgment of Allen, J., in York Condominium Corporation No. 216 v. Borsodi et al. at p. 107, wherein Allen, J., quoted Judge Moore of the District Court of Appeal of Florida in Hidden Harbour Estates, Inc. v. Basso (1981), 393 (2d) 637 at pp. 639 and 640 as follows:

""There are essentially two categories of cases in which a condominium association attempts to enforce rules of restrictive uses. The first category is that dealing with the validity of restrictions found in the declaration of condominium itself. The second category of cases involves the validity of rules promulgated by the association's board of directors or the refusal of the board of directors to allow a particular use when the board is invested with the power to grant or deny a particular use.

(1) In the first category, the restrictions are clothed with a very strong presumption of validity which arises from the fact that each individual unit owner purchases his unit knowing of and accepting the restrictions to be imposed. Such restrictions are very much in the nature of covenants running with the land and they will not be invalidated absent a showing that they are wholly arbitrary in their application, in violation of public policy, or that they abrogate some fundamental constitutional right.""

Gilbert, D.C.J., commented that "the rationale of that judgment is of assistance and applicable to the present case". He concluded by stating: "It seems to me that a prohibitive pet restriction could be contained in the Declaration or the bylaws or the rules of a condominium corporation provided that the prohibitive pet restrictions is brought to the attention of a purchaser of a condominium unit prior to the closing of the sale and purchase of the unit. ..."

As long as a restriction in a Declaration bylaw or rule of a condominium corporation is intra vires and is reasonable and consistent with the condominium Act, it should be enforceable."

[56] Similarly, in Peel Condominium Corp. No. 338 v. Young [1996], Webber, J., followed the reasoning in Gifford and Gilbert and allowed an Application to evict a dog which exceeded the 25 pound restriction on pets contained in the Declaration. In so doing, he said that he agreed with counsel that it is an implied term of a Declaration that a pet restriction should be reasonable. However, the weight restriction was "more reasonable than a blanket denial of pets". While the dog was much needed, it was not as necessary to the respondents as the dog referred to in Gifford or in the 1993 decision of Hogg, J., in Ferris, reviewed below, in which an Order was made to permit a hearing assist dog to remain in a condominium.

[57] The last case cited by the Applicants was Peel Condominium Corp. No. 449 v. Hogg (1997), 8 R.P.R. (3d) 145, another case in which the original declarant of a condominium corporation did not enforce the pet prohibition provisions in the Declaration while it controlled the corporation from 1993 to 1995. As a result, numerous unit owners acquired pets. When the first unit owner Board of Directors was elected in 1995, it turned its attention to the perceived pet problem and all owners, except the Respondent, agreed to remove their pets. Carnwath, J., held, following Rochon and Gifford, that the equitable doctrines of laches and acquiescence do not apply to validate a private agreement made between the declarant and some unit owners in the light of the immediate action taken by the first unit owners' Board of Directors. Consequently, he exercised his discretion in favour of enforcing the Declaration.

[58] In support of their position, the Respondents referred to two cases wherein Applications to evict pets were dismissed.

[59] In York Condominium Corporation No. 375 v. Dodd, dated April 13, 1987, Trotter, D.C.J., refused to enforce a no pets provision in a Declaration where the Respondents had owned the dog for eight years, it was not a nuisance and it was required for the health of Mrs. Dodd. The evidence of her poor health and the need for her dog was supported by a letter from her doctor. Trotter, D.C.J., stated:

"I put this case on a parallel and on the same basis that I would with someone that required a seeing eye dog."

He added that "... only because the reasons are extraordinary" was he dismissing the Application. He indicated that he did not intend the decision to be an excuse for other people to disobey the Declaration. In his judgment, he referred only to the facts and did not review the law.

[60] In Waterloo North Condominium Corp. No. 198 v. Donner, (1997), 36 O.R. (3d) 243, 15 R.P.R. (3d) 134, Salhany, J., dismissed an Application to evict a "hearing ear" dog from a condominium unit in spite of a no pets provision in the condominium Declaration. In that case, the Respondent purchased a unit in 1988 and agreed to abide by the Declaration and Rules. After renting the unit to tenants for several years, in 1977, she moved into the unit with her mother who was totally deaf and relied on her dog to assist her in hearing heat and smoke alarms, the telephone and the entrance intercom. Salhany, J., dismissed the Application on the grounds that the Declaration contravened the Human Rights Code. He stated:

"In this case, s. 29(1) of the Condominium Act has no application to these proceedings. Section 29(1) deals with rules governing the use of common elements and the units. Section 29(2) requires that such rules "be reasonable and consistent with" the Act, the declaration and the by-laws. We are dealing here with a declaration. The question of the "reasonableness" of the declaration is not an issue that may be attacked. Even assuming that it is an issue, I am not convinced that a "no pet" restriction is unreasonable. Surely those purchasers of a unit who understood that they were buying into a "no pet" building are entitled to have that understanding protected. If the respondent is to succeed in this application, then it must, in my view, be on the basis that the declaration violates the Ontario Human Rights Code.

With respect, I cannot agree with Herold J. that the Code does not apply to a declaration made under the Condominium Act. As McIntyre J. noted in Ontario Human Rights Commission v. Etobicoke (Borough), [1982] 1 S.C.R. 202 at p. 214, 3 C.H.R.R. 781 at p. 785, "[t]he Ontario Human Rights Code has been enacted by the legislature of the Province of Ontario for the benefit of the community at large and of its individual members". The parties are not entitled to contract out of its provisions. To allow the parties to do so would be contrary to public policy. Surely, a declaration prohibiting accommodation based on race, such as a "no blacks or a "no whites" clause, would offend and not be tolerated by right-thinking members of the Canadian community. It would conflict with the Code, notwithstanding that the unit buyers contracted to live in an "all white" or an "all black" building. I cannot see why handicapped people are entitled to any less protection under the Code. In my view, the Human Rights Code precludes enforcement of the declaration if it would result in the discrimination of Ms. Donner's mother because of her specific handicap.

Ms. Rose argued that the declaration does not prohibit Ms. Donner's mother from living in the condominium, only her dog. The difficulty which I find with that argument is that enforcement of the declaration would effectively prohibit her from living in the building. The evidence is that she is 85 years of age and has been deaf for many years. She is fully dependent on her dog to enable her to function on her own. For example, the dog assists her in hearing the heat alarms, smoke alarms, the telephone, and the intercom if someone is at the door. In other words, it is the dog who hears for her and alerts [her] so that she can function without the assistance of another human being.

In my view, it is not incumbent on Ms. Donner to establish that there are no other ways for her mother to function independently of her without a dog, such as with the hiring of a housekeeper. There is no obligation upon her to exhaust every other means of assistance before she is entitled to the protection of the Ontario Human Rights Code."

In so deciding, Salhany, J., was relying on subsection 2(1) of the Code which provides:

"2.(1) Every person has a right to equal treatment with respect to occupancy of accommodations, without discrimination because of ... handicap ...".

Because section 10 of the Code defines handicap to include "deafness or hearing impediment", to enforce the Declaration would, in fact, result in discrimination against Mrs. Donner's mother.

[61] In addition to the cases cited by the parties, there are two other cases to which I wish to make reference.

[62] In Nippissing Condominium Corp. No. 24 v. Ferris [1993] Hogg, J., after a careful analysis of Gifford, dismissed an Application to evict a well behaved Maltese dog belonging to an eighty year old woman who was in bad health and suffered from hearing problems. Although the dog was not trained under the Hearing Ear Dog program, it, in fact, served as a hearing assist dog and, hence, was a therapy utility animal and not merely a companion animal providing emotional support as was the situation in the Gifford case.

[63] In York Condominium Corp. No. 382 v. Dvorchik et al (1992), 24 R.P.R. (2d) 19, a condominium Rule provided that pets must not exceed 25 pounds at maturity. The two unit purchasers who owned dogs which exceeded this weight were both aware of the rule when they brought the dogs into the building and were not, in any way, misled or misinformed about the Rule. Keenan, J., dismissed the two Applications to evict the dogs stating that the evidence proffered in support of the rule failed to meet the test in subsection 29(1) of the Condominium Act that the "safety security or welfare of the owners" was more threatened by large dogs than by small dogs. He considered it to be "unreasonable to condemn a dog who is not guilty of misconduct, simply because of its size." Also, in his view, there was no evidence that large dogs unreasonably interfere with the use and enjoyment of the common elements and of other units any more than small dogs. He concluded that the rule was unreasonable and not valid. This was the decision that led Mr. Mascarin, in the case comment referred to above, to conclude that the condominium law had been substantially influenced by the recent developments in the law of landlord and tenant.

[64] On the appeal in Dvorchik, [1997] the Court of Appeal reversed the decision of Keenan, J., stating in its endorsement as follows:

"In an application brought under s. 49(1), a court should not substitute its own opinion about the propriety of a rule enacted by a condominium board unless the rule is clearly unreasonable or contrary to the legislative scheme. In the absence of such unreasonableness, deference should be paid to rules deemed appropriate by a board charged with responsibility for balancing the private and communal interests of the unit owners.

With respect, we do not agree that the rule restricting the size of pets is either unreasonable or inconsistent with the Condominium Act. This is a condominium with several hundred units and over a thousand residents. On its face, it is both reasonable and consistent with the legislation that there be a limit on the size - or for that matter the number - of pets to prevent the possibility of "unreasonable interference with the use and enjoyment of the common elements and of the other units." There are, undoubtedly, different approaches the board could have taken to regulate the keeping of pets owned by residents, and it may be that the "25 pound rule" is not the best rule or the least arbitrary. But this does not make it an unreasonable one."

(4) Conclusions Respecting the Reasonableness of Pet Provisions

[65] My consideration of the question of reasonableness in the context of the developing statute and case law in the landlord and tenant and condominium fields, and in the context of societal views, generally, as to the value of domestic animals, has led me to the conclusion that, as modern society has developed and evolved into the electronic age, the law and societal attitudes have also evolved to give rise to new concepts as to what are reasonable rules for community living and to a greater appreciation as to how pets can appropriately fit into a closely knit community.

[66] When condominiums first became popular about thirty years ago, developers and unit owners were less experienced in crafting declarations, by-laws and rules than they are today. As building standards were less stringent and many buildings may have had less sound proofing and less control of air circulation, than they do today, it made sense to write fairly stringent declarations, by-laws and rules to promote the safety, security and welfare of the owners and of the property and for the purpose of preventing unreasonable interference with the use and enjoyment of the units and common elements. Given the, then, legally approved practice in rental accommodation agreements of trying to avoid problems of nuisance and allergies by prohibiting pets, it is not surprising that condominium corporations followed established precedents and banned pets. Similarly, they banned businesses in most residential condominiums. Here, again, the object probably was to protect the peace and enjoyment of the residential community by excluding an activity that could create a nuisance. Businesses might create noise or odours and bring strangers, namely, employees and customers, onto the property together with motor vehicles that could plug parking lots.

[67] What made sense thirty years ago is not necessarily reasonable today. In the electronic age, a business is often conducted by computer with none of the nuisance and traffic problems of the past. Yet, condominium corporations have been slow to recognize this evolution and permit residents to engage in private non-intrusive businesses. Similarly, in the field of tenancy accommodation, the law has been revised to recognize better building construction and ventilation and provide a more sophisticated and reasonable approach to animal control, that of regulation to prevent genuine problems rather than total prohibition. In the 1990s, two governments of Ontario have amended the landlord and tenant legislation to shift the balance of rights respecting pet ownership from emphasis on the preferences and concerns of landlords to greater tolerance of animals based on standards that allow the ouster of pets only where there is genuine substantial interference with the reasonable enjoyment of the premises by other people. No such amendments have been made to the Condominium Act and here, once more, many condominium corporations have been slow to change with the changing times and the needs of a modern society.

[68] While condominium residency is based on ownership rather than tenancy, in either case the building or related group of buildings may consist of a few units or be a large residential complex. In both kinds of land holding, people frequently live together in fairly close quarters. Given the similarities in living arrangements between rental and condominium units, a question arises as to why prohibitive rules that are unreasonable in respect of tenancy accommodation should be reasonable in respect of condominium accommodation.

[69] On the one hand it can be argued, as John Mascarin did at p. 28 of the case comment cited above:

"The community of interest shared by all members of a condominium corporation should be enough to permit one member to enforce (through the condominium corporation) a rule against another member without the requirement that extraneous, statutorily mandated safeguards be fulfilled."

On the other hand, it can be said that this point of view is simply an extension of the continuing, and possibly outdated, belief that majority preference should prevail even where there is no genuine substantial interference by one unit owner in the reasonable enjoyment of premises by another unit owner. Is that attitude reasonable today?

[70] Proponents of the position that group preference is a reasonable basis for pet prohibition rules would probably submit that people should be entitled to buy into what they expect to be a pet free environment and that, if purchasers know the rules when they choose to buy a condominium unit, it is reasonable to expect them to obey those rules. There is some merit in that argument. However, life, particularly in present day society, is not always that simple. In the Donner case, cited above, Mrs. Donner purchased a unit knowing the rules. After renting the unit to tenants for several years, she moved into her unit bringing with her her elderly mother and a dog which acted as a hearing assist dog for her mother. Should she have been denied occupancy of her unit because of a change in circumstances? Salhany, J., in effect, answered that question in the negative on the basis of the Human Rights Code. However, there may be many other changes in the circumstances of unit owners in which it might be reasonable for them to keep a pet but in which it is questionable whether the Human Rights Code would apply. For example, as a person becomes older, he or she may lose a spouse and, for the first time in his or her life, begin to live alone. Should that person be forced to give up his or her condominium home if he or she tries to avoid depression and loneliness by acquiring a small four legged companion? Similarly, a unit owner may have an accident or illness and become housebound or wheelchair bound and, at that time, begin to feel a need for the comfort that can be provided by a small and faithful companion. (I think of Mr. Gifford and his small poodle in the Gifford case and of Sally Barton, the wheelchair bound unit owner in the present case, who has also been ordered to give up her cat.) It is not the young and the strong, who can easily adapt to the vicissitudes of life, or even healthy middle aged people, who may have or develop a need to enjoy the benefits of pet ownership. It is the sick, the incapacitated and the elderly who may have a pressing need for such support but be torn between retaining their condominium home and seeking the comfort and companionship of a pet. These are the same groups of people who are the most likely to wish to relinquish single family homes in favour of some group accommodation that will provide greater security and less home management. In the past, such people often moved in with their children or other family members or were sent straight to nursing homes. Now, many people wish to opt for the intermediate step of a condominium. Should such persons be forced either to remain in their single family homes or to choose rental accommodation because they are loathe to abandon a long time four footed member of their family as Dr. Wood, in his affidavit dated July 15, 1998, said he did with his five year old schnauzer on moving into the N.N.C.C. complex in 1988?

[71] Another argument supporting the proposition that a pet prohibition is reasonable is the allergies argument. Again, this argument has some merit although I think it can be met by reasonable restrictions rather than by an outright prohibition. This is particularly true where the animal can be, and like the cat in the present case is, confined to the owners' quarters and where the ventilation system is a modern one that precludes the spread of antigens from one unit to another.

[72] My consideration of the law and its development and of societal changes over the last few decades has led me to the conclusion that a total prohibition of animals and, in particular, of dogs and cats, is not reasonable today. That is not to say that any particular set of standards, such as those contained in the new landlord and tenant legislation, is particularly reasonable and ought to be acceptable in all circumstances in condominium declarations and rules. Different restrictions might be appropriate for different situations. For example, a limit on the size or weight or pets might be reasonable in some circumstances. What is important in order to make a rule reasonable today, in my opinion, is that the rule have some flexibility to accommodate the needs of different people, especially those of unit owners whose life circumstances change and of unit owners who own, or desire to own, pets that are unlikely to cause genuine substantial interference with the use and enjoyment of other units.

[73] I find some support for my conclusions on reasonableness in the decision of the Court of Appeal in Dvorchik although the Court, in that case, upheld a restrictive condominium rule. As set out above, the Court stated in its endorsement:

"In an application brought under s. 49(1), a court should not substitute its own opinion about the propriety of a rule enacted by a condominium board unless the rule is clearly unreasonable or contrary to the legislative scheme. In the absence of such unreasonableness, deference should be paid to rules deemed appropriate by a board charged with responsibility for balancing the private and communal interests of the unit owners."

[74] The court went on to say that it did not agree that a rule restricting the size of pets is "either unreasonable or inconsistent with the Condominium Act." It concluded that, while "it may be that the "25 pound rule" is not the best rule or the least arbitrary," this does not make it an unreasonable one".

[75] In the present case, the rule is a prohibition not a restriction and is very arbitrary since it denies the Respondents the right to keep a cat which cannot reasonably be said to interfere with the use or enjoyment of the common elements or the other units. With the greatest deference to the Board of Directors, I am of opinion that it is unreasonable in that it does not balance the private and communal interests of the unit owners.

[76] My conclusion that the pet prohibition in this case is unreasonable is possibly not sufficient to decide the case. The Court of Appeal, in Dvorchik, was considering a condominium rule not a condominium declaration, which is the governing document in the present case. As has been stated above, the courts have tended to draw a distinction in the enforceability of pet prohibitions and restrictions depending on the mechanism used to create the prohibition or restriction. Rules must be reasonable. The Condominium Act does not specifically require a declaration to be reasonable although case law has imputed some requirement for reasonableness into the law. On the other hand, there is a strong presumption as to the validity of declarations and declarations with some degree of unreasonableness have been upheld by the courts on many occasions, including in some of the above cited cases. Because of the presumption of the validity of declarations and the weight of the case law upholding pet prohibitions in declarations, I hesitate to exercise my judicial discretion to dismiss the Application solely on the basis of the unreasonableness of the provisions. I shall, therefore, consider the other defences raised by the Respondents in order to determine whether there are further reasons to lead me to exercise that discretion in favour of the Respondents in the circumstances of this case.

2. Laches and Acquiescence

[77] I now wish to turn to the second ground for dismissal raised by the Respondents, namely delay or laches and acquiescence. In all of the above cited cases in which there was a delay in attempting to enforce a condominium Declaration to oust a pet living in a condominium building contrary to the Declaration, namely, Harthen, Gifford and Hogg, or to otherwise enforce a Declaration, as in Rochon (the satellite dish case), the facts involved an agreement or implied consent between a developer and unit purchaser that was not, at the time of the agreement or subsequent to it, included in the Declaration of the condominium corporation. In each case, a subsequent Application by the unit owners' Board of Directors was allowed on the grounds that there is no place for a private arrangement between a developer and an individual owner that is not disclosed in the Declaration. In Hogg, Carnwath, J., stated that the equitable doctrines of laches and acquiescences did not apply to validate a private agreement made between a developer and some unit owners in the light of the immediate action taken by the first unit owners' Board of Directors in that case. In some instances, the factor, as in Gilbert, a part of the rationale for granting in other cases, as in Harthen, a judge, in that case, Misener, J., expressed the view that, even though the change from the proposed to the actual Declaration might be unfair or unjust, the Board of Directors had a duty to effect compliance. In each case, the court exercised its discretion by enforcing the Declaration.

[78] In some of the cases in which delay or an agreement, implied or otherwise, with a developer was not a

Application to oust a pet was the fact that the pet owner had been made aware of the no pets provision before purchasing the unit and taking possession of it but, nevertheless, had moved in with a pet. In those cases, there was no evidence of acquiescence by the condominium Board of Directors.

[79] The question, here, is what is the law where any delay in enforcement of the Declaration or acquiescence in the presence of pets, or both, emanates not from a developer but from the unit owners Board of Directors. The only two condominium cases that I have been able to locate on the subject of delay or laches and acquiescences do not relate to pets. Nevertheless, they may cast some light on the subject.

[80] In Marafioti v. Metropolitan Toronto Condominium Corp. No. 775 (1994), 39 R.P.R. (2d) 47, Greer, J., upheld a condominium Declaration by refusing to grant an injunction to prohibit a condominium corporation from removing, or in anyway dealing with, a deck built by unit owners on their town house in contravention of the condominium Declaration, and by ordering the unit owners to remove the deck. This case did involve a preregistration agreement between the declarant and the unit owner and, in considering that aspect of the case, Greer, J., followed the reasoning in Rochon and Gifford, cited above. She then went on to ask whether, given the seemingly six year delay in the bringing of the Application by the owners' Board of Directors, the corporation is now estopped from enforcing its rights. She stated:

"The estoppel argument, as set out in the Canadian Encyclopedia Digest, Volume 10, Title 56, Section 51, Pg. 64 reads:

"Whenever an argument against relief that otherwise would be just is founded upon mere delay (that delay not amounting to a bar by the Statute of Limitations), the validity of that defence must be tried upon principles substantially equitable. Two circumstances, always important in such cases, are the length of the delay and the nature of the acts done during the interval, which might affect either party and cause a balance of justice or injustice in taking the one course or the other, so far as relates to the remedy."

The effect of delay or laches is set out in Farrell v. Manchester (1908), 40 S.C.R. 339 (S.C.C.). There is no doubt that at first blush, the six year delay seems like an inordinate length of time to wait to bring the matter to Court. On the other hand, in my review of the facts and as I have set them out in these Reasons, it is clear that the protests began immediately upon the construction beginning."

She then reviewed the evidence respecting the actions taken by the parties during the six year period and concluded that the delay was "perfectly explainable".

[81] Greer, J., next questioned whether the Marafiotis had a defence based on the doctrine of laches. She stated:

"Would it be injustice to allow MTCC 775 the relief it is now requesting? Mere passage of time does not constitute laches. The equitable defence of laches is in the discretion of the Court. See: Canada Trust Co. v. Lloyd, [1968] 66 D.L.R. (2d) 722, and Egnatios v. Leon Estate [1990] D.L.R. (4th) 137. In Egnatios, supra, Sutherland, J. at p. 160 quotes Waters on the Law of Trusts in Canada, 2nd ed. (Carswell, 1984) at para. 1024 in speaking of the doctrine of laches:

"It is also closely related to the doctrine of acquiescence. Indeed, it is more likely that what the courts are really concerned with is implied acquiescence rather (than) delay itself. This is particularly true today when limitation statutes expressly apply to so many actions brought in equity."

There is nothing in the evidence presented to me which would lead me to believe that there was acquiescence on the part of the Board."

After reviewing further facts relating to negotiations between the parties over the six year interval, she concluded that, at no time, was the issue of the deck a dead issue and that, therefore, neither acquiescence nor the doctrine of laches applied to the facts of the case.

[82] The Ontario Court of Appeal [1997] dismissed an appeal by the Marafiotis holding that the Appellants had breached a condominium Rule and that the judge below was justified in exercising her discretion to grant the Respondents the relief requested. The Court of Appeal agreed with her that the Respondent did not acquiesce in the presence of the deck.

[83] In the second case to which I wish to make reference on the subject of laches and acquiescence, York Condominium Corporation No 35 v. Mosseau et al (1995), 48 R.P.R. (2d) 248, three different pairs of Respondents made alterations to windows in their condominium townhouses without the prior consent of the condominium corporation. The condominium Declaration required consent to any alterations not in conformity with the registered drawings. The Respondents, inter alia, argued laches and implied acquiescence in the changes. One respondent, who made the changes at a later date than another respondent, submitted that, if she had known she should not make a change, she would not have put herself in the position she did. Breckinridge, J., referred to the Marafioti case and the decision of Greer, J., that, although six years seemed like a long time to wait, in the case before her there was no acquiescence by the Board of Directors. He found that, in all of the cases before him, there was objective, solid evidence that the condominium corporation had acquiesced in the changes that had been made to the windows over a period of several years. In dismissing the three Applications, he stated at pp. 253-4:

"... it does not in my view lie within the authority of the Condominium Corporation to sleep on its rights so that people acquire or feel they have acquired a proprietary right to the amenities which they are enjoying."

[84] In the present case, although Dr. Wood indicated in his affidavit of July 15, 1998, that, on moving into the complex in 1988, he and his wife gave up their five year old Schnauzer dog and that some other unidentified unit owners also gave up their pets when they moved into the complex, there is substantial evidence that there have been cats in the building over the years. This is clear from the affidavits of Mr. and Mrs. Chassie, Sam Cino, John MacPherson and Sally Barton. The presence of cats is also evident from the minutes of the Board of Directors of the N.N.C.C. The minutes for the meeting of September 20, 1995, specify that, after a Mr. Smith commented that there were several cats in the building and asked if it should be allowed to continue, Peter Greco replied that "either this issue [cats] should be ignored or a complete crackdown on animals in the building be done". Also, the minutes for the meeting of November 25, 1996 indicate that it was suggested that letters be sent to all pet owners mentioning the Rule and informing them that, "when existing pets cease to reside in the building, no new pets will be allowed in the building." Further, at that meeting, "Mr. Greco explained that, because the Rule has not been enforced up to this point, a precedent has been set and thus it may not stand up in a court of law." There is no evidence that any action respecting pets was taken after either of those meetings or, indeed, at any time before Mr. and Mrs. Chassie moved into the building. Further, I accept the evidence of the Chassies that they saw cats in the windows of the complex on their various visits to it and, indeed, saw a cat in one of the unit they visited. I also accept their evidence that they were not aware of the no pets provisions before they signed their offer to purchase and that, when they were informed of the no pets provision a few days before they took possession of their unit, they, nevertheless, had reason to believe that the provision was not being enforced and that there would be no problem. Finally, I believe Mrs. Chassie's statement that they would not have purchased a unit in the complex had they thought that there would be a problem about the cat.

[85] Given the facts I have just mentioned, I find that there have been cats in the building to the knowledge of the Board of Directors for a number of years, that they have delayed in enforcing the no pet provisions of the Declaration and Rules and, in so doing, have implicitly acquiesced in the presence of cats in the building. While there was not a long delay in the attempted enforcement of the Declaration in respect of the Chassies after they moved into the complex, the prior long delay and obvious acquiescence as to the presence of cats in the building led the Chassies, as in the case of the unit owner, Mrs. Mosseau, in the Mosseau case, to put themselves in a position they would not otherwise have put themselves in, namely, buy the unit. I agree with the conclusion of Breckinridge, J., in Mosseau that a condominium corporation cannot sleep on its rights and then enforce them against people who have relied on the non-enforcement to put themselves in a position of disadvantage they would not have put themselves in had the provisions been enforced uniformly and in a timely manner. Unlike, in the Marafioti case, there is no evidence of any actions taken by the N.N.C.C. prior to the autumn of 1997 that would justify and explain the delay in enforcement and lead the court to find that the equities favour the Applicant.

3. Human Rights Considerations

[86] The third and last ground for dismissal raised by the Respondents is the question of the application to this case of the Ontario Human Rights Code. They submitted that to require them to give up their cat would be cruel and inhumane because Mrs. Chassie suffers from mental and physical health problems and the removal of her cat would be deleterious to her health, particularly in respect of her problems with depression and high blood pressure. Her submissions are supported by her medical doctors.

[87] In the above cited cases in which the application of the Human Rights Code was raised, the courts have applied the Code to a somewhat limited extent. In Gifford, in 1989, Herold, D.C.J., found that, although Mr. Gifford suffered from a handicap as it is defined in the Code, in that he was confined to a wheelchair, he was not being discriminated against in that no persons, handicapped or otherwise, were allowed to have a pet on the property. Further, even if this were not so, the exception in clause 10(1)(a) (now 11(1)(a)) of the Code in respect of reasonable requirements would apply to preclude Mr. Gifford from keeping his dog. In Dodd, in 1987, Trotter, D.C.J., without referring to the Code or prior cases, dismissed an Application to evict a dog that was required for the health of Mrs. Dodd who was, according to her doctor, in poor health. He said that he put the case on the same basis as he would with someone who required a seeing eye dog. Similarly, in Ferris, in 1993, Hogg, J., after a careful analysis of Gifford, dismissed an Application to evict a dog belonging to an elderly woman who was in bad health and suffered from hearing problems. He did so on the basis that the dog served as a hearing assist dog and, hence, was a therapy utility animal not merely a companion animal providing emotional support as was the dog in the Gifford case.

[88] In 1997, in Donner, Salhany, J., went one step further to specifically disagree with the decision of Herold, J., in Gifford. In Donner, the dog in question also served as a hearing assist dog for an elderly woman. Salhany, J., dismissed an Application to evict the dog on the ground that the Human Rights Code precludes enforcement of the Declaration if it would result in discrimination in respect of a person because of a specific handicap. In response to the argument that the Declaration did not prohibit Mrs. Donner's mother, only her dog, from living in the building, he said that enforcement would effectively prohibit her from living in the building because she is deaf and fully dependant on the dog to assist her in hearing alarms, the telephone, etc.

[89] Of the cases, to which I have just referred, only in Dodd was a pet permitted on the general ground of the poor health of its owner without the additional factor of the animal providing assistance in respect of a physical disability such as deafness. Further, there has been some suggestion in various cases that a companion animal which provides emotional support is not a therapy utility animal and hence cannot entitle its owner to protection under the Code.

[90] The Human Rights Code provides:

"2(1) Every person has a right to equal treatment with respect to the occupancy of accommodation, without discrimination because of ... handicap ..."

Subsection 10(1) defines "because of handicap" as meaning:

"for the reason that the person has or has had, or is believed to have or have had,

(d) a mental disorder".

[91] If Mrs. Chassie suffers from any handicap within the meaning of the Code, it is that of a mental disorder. The question is whether her depression can be considered to be a mental disorder within the meaning of the Code. The Code does not define mental disorder and no evidence was introduced as to the meaning of the expression. It is relatively easier to determine whether a person suffers a physical handicap as handicap is defined, in part, as meaning "any degree of physical disability, infirmity, malformation or disfigurement" and includes such disabilities as blindness and deafness. A handicap usually involves some inability to do some important things that most people can normally do. It has also been said to be a substantial ongoing limit on one's activities. A mental disorder, on the other hand, may not be as visible as a physical handicap and does not necessarily limit activities in the same way. The Shorter Oxford English Dictionary defines disorder using such expressions as "disturbance of mind" and "an ailment, disease. (Usually weaker than disease and not implying structural change)". The Tormont Webster's dictionary includes in its definition of disorder "imperfect functioning of the body or mind".

[92] Can it reasonably be said that Mrs. Chassie's depression brings her condition within the meaning of "mental disorder"? Her depression is not a temporary condition. Her history of depression dates back to approximately 1977. She was on sick leave for six months in 1991 suffering from myalgic encephalitis complicated by depression which was described by her former doctor, Dr. Richards, as being a "long debilitating episode". She also suffered severe episodes of depression in the spring of 1996 and from January to April, 1997. Speaking of the current situation, her present doctor, Dr. Henry, stated that to force her to abandon her cat would cause her "severe emotional and physical detriment". He also said that "the emotional well being she gets from her cat are (sic) an important component of her treatment." and that the "emotional trauma caused by the legal proceedings surrounding her cat have precipitated a worsening of her depression." Her former doctor, Dr. Richards, agreed that removing the cat could "precipitate a relapse of her depression." On the basis of at Mrs. Chassie's history of depression, her present condition and the prognoses of her doctors, I find that Mrs. Chassie suffers from an ailment that can be described as a disturbance or imperfect functioning of the mind. It is a serious and long term condition and it is, therefore, a mental disorder within the meaning of the Human Rights Code.

[93] The last question to be answered is whether the Applicant, by bringing this Application, is discriminating against Mrs. Chassie with respect to the occupancy of accommodation within the meaning of the Code. I adopt the reasoning of Salhany, J., in Donner that, while the provision in the condominium Declaration prohibiting pets does not specifically discriminate against her, the enforcement of the Declaration would, in effect, do so. The enforcement would have an "adverse effect" on her within the broad concept of adverse effects discrimination. It would effectively prohibit her from living in the building because her cat is essential to her well being and "an important part of her treatment". Further, the argument that the cat is merely a companion comfort animal providing emotional support, and not a therapy utility animal like a seeing eye dog, does not stand. Her handicap is mental not physical. In the broad sense, as set out above under the heading The Therapeutic Value of Pets, there is a growing awareness of the extent which animals improve the mental and physical well being of people. It has been said that therapy dogs have been shown to lower blood pressure, another medical problem of Mrs. Chassie, and help people relax. In the specific circumstances of this case, a part of Mrs. Chassie's treatment for her mental disorder, depression, is the emotional support provided by her cat. I would, therefore, say that the cat is a therapy utility animal and that its ouster would constitute discrimination against Mrs. Chassie because of her handicap.

CONCLUSIONS

[94] I agree with counsel for the Applicant that the residence of the Chassie's cat in the N.N.C.C. complex is contrary to the condominium Declaration and Rules, that there is a strong presumption as to the validity of the Declaration and that the Board of Directors has a statutory obligation to enforce the Declaration and Rules. However, for the reasons set out above, I am of opinion that the pet prohibition is not a reasonable one. On the other hand, while the provision in the Declaration may not be reasonable, it is not necessarily invalid given the strong presumption in favour of the validity of Declarations. Nevertheless, I think it would not be fair to enforce it given that it is not reasonable and given the circumstances of the present case. The Chassies were put in a position of disadvantage in purchasing the unit that they would not have placed themselves in had they known, before they purchased their unit, of the cat prohibition and that an attempt to enforce it might be made. Their lack of comprehension of the situation is the fault of the Board of Directors. The Board has acquiesced in the presence of cats in the building over a number of years and has not provided any explanation to justify the delay in enforcement and lead the court to find that the equities favour the Applicant. Finally, I have found that Mrs. Chassie suffers from a handicap within the meaning of the Human Rights Code and that to enforce the Declaration would constitute discrimination against her because of her handicap. On the totality of all three grounds of defence, I find that this is a proper case in which to exercise my judicial discretion in favour of the Respondents and to dismiss the Application.

[95] Since the Respondents were self represented, and given the nature of the case and my decision, I do not think that this is a proper case for an award of costs.

[96] Application dismissed.

Wellington Condominium Corporation No. 61 v. Marilyn Drive Holdings Limited

20 O.R. (3d) 81

Action No. 5981/94 (Guelph) and 91-CQ-10 (Toronto)

Ontario Court (General Division), Herold J. October 6, 1994

Cases referred to ACTION by a condominium corporation for a declaration of ownership of a unit in the condominium.

G.M. Caplan, for plaintiff.

S.W. Pettipiere, for defendant.

HEROLD J.: -- This is yet another in an expanding line of cases dealing with the ownership of the superintendent's suite in a condominium development.

The plaintiff is a condominium corporation created pursuant to the provisions of the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 84, as a result of the registration in the Land Registry Office of the declaration and description required by the Condominium Act. The corporation is the owner of the common elements of a 10-storey luxury apartment building located at 24 Marilyn Drive in the City of Guelph.

The defendant is, by virtue of a corporation reorganization, the successor to 24 Marilyn Drive (Guelph) Limited, the developer of the condominium project and will be referred to in these reasons as the "developer" or the "declarant".

In addition to the usual amenities in a luxury condominium apartment building, the building contains 56 dwelling units each of which was shown as a separate unit in the declaration and description, one of which, unit 201, is the subject matter of this litigation.

The plaintiff seeks a declaration that it is the owner of unit 201 as a result of what it alleges was the common intention of the developer and the unit purchasers or, alternatively, that it is entitled to a conveyance of the unit, in lieu of damages, as a result of an alleged breach by the developer/declarant of s. 52 of the Condominium Act.

Chronology

A brief chronology of some of the relevant events is as follows:

- a) September 27, 1988, the first set of condominium documents including the declaration, By-law No. 1, By-law No. 2, By-law No. 3 (Management Agreement), By-law No. 4 (Insurance Trust Agreement), proposed Rules, Budget, Disclosure Statement and Apartment Lay-out is executed by the developer.
- b) Fall of 1988, spring and summer of 1989 -- sales campaign results in the sale of the other 55 of the 56 units.
- c) February 1, 1989, the first superintendent, Thomas Holland, is hired by the developer and takes up residence in suite 201.
- d) November 29, 1989, first interim meeting of unit purchasers.
- e) December 28, 1988 to September 28, 1990, 44 of the original purchasers, and 11 assignees of the original purchasers complete their interim closings and take possession.
- f) November 15, 1990, Thomas Holland resigns as superintendent and vacates unit 201.
- g) November 19, 1990, meeting of the interim executive, the minutes of which may disclose the first signs of trouble in paradise.
- h) December 1990, the condominium documents are amended slightly with respect to a matter not in itself relevant to this litigation, namely, the parking spaces.
- i) January 9, 1991, last official meeting of the interim committee, the minutes of which indicate that the trouble in paradise was discussed.
- j) January 21, 1991, the declaration and description are registered and the plaintiff comes into existence.
- k) February 2, 1991, the first general meeting of the owners of the corporation is held -- the individual units are still registered in the name of the declarant.
- l) February 5, 1991, and shortly thereafter, most of the final closings take place with the individual unit owners and the by-laws are registered on title.
- m) April 8, 1991, letter from the developers' representative to the president of the interim board of directors asking if the plaintiff is interested in purchasing the superintendent's suite.
- n) April 16, 1991, president's response to the April 8 letter.
- o) May 7, 1991, Turn-over Meeting, the first meeting of the members of the plaintiff corporation and the first new directors' meeting of the plaintiff corporation.

p) May 16, 1991, letter from the solicitor for the developer pursuing the question of the corporation's intention with respect to the superintendent's suite.

q) May 23, 1991, president's response to this inquiry;

r) July 15, 1991, this action was commenced and a certificate of pending litigation was obtained and registered on title.

Some Background Facts The high-rise apartment building in question was built for the developers by Raymond Ferraro, a Guelph builder. He testified that since 1979 he has built five high-rise apartment buildings, three of which were to become condominiums and two rental buildings. He had built three of those buildings for the developers in this case, being 20, 22 and 24 Marilyn Drive.

Mr. Ferraro was very much the on-site representative of the developer. He looked after the completion of building plans, dealings with the City of Guelph, construction and the eventual sale of the units in the building, in which latter respect he was assisted by his son Michael.

Although there was some issue at trial as to whether or not the 10-storey 56-unit building required a full-time on-site superintendent, which issue involved among other things a consideration of similar buildings in the area, the fact that there was an on-site superintendent when the sales were completed, and that thereafter a resident in the building, not residing in the superintendent's suite, was acting superintendent for some time, on other occasions people were hired either on short-term basis or on a piece-work basis, and the fact that some consideration was even given to the possibility of sharing a superintendent with the next door building, 22 Marilyn Drive. The witnesses for the plaintiff were almost if not entirely unanimous in their view that, notwithstanding the fact that the building was very much maintenance free, a full-time superintendent was both desirable and for some necessary and I am satisfied on the totality of the evidence that most, if not all, of the purchasers entered into the transaction on the understanding that there would be a full-time on-site resident superintendent. Indeed, the disclosure documents provided to them by the developer, which will be the subject of more comment later, included the following:

It is anticipated that one fulltime resident maintenance man/janitor will be hired for the condominium corporation. His duties will include the repair and maintenance of all mechanical systems in the building not covered by contract. He will also be responsible for the routine maintenance or other common area and finishings in the building.

This particular clause, and indeed the condominium disclosure documents in their entirety, were prepared by Ray Ferraro, a non-lawyer, from precedents he had developed in connection with prior condominium developments, which were in turn taken from precedents supplied to him by a large metropolitan Toronto developer.

On discovery the president of the defendant who was also the developer's solicitor was asked about that clause as follows:

Q. Can you tell me how that clause, if I can call it that, came to be incorporated into the description?

A. I suspect it was copied from 22 Marilyn Drive.

Q. Did 22 Marilyn Drive have a fulltime resident maintenance man/ janitor?

A. Does it have one? Yes as far as I know it does.

Q. Now was it contemplated by the developers of 24 Marilyn Drive that that project would have a fulltime superintendent?

A. We thought it was logical that they should have a fulltime superintendent, yes.

Q. Why did you think it was logical?

A. Well because basically we viewed 24 as a replica of 22 a clone of 22.

Q. And 22 had its own?

A. 22 had its own. We sold -- when I say we I mean Marilyn Drive of course -- the superintendent's unit to the condominium corporation and they have their own superintendent now.

After the majority of the purchasers had taken possession, subsequent to their interim closing with the developer, they established amongst themselves a committee for the purpose of dealing with common problems and having a united front with which to liaise with the developer. Although that committee had no legal status, it was clearly representative of the unit purchasers and responsive to them and it consulted from time to time with a solicitor or solicitors to obtain assistance with legal issues. This latter fact, although denied by some of the plaintiff's witnesses is confirmed beyond any doubt by the minutes of the various meetings.

Common Intention

As indicated above there can be no doubt that both the developer and the unit purchasers always intended that the building would have a permanent live-in superintendent. The plaintiffs argue that from this fact it should be inferred that both parties also intended that a dwelling unit in the building would be made available at no cost to the plaintiff for this purpose and that the dwelling unit would be part of the common elements of the condominium corporation. The defendant argues that such an inference is not appropriate, that there was no evidence by any of the purchasers that they had any such intention or relied on such an intention when they purchased their unit and that the evidence called on behalf of the defence, as well as some of the wording of the disclosure documents, clearly indicates otherwise.

The plaintiff called eight witnesses including the present condominium manager, a solicitor and six owners some of whom bought directly from the developer, some of whom bought from investors, some of whom were members of the interim informal executive or later the condominium board and others of whom were never so involved. Although it is fair to say that each of the plaintiff's six owner witnesses testified in a way as to suggest that they clearly relied on the fact that a superintendent would be living in the building, none of them stated that they also intended that the unit in question, suite 201, or a similar unit would belong to the condominium corporation at no cost to them and indeed it appears that they were neither asked to, nor did they, direct their mind to this issue.

The defendant called three witnesses being the builder/ developer's agent, Raymond Ferraro, the developer's condominium manager, Maria Finoro, who was replaced when the board took power, and Robert McBride, a unit owner and former member of the executive who was not only, but actually declared himself to be, a hostile witness. Mr. McBride did not say that he ever relied upon the fact that a superintendent's unit would be part of the plaintiff's assets or part of the common elements nor did he appear, as with the plaintiff's witnesses, to have directed his mind to this issue. Mr. Ferraro testified that this never was the intention of the developer and points to the following as evidence thereof:

- a) In the project developed before ;ns24, namely, ;ns22 Marilyn Drive, the developer sold a unit to the condominium corporation to use for a superintendent's suite.
- b) The configuration of unit 201 is no different than similar units on each floor of the building and there is nothing about the configuration to suggest that it was specifically designed for or intended to be used for a superintendent's suite.
- c) The condominium documents show unit 201 as a "unit" not as part of the common elements. The registered title to unit 201 was in the name of the developer, not the condominium corporation. In the calculation of the proportionate share of each unit's responsibility for common expenses, unit 201 is allocated its appropriate share based on square footage.
- d) None of the plans show unit 201 as a superintendent's suite nor does it have any specific designation whatsoever.
- e) The minutes of the January 9, 1991 meeting, described as the last official meeting of the interim committee, contain the following: "superintendent's unit -- discussion followed as to how we might accommodate a new superintendent when the unit is owned by Kroma at present".

With respect to the last matter, Kroma was the property manager and it is conceded that at no time was Kroma the owner of the unit -- its employer, the developer, was. Witnesses who recalled having been present at the January 9, 1991 meeting suggested that they have very little recollection of the discussion with respect to this matter, although they acknowledge that it must have been discussed since the minutes clearly indicate that it was. They also suggested, with very little conviction in my view, that the reference to the unit being owned by Kroma was of no great consequence since all the units were at that time still owned by the developer. The reference in the minutes, however, is not to all of the units but specifically to the superintendent's unit.

This meeting of January 9, 1991, takes on even more significance in my view when one notes that at the same meeting Bruce Wright was elected a director and became then the chairperson of the interim committee until the turn-over meeting at which time he became the first president of the condominium corporation's board of directors, replacing the developer's representatives on the board. Mr. Wright had had some very direct and active involvement, as a member of the board of directors of the previous condominium corporation with which he was associated, in protracted and partially successful litigation with respect to the very same issue now before this court -- the ownership of a superintendent's suite. To accept Bruce Wright's evidence to the effect that in January 1991, prior to the formal closings of the real estate transactions, the issue of the ownership of the superintendent's suite was not of considerable importance to him and to other members of the board and presumably to other purchasers as well, defies common sense.

In seeking to establish the fact of a common intention to have unit 201 as part of the condominium corporation's assets, whether as a common element or otherwise, the plaintiffs point to the following:

- a) The excerpt from the disclosure documents quoted at p. 85 and their argument, already discussed, that one can infer from the intention to have an on-site superintendent that the condominium corporation was to own the superintendent's suite at no cost to them.
- b) Nowhere in the proposed budget is there an amount shown for the carrying charges of suite 201 if it was to be acquired after closing by the condominium corporation -- that is to say, no mortgage payments, no tax payments, etc. Nor is there any reference in the proposed budget to a special assessment in the event that the corporation were to buy the unit for cash.
- c) In December 1990, after the November 19, 1990 meeting when the defendant argues the purchasers should have been aware of the superintendent's suite at the very least being an issue, the condominium documents were amended and could then have been further amended to reflect the matters referred to in para. (b) above. d) The estoppel certificates delivered up at the time of final closing on and after February 5, 1991, by the developer (referred to therein as "the Corporation") to the individual purchasers contained the following statements:
 3. The current budget (a copy of which is attached hereto) is accurate.
 5. The Corporation has no knowledge of any circumstances that may result in an increase in the common expenses for the said unit.
- e) Unit 201 was never offered to the general public by the developer, a fact which is conceded by the developer.
- f) While Tom Holland occupied unit 201, the tenant listing at the front entrance referred to unit 201 as the superintendent's suite.

With respect to (b), (c) and (d) the defendant replies that it would have been speculative at best to refer to these matters without knowing what position the condominium corporation was going to take with respect to the acquisition of the suite. If the condominium corporation took no steps to acquire the suite but rather retained a resident already in the building as superintendent there would have been no additional cost to the corporation for the superintendent's suite. With respect to (e) the defendant replies that it was not offered to the public until after the plaintiff was given the first opportunity to buy it.

It should be noted that for a period of time after Tom Holland left the corporation did in fact retain the services of a resident in the building as a full-time superintendent and the amount paid to him was consistent with the amount anticipated in the proposed budget with no credit being given to him for the fact that he was not also provided free of charge with a suite.

The plaintiffs rely to a very large extent on two judgments in the Ontario Court of Appeal, namely, Frontenac Condominium Corp. No. 1 v. Joe Macciocchi & Sons Ltd. (1975), 11 O.R. (2d) 649, 67 D.L.R. (3d) 199, and also York Condominium Corp. No. 167 v. Newrey Holdings Ltd. (1981), 32 O.R. (2d) 458, 122 D.L.R. (3d) 280. It should be noted that each of those cases was decided on the basis of the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 77, which did not contain the present s. 52 of the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 84, nor any predecessor thereof. In looking at these cases for the purpose of ascertaining whether they assist or are distinguishable (unless distinguishable they are binding upon me) one cannot ignore the fact that the Condominium Act is a form of consumer protection legislation and is and should be interpreted in favour of the unit owners even if that requires stretching the contractual concept of common intention to its outer limits.

In the Frontenac case the court found specifically at p. 651 that:

It was the evidence of all of the persons who purchased units who were called to give evidence at the trial that because of the size of the building, the development of the property, and the superintendent and the occupancy of his suite, that they assumed that there would be a full-time resident superintendent on the property and that his suite would be a common element.

The court further found as a fact at p. 652:

Further, while the evidence of the unit purchasers called was that they assumed that Suite 104 was a common element, their view was not dissimilar to that of the respondent's employee and representative who was called by the respondent and whose evidence was to the effect that upon being asked specifically by purchasers, she said she understood at that time that eventually it would become one of the common elements.

The majority then concluded at p. 655 that:

It has been established with some certainty, and at least to the degree required, that it was the intention of the respondent that the purchasers should believe that the superintendent's suite was a common element or would belong to the condominium corporation . . . It has similarly been established to the same degree that this was the belief of the unit purchasers at the time of their purchase. Notwithstanding this very strong evidence suggesting a common intention MacKinnon J.A. dissented on the basis that there would have to be some firm evidence of an undertaking or statement by or on behalf of the developer that the unit was part of the common elements.

Later in the York Condominium case Wilson J.A. writing for the court considered the following factors which are listed at pp. 460-61 of her judgment:

- 1) whether the developer had the intention that purchasers should believe that the janitor's suite was to be a common element or that it belonged to the condominium corporation;
- 2) whether the condominium corporation had made any mortgage payments with respect to the janitor's suite;
- 3) whether the developer received rent from the condominium corporation after the take-over meeting;
- 4) the purchasers' response to suggestions that the ownership of the janitor's suite was not clear; 5) unlike the situation in Frontenac, no one on the defendants' behalf ever suggested to any prospective purchaser that the janitor's suite would form part of the common elements or part of the property of the condominium corporation;
- 6) the agreements of purchase and sale specifically referred to building plans filed with the Borough of North York in which the suite in question was specifically designated as "the janitor's suite";
- 7) the janitor's suite was different in lay-out from any other suite in the building in that it had no balcony, porch or den, and had located in it the fire alarm system buzzers and the underground garage ramp heat control;
- 8) the building was of such a size as to require a full-time live-in superintendent;
- 9) the projected annual operating budget given to the purchasers of units on closing showed no item of expense for rental of the janitor's suite although it showed an item of expense for his salary; 10) the condominium documents included, when discussing restricted access to common elements "those parts of the common elements used from time to time as a dwelling for any building superintendent;
- 11) it was not until after the take-over meeting that the developer disclosed that it was prepared to sell the suite to the condominium corporation if it wished to acquire it as a permanent apartment for the superintendent.

Looking at all of those factors the Court of Appeal drew an inference different from that drawn by the trial judge and found a common intention to exist that the superintendent's suite was to be part of the common elements. In doing so, the court emphasized items 6 and 10.

In 1987, O'Leary J. had occasion to consider the Court of Appeal judgments in Frontenac and York in York North Condominium Corp. No. 5 v. Van Horne Clipper Properties Ltd. (1987), 60 O.R. (2d) 468 (H.C.J.). O'Leary J. stated at p. 470:

It is the position of the plaintiff that the representation by the defendant that the condominium would have a full-time, live-in superintendent constituted a representation to the purchasers of the units that the unit to be occupied by the superintendent would be part of the common elements or was to be an asset of the condominium corporation.

There is no requirement in the Condominium Act, nor is there any evidence before me that through practice or custom the superintendent's residence form part of the common elements or is an asset of the condominium corporation. If any purchaser drew such inference from the representation I have referred to, then he was not justified in doing so. Indeed, if any such inference was drawn, it does not seem to have been very firmly held for no objection was taken to the unit being purchased from the defendant.

Later at p. 471 he says:

It is said that there were ambiguities in portions of the various documents just referred to, that would leave the purchasers confused as to who was to own the unit. In fact, no purchaser testified that he was led to believe because of what was in those documents that the unit was to be part of the common elements.

It is interesting to note that one of the ambiguities was similar to that found in the Newrey case, the disclosure documents in the Van Horne case stating "no owner shall have any right of access to those parts of the common elements used from time to time as a dwelling for any superintendent".

O'Leary J. found no common intention in the Van Horne case and the corporation appealed to the Ontario Court of Appeal.

The Court of Appeal judgment is reported at (1989), 70 O.R. (2d) 317, 40 C.P.C. (2d) 156, but unfortunately the Court of Appeal did not find it necessary to deal with O'Leary J.'s conclusions with respect to common intention; rather the case, at the Court of Appeal level, was determined on the basis of an accepted settlement.

Considering all of the factors to which I have already referred and the principles enunciated by the Ontario Court of Appeal, I am simply unable to conclude or infer that there was ever any intention on the part of the developer that the unit should be part of the common elements or otherwise owned by the condominium corporation and I would also be hard pressed to find that there was any such intention on the part of the purchasers. In any case, there was clearly, in my view, no common intention of this sort and accordingly the plaintiffs claim, to the extent it is based on common intention, must fail.

In the alternative the plaintiff claimed damages for negligent misstatement and breach of statutory duty arising from the false, deceptive and misleading contents of, and omissions contained in, material statements or information, required to be provided to a purchaser by the defendant by s. 52 of the Condominium Act. The plaintiff further claimed that in lieu of damages an order might be made declaring the plaintiff to be the owner of suite 201, 24 Marilyn Drive, Guelph.

The relevant portions of s. 52 of the Act are as follows:

52(1) An agreement of purchase and sale entered into after the 1st day of June, 1979 by a declarant or proposed declarant of a unit or proposed unit for residential purposes is not binding on the purchaser until the declarant or proposed declarant has delivered to the purchaser a copy of the current disclosure statement and all material amendments thereto.

(5) Where any statement or material required under this Act to be provided by a declarant or proposed declarant to a purchaser of a unit or proposed unit for residential purposes contains any material statement or information that is false, deceptive or misleading or fails to contain any material statement or information, the corporation or any unit owner who relied on such statement or material is entitled, as against the declarant or the proposed declarant to damages for any loss sustained as a result of such reliance.

(6) The disclosure statement referred to in subsection (1) shall contain and fully and accurately disclose,

(d) a brief narrative description of the significant features of the existing or proposed declaration, by-laws and rules governing the use of common elements and units, and of any contracts or leases that may be subject to termination or expiration under section 39;

(e) a budget statement for the one year period immediately following the registration of the declaration and the description;

(7) The budget statement mentioned in clause (6)(e) shall set out,

(a) the common expenses;

(b) the proposed amount of each expense;

(c) particulars of the type, frequency and level of the services to be provided;

(d) the projected monthly common expense contribution for each type of unit;

(h) any current or expected fees or charges to be paid by unit owners or any of them for the use of the common elements or part thereof and other facilities related to the property;

(i) any services not included in the budget that the declarant or proposed declarant provides, or expenses that he pays and that might reasonably be expected to become, at any subsequent time, a common expense and the projected common expense contribution attributable to each of those services or expenses for each type of unit;

The plaintiff argues that the condominium documents contained a material non-disclosure which was false, deceptive or misleading, in that they failed to refer to the fact that unit 201 was the superintendent's suite and that the developer was prepared to sell it for fair market value to the condominium corporation and that as a result of this non-disclosure the budget statement also failed to set out the annual expense to be incurred by the condominium corporation in carrying a mortgage if one was required to purchase the unit, to pay the annual taxes on the unit and other carrying charges such as utilities and, in the alternative, failed to disclose that there would be a capital assessment against each unit for their proportionate share of the cost of acquiring the unit from the developer.

It is first necessary to determine whether or not this non-disclosure is material in the context of s. 52 of the Condominium Act.

Robins J.A. recently had occasion in Abdool v. Somerset Place Developments of Georgetown Ltd. (1992), 10 O.R. (3d) 120 at p. 139, 96 D.L.R. (4th) 449 (C.A.), to define materiality as follows:

To discharge this onus and prove the materiality of the complaint, in my opinion, the purchaser is obliged to establish objectively that had the information that was not disclosed, or that was inaccurately or insufficiently disclosed, been properly disclosed in the disclosure statement at the time it was delivered to the purchaser, a reasonable purchaser would have regarded the information as sufficiently important to the decision to purchase that he or she would not likely have gone ahead with the transaction but would instead have rescinded the agreement before the expiration of the ten-day cooling off period.

I shall consider later the right of a purchaser under s. 52(2) to rescind the agreement where there has been a material amendment. At this juncture, I would move to the actual disclosure statements in these appeals.

It is clear that Robins J.A. has required that the materiality be determined by applying an objective standard, although he did say later at pp. 149-50:

The extent to which subjective considerations may reasonably be asserted in determining the materiality of the new or amended information is not before the court in these appeals and need not be considered.

Winkler J. in Ceolaro v. York Humber Ltd., Ontario Court (General Division) (unreported March 29, 1994 [now reported 37 R.P.R. (2d) 1 at p. 67, 53 C.P.R. (3d) 276]) had this to say about the possibility of subjective considerations being laid over the objective test:

In my opinion, this statement refers, for example, to an amenity such as a gymnasium. If a purchaser decided to execute an Agreement of Purchase and Sale mainly because the complex had a gymnasium which this purchaser was planning to use a great deal for physical conditioning rather than pay a membership fee at a fitness club, and the gymnasium was never built, then there may be cause for refusing to complete the transaction for this one purchaser. To apply this proposition to the facts at hand would be a far stretch that would not do justice to the intent of Mr. Justice Robins' words.

In my view, the possibility that the condominium corporation could acquire from the developer an asset at its fair market value of approximately $125,000, and the costs associated with such an acquisition are material and the possibility at least that the corporation might incur such expenses are something that a reasonable purchaser would have wanted to see in the disclosure documents. That is, they are in my view material. Unlike Winkler J. in Ceolaro, I would not conclude, on the facts before me, that the conduct of the purchasers after November 19, 1990, even if it is some evidence of their subjective view of materiality, make the issue any less material although, as will be discussed later, it is of some considerable consequence with respect to the issue of reliance.

In a recent unreported decision of the Ontario Court (General Division) in Middlesex Condominium Corp. No. 87 v. 600 Talbot Street London Ltd., October 5, 1993 [summarized at 43 A.C.W.S. (3d) 476], Flinn J. had occasion to consider and analyze s. 52(5) of the Condominium Act. He concluded that the section requires the following:

- (a) a material statement or information;
- (b) that is false, deceptive or misleading;
- (c) or a statement which fails to contain any material, statement or information;
- (d) reliance on such statement or material.

To this list I would add:

- (e) a loss sustained by the purchasers as a result of such reliance.

I have already concluded that there was an omission, a failure, to include a material statement which could have the effect of misleading the purchasers. I say "could have" because the omission, while material on an objective basis, would only have the effect of having misled the purchasers if the board of directors, after taking over the corporation, decided to acquire the unit from the developer. If they decided not to, an equally possible result, there would be no carrying charges, nor any special assessment. I am completely satisfied that the failure to refer to the possibility of the corporation acquiring the superintendent's unit was done inadvertently, on the basis that the developer, to the extent that it put its mind to the question at all, was of the view that referring to this matter would be speculative at best, in view of the fact that the condominium corporation would have to decide whether or not to avail itself of the opportunity to acquire the suite. Based upon all of the evidence it is more likely that the question of whether or not to include this fact was simply never even considered. This does not, however, make the omission any less material or any less potentially misleading.

As in the Middlesex case, however, the question is whether the plaintiff has proven on the balance of probabilities that its members, the unit purchasers, relied on this omission in any way and whether as a result of this reliance they sustained damages in a proven amount or at all.

As indicated earlier the first evidence which might suggest that someone had put their minds to the issue of the status of the superintendent's suite is found in the minutes of the November 19, 1990 meeting which include the following item:

Maria [Finoro, the condominium manager] asked to join our meeting to discuss with us the hiring of a new superintendent. After a lengthy discussion it was decided that it was still the responsibility of the management company to look after that matter. The owners at this time have nothing they can do in this regard.

Carole Croft, who was until that time the secretary of the committee and took the minutes, testified that on November 19th, Maria was meeting prospective superintendents whom the board was considering interviewing to have some input in the hiring of a superintendent. The board was aware that as an informal committee they really had no authority to hire a superintendent but it was also recognized that for purposes of continuity it would be in everyone's best interests to have a superintendent who was suitable to the purchasers and not only to the management company who might, as is often the case, be replaced after the turn-over meeting. During her evidence in-chief, Mrs. Croft said that there was some discussion about the fact that if a superintendent ever wanted to buy the unit it would be available for approximately $125,000. Later in her examination in-chief she testified that once Maria left the meeting those present -- Bob McBride, Nick Callwood, Bud Hawkins, Don Croft and herself discussed the question of the superintendent's unit and asked themselves why they would have to buy the unit -- "its ours" -- "if we did have a superintendent, where would he live". She then produced a notebook in her own handwriting which was apparently the rough notes from which she prepared her minutes and she agreed that in those notes she had written something about the superintendent's salary being approximately $17,856 per year, that the figure of $800 per month with respect to the suite is noted but she has no recollection now of what it means and that she understood in any case that the superintendent was to get free rent.

In cross-examination, she stated that up until November 19, 1990, she had no idea that the developer purported to own and could sell unit 201 and she was not sure of when she first became aware of this fact, some time before January 9, 1991. She said she was horrified when she learned of this fact and discussed it with her own personal solicitor prior to closing her transaction and was apparently reassured.

Robert K. McBride who was also present at the November 19, 1990 meeting and testified as a witness for the defence as a self-described "hostile witness" said that in November 1990, when they were interviewing people for superintendent, Maria Finoro told the proposed superintendents that they could buy the unit for $125,000. He said that he was astounded because they had never had any reason to believe that they would have to buy the unit. Maria Finoro could not recall her discussions with the unit purchasers in November of 1990 about the possible sale of the superintendent's suite to the corporation for $125,000. Bruce Wright also testified. He said that before buying his condominium unit at 24 Marilyn Drive, he had lived in another condominium project in Guelph on Westwood Drive. He was on the board of directors of that earlier condominium corporation for the last nine months of his residency there. The board had, before he became a member, initiated litigation against the developer who had built that project (not anyone related to the present parties) with respect to various issues including repairs, arrears of rent and the ownership of two superintendent suites, one in each of the two buildings comprising the development. The condominium manager at that development on Westwood Drive was Sandra Rutsch who later became, while Mr. Wright was president, the condominium manager for the plaintiff, replacing the developer's manager, Maria Finoro (Kroma) while Mr. Wright was president. He said that although in his previous condominium project they had gone through litigation to get a suite for the superintendent, para. 3 on p. 4 of the budget statement (reproduced earlier at p. 85 of these reasons) put his mind at ease when he signed his offer for a unit in the subject premises.

Mr. Wright testified that he attended some meetings of the interim committee as one of the purchaser/members before January 9, 1991, at which time he became the president of the interim committee. He said that the minutes of the interim committee meetings were usually published and circulated to the residents at large as a general practice, but that no one had told him in or about November 1990, that the developer had offered to sell unit 201 to the condominium corporation or to the superintendent. Whatever he did or did not know in November 1990, he was present at the meeting on January 9, 1991, the minutes of which are referred to as the minutes of the last official meeting of the interim committee which contain the following reference, quoted earlier: "superintendent's unit -- discussion followed as to how we might accommodate a new superintendent when the unit is owned by Kroma at present". He testified that he took that to mean that Kroma was the owner of all of the units and that he was completely ignorant on January 9, 1991, of the fact that the owner was asserting ownership to suite 201. Also present at that meeting were Nick Callwood, Bud Hawkins and Carole Croft.

Mr. Wright professed to have, and demonstrated, a somewhat remarkable familiarity of the intricacies of the Condominium Act. He had been a member of a board which was involved in litigation over the issue of ownership of a superintendent's suite. He was at a meeting with, among others, Carole Croft who had indicated great anxiety about the question of the ownership of the superintendent's suite. To suggest that he was not on January 9, 1991, fully aware of a large red flag in front of his face defies common sense and I simply do not accept his evidence in this regard. It is more likely that for whatever reason, he chose to sit in the bushes and not rock the boat until after the formal closings on and shortly after February 5, 1991, and thereafter until the turnover meeting in May of 1991. His response to two letters later that spring is, in my view, further evidence of his approach to the problem. These letters are brief and I will reproduce them in full: Letter from the developer to Bruce Wright, president of the interim board of directors, dated April 16, 1991:

Re: Superintendent Suite

As you are aware, suite 202, [sic] previously occupied by Tom Holland, building superintendent, was not sold. Is Wellington Condominium Corporation No. 61 interested in purchasing this suite? If Wellington Condominium Corporation No. 61 does not confirm its intention to purchase suite 202 by April 16th, the owner will proceed to sell it.

I would appreciate your reply to be confirmed in writing and mailed or delivered to my office by the 16th of April.

Mr. Wright's response on April 16, 1991, is as follows:

Re: Superintendent Suite, Suite 201

As acting President of the Owners Association of 24 Marilyn Drive I am writing to you in response to your letter of 9 # Apr the owners would be interested in acquiring the suite that Superintendent's Suite (Suite 201).

The Board cannot enter into any contractual agreement until a board of directors is voted into power at the turnover meeting. We as of this date we have not received notification of the turnover meeting. It must also be recognized that anything that changes the condominium's common elements is subject to section 38(1) of the Condominium Act.

I can be reached at work at (416) 821-8970.

Letter of May 16, 1991 from the developer's lawyers to Bruce Wright, president of the plaintiff:

Re: 24 Marilyn Drive, Guelph, Ontario

I believe that Mr. Ferraro and/or Maria Finoro of Orbis Property Management have spoken and written to you regarding the question of whether or not you wish to buy the superintendent's suite at 24 Marilyn Drive.

If you are interested in purchasing the unit, please let us know on or before May 24, 1991 so that we can negotiate this matter and enter into an agreement. If we do not hear from you by that date we will assume that you are not interested and we will offer the unit for sale to another party.

We trust the property is working out well for the new owners and are very pleased that this matter has at long last been completed. Response from Mr. Wright to the solicitor on May 23, 1991:

Re: Superintendent Suite

I am writing to you in response to your letter of 16 May 1991. The Board feels that the owners would be interested in acquiring the Superintendent's Suite.

Please advise us in writing as to the terms that you would be willing to consider.

It must also be recognized that anything that changes the condominium's common elements is subject to section 38(1) of the Condominium Act.

Mr. Wright testified that when he received the April 8 letter he spoke to Paul Smith, a lawyer in Guelph, who was going to be and was eventually retained by the condominium corporation as its solicitor. He said that Mr. Smith suggested that he reply in somewhat vague terms to the April 8 letter and not specifically state that the corporation was prepared to buy the unit. Both he and Mr. Smith appear to agree that the nature of the response was to buy some time until the corporation could get legal advice from a specialist in condominium law and also until the turn-over meeting which was still some three weeks away. Mr. Wright said that Mr. Paul Smith specifically told him to use the words "interested in acquiring the superintendent's suite" but Mr. Smith had no recollection of giving such advice. When the next letter of May 16, 1991, was received and responded to on or about May 23, 1991, it would appear that the condominium corporation had still some 16 days after the turn-over meeting not sought specific legal advice from the condominium law expert although the name of such a person had been given by Mr. Smith to Mr. Wright some time in April, or possibly as early as mid-March.

In his own evidence, the farthest Mr. Wright was prepared to go was to acknowledge that some time after January 31 and before March 1991, he heard about a problem with respect to the ownership of the superintendent's suite but he cannot recall who told him about it. He said that upon hearing the rumours of a problem he took no steps to do anything, notwithstanding the fact that he was president of the interim association and in particular did not seek legal advice, speak to the developer, contact the other executive or advise the other unit owners. He does agree that a meeting was held on March 13, 1991, of the interim board of directors at which he, Dave Tolton, Art Sutton, Bud Hawkins, Frank Turner and Grace Swan were present as well as the lawyer Paul Smith and his associate. The minutes of that meeting state "the situation re: supers suite was discussed". Mr. Wright said that at that March 13 meeting he told Mr. Smith that he had been involved in a similar situation at his previous condominium and it was shortly after that meeting that Paul Smith suggested that the board or interim board get an opinion from a lawyer specializing in condominium law. In re-examination he confirmed that generally the minutes of all meetings were given to the board and all resident purchasers, although other witnesses disagreed with this fact including Grace Swan, the secretary after Carole Croft who would have been responsible for circulating the minutes and says that she did not always do so. There was also some suggestion that the circulation was not to the entire membership of unit purchasers but only to those not known to be on friendly terms with the developer.

Of all of the purchasers who testified, only Carole Croft said that she was sufficiently concerned about the issue of the ownership of the superintendent's suite to discuss it with her personal lawyer and she was unfortunately reassured, and in her case at least, the matter did not go any further. Although the interim board until the turn-over meeting on May 7, 1991, did not officially speak for or have the legal authority to represent or bind the individual purchasers, it was clear from the evidence that they were in place to represent the interests of the purchasers and to liaise with the developers. While their conduct in response to the knowledge in November 1990, or January 1991, that the ownership of the superintendent's suite was a live issue is not in law binding upon the other purchasers, it is the only evidence I have of the response of any of the purchasers. As such, even if they were not representing the interests of the other purchasers, this is still the only evidence I have to consider.

In addition to what we heard from Bruce Wright and Carole Croft about their knowledge, Frank Turner also gave evidence about his knowledge of the issue. He had previously lived in another condominium and purchased two units in the subject premises, one to live in and the other for investment purposes. He was present at the meeting of January 9, 1991, at which time he became a member of the executive of the association. He knows there was a discussion on January 9, 1991, about the superintendent's suite and he said that at one meeting, possibly January 9, 1991, he had raised the question and had asked, when he learned that the developer might sell the unit to the purchasers, who the unit was registered to. He was, however, not able to remember the exact date of this. He is now the president of the plaintiff corporation.

Bill Taylor was not involved in the association executive until the turn-over meeting of May 7, 1991, when he was elected to the board of directors. He testified that he had no personal knowledge of an issue involving the superintendent's suite before May 7, 1991. He also said, before being shown the minutes of the May 7 meeting, that he was absolutely certain that there was no mention at that meeting of the issue with respect to the superintendent's suite and if there had been he was certain that it would have been a very memorable meeting. After being shown the minutes of the May 7 meeting of the members of the newly constituted corporation, he agreed that item 10 in those minutes "other items which need to be considered are: the purchase of a unit for the superintendent and the appointment of an auditor" accurately reflects what took place at the meeting and he then suggested that this was his first indication that the superintendent's suite was not part of the amenities of the condominium corporation. He did say, however, that while the minutes are most likely accurate, he still did not recall such a discussion on May 7. His recollection was that the first time the issue became a live one for him was on or about May 22, 1991, when the May 23 response to the developer's lawyer was being discussed by the board.

Robert Wright, Bruce Wright's father, also testified for the plaintiff. He has never been an officer or director of either the interim board or the board of directors of the plaintiff. He was out of the country at the time of the formal title closing in February of 1991, and had no knowledge of any issue with respect to the superintendent's unit until approximately May 1991, at which time he was made aware of the fact that the developer had proposed selling the superintendent's suite to the condominium corporation. He said that he was amazed, angry and frustrated, since it was not his understanding that this would happen and was not the basis upon which he had entered into his agreement of purchase and sale with the developer.

In all of the circumstances, I am simply unable to conclude or infer that the plaintiff or its members relied upon the fact that a superintendent's suite, whether suite 201 or otherwise, was to be a common element of the plaintiff or otherwise an asset owned by the plaintiff corporation free of charge.

To obtain relief under s. 52(5) the plaintiff must prove the damages it claims to have suffered as a result of its reliance on the condominium documents. Even if I am wrong with respect to the issue of reliance I am also unable to conclude that the plaintiff has proven either that it suffered any damages at all or if it did, the amount of those damages, the onus for each being on the plaintiff to prove on a balance of probabilities.

The budget statement contained in the disclosure documents provided by the developer contained an allowance for a maintenance man/janitor of $18,500 per annum. Tom Holland, the first superintendent hired by the developer, was on staff and resided in unit 201 from February 1, 1980, to November 15, 1990. He was paid a salary of $744 semi-monthly or $17,856 annually. He does not appear to have been charged any rent for unit 201 although the evidence on this point is very sketchy. Looking at all of the evidence on this point, including the payroll records for Mr. Holland, I proceed on the assumption that he earned $17,856 per year, had to declare a taxable benefit on his annual income tax return for the provision of a superintendent suite and that he did not otherwise pay anything for the use of the suite.

Sandra Rutsch testified that in another building which she manages next door at 22 Marilyn Drive, a similar building with a live-in superintendent, the superintendent is paid $19,500 per year and the suite in which he resides which the corporation purchased from the developer (a related company to the developer of the subject premises) is provided to the superintendent free of charge although he also is required to declare a taxable benefit. The only obvious difference between 22 and 24 Marilyn Drive is that No. 22 has 70 units as opposed to the 56 units in 24 Marilyn Drive.

Maria Finoro, the previous condominium manager, with experience similar to that of Sandra Rutsch, presently manages a luxury condominium containing 55 units at 8 Christopher in Guelph, a building very similar to the subject premises. In that building the superintendent is paid $16,500 and he is required to rent his own unit in the building from a private owner and receives no other benefits.

After Tom Holland resigned, the developer retained the services of Danny McLeod as a full-time live-in superintendent at 24 Marilyn Drive. Mr. McLeod was already a resident in another unit in the building, a unit owned by his father-in-law and he was paid $750 twice monthly or $18,000 per year with no further allowance or credit for the fact that he received no accommodation over and above the $18,000 per year. He was terminated by the new board of directors in early July 1991, and after that time until the present, the pay history of various part-time superintendents, relief superintendents and contract cleaning services offers no great assistance in ascertaining what might be an appropriate wage for a superintendent with or without the additional supply of a rental unit free of charge.

Based upon the history of Danny McLeod's employment by the developer and subsequently by the plaintiff and the evidence of salaries paid to other superintendents in similar buildings with or without the provision of free accommodation, I am unable to conclude that the plaintiff would be paying a live-in superintendent any more than the $18,500 provided for in the budget and it is entirely conceivable that if they were able to offer free accommodation that the appropriate salary would be substantially less. The plaintiff was not prepared to concede that if in fact the budgeted amount of $18,500 was too high the amount by which it exceeds the actual salary paid to a live-in superintendent with free rent should be credited against the costs of carrying the acquired unit in assessing what damages if any have been sustained but I am unable to agree with its position in this regard. As stated earlier, the plaintiff must prove its damages and I must conclude that neither the fact of, nor the amount of any such damages have been proven on the balance of probabilities.

Appropriate Remedy

If I am wrong with respect to the issues of reliance and damages and if the plaintiff is therefore entitled to damages as a result of the defendant's breach of s. 52 of the Condominium Act, the question is then whether or not something other than damages is more appropriate. There is a substantial and binding line of authorities (for example, Wilson J.A. in York Condominium v. Newrey, supra) standing for the proposition that where the damages are easily ascertainable, usually the actual value of the superintendent's suite in question, it would be appropriate to simply require the defendant to transfer the ownership in the suite to the condominium corporation free of charge. The evidence is that units similar to unit 201 had a fair market value, when they were being sold of approximately $135,000. It would also appear, notwithstanding the decline in the real estate market generally that the prices of the units in the subject premises have not declined and may well have increased. Mr. Ferraro further testified that a figure of $125,000 was mentioned as a possible selling price to the plaintiff and this is corroborated to some extent, as discussed earlier, in the evidence of Mr. McBride, Ms. Croft and others. It is further confirmed in a letter from the developers' lawyer to Bruce Wright dated May 31, 1991, wherein it is stated "we had advised the condominium corporation some considerable time ago that we would sell the superintendent's suite for $125,000.00 cash".

Mr. Ferraro had also testified that while the figure of $125,000 had been mentioned and was the developers' starting point, it was not at all inconceivable that the developer would have accepted an offer of something in the area of $100,000 cash from the plaintiff. Accordingly, if I had found that the plaintiff had proven damages of anything close to or above $100,000, I would have found it appropriate to order the transfer of unit 201 to the plaintiff free of charge, rather than monetary damages and would have done so.

Conclusion

For all of these reasons, I find that the plaintiff's action cannot succeed either on the basis of the common intention argument or the s. 52 argument and the action is therefore dismissed.

During the course of argument, counsel for the plaintiff indicated that if the judgment was not favourable to his clients he had received instructions to serve a notice of appeal. I hasten to add that this comment by counsel was not made in a way that might suggest a lack of conviction on his part and indeed he presented his argument in a most lucid and forceful and compelling manner. Rather, the suggestion was made in response to my disinclination, in cases where competent and thoroughly prepared counsel are arguing interesting issues to adopt the posture of the "cigar store indian", as a result of which the possibility that judgment, at least at this level, would not be favourable was not idle speculation. Counsel for the defendant argued that if the judgment was against the plaintiff the status quo should be maintained in that the superintendent's suite should not be disposed of pending the exhaustion of the plaintiff's appeal remedies and accordingly a stay is directed pursuant to rule 63.02 for a period of 30 days from the date of release of these reasons, after which time the registration of the certificate of pending litigation is to be vacated unless a further stay is sought and obtained from the Court of Appeal.

Similarly, counsel for the defendant asked that if the judgment went against the plaintiff I would reserve to myself the right to hear further evidence and submissions with respect to the question of damages, if any, to which the defendant might be entitled, pursuant to s. 103(4) of the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43, as a result of the registration of a certificate of pending litigation against the title to unit 201. After pausing to observe that a five-day trial, the somewhat uncertain state of the law which suggests that the cases are fact specific and the length of these reasons might militate against a finding that the plaintiff did not have a "reasonable claim to an interest in the land" I am prepared, if counsel cannot agree, to do so with respect to the issue of liability and damages if any. Finally the issue of costs has not been addressed by counsel and I would invite written submissions together with copies of any relevant offers or similar material within 30 days of the date of release of these reasons, failing which costs should be to the defendant on a party-and-party scale.

Action dismissed.

Confederation Life Insurance Co. v. Shepherd, McKenzie, Plaxton, Little & Jenkins

Action No. B123/92

Ontario Court of Justice - General Division Toronto, Ontario Montgomery J. Heard: October 19 - 22 and November 2 - 5, 12 and 13, 1992 Judgment: December 4, 1992

H. Lorne Morphy, Q.C. and Kent E. Thomson, for the Plaintiff. John S. McNeil, Q.C., for the Defendants.

MONTGOMERY J.:-- Confederation Life Insurance Company ("Confederation") seeks damages against its solicitors, Shepherd, McKenzie, Plaxton, Little & Jenkins ("Shepherd, McKenzie"), for breach of retainer, negligence and breach of fiduciary duty arising out of a commercial mortgage transaction.

In August, 1982, Confederation proposed to loan a purchaser of two 15-story apartment buildings in London, Ontario $7,167,294.11, secured by a first mortgage at 18.25% interest, for a 20 year term with no prepayment privilege.

Confederation claims damages in the sum of $2,669,615, together with prejudgment interest from April 12, 1985, and costs. The amount of $2,669,615 is composed of:

(a) damages in the amount of $2,458,440 representing the present value, as at April 12, 1985, of the loss which Confederation suffered as a result of having to discharge on April 12, 1985 its 20 year 18.25% first mortgage in respect of the Skyview Towers complex located at 1103 and 1105 Jalna Boulevard in London, Ontario; and (b) damages in the amount of $211,175 in respect of the expenses incurred by Confederation in proceeding with a series of contested actions, applications and motions in 1984 and 1985 involving Charles Khoury and his company 511666 Ontario Limited.

The defence contends that there was no negligence or breach of duty of the solicitor. It raises the question of contributory negligence. It also says that even if there was negligence, the plaintiff cannot establish causation. Damages are also at issue.

It is said that allowing the buildings to become condominiums had the effect, by virtue of the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C-26, of "fracturing" the 20 year term of the mortgage.

THE FACTS

Confederation is a mutual insurance company with its head office in Toronto. Shepherd, McKenzie is a partnership practising law in London, Ontario. J.H. Little and G.F. Plaxton were solicitors and partners in the firm who dealt with the subject mortgage.

On the 17th of June, 1982, Charles K. Khoury ("Khoury"), a real estate developer, residing in Fredericton, New Brunswick, phoned Bert Coates, a vice-president in charge of mortgages at Confederation, seeking financing for a London apartment project. Khoury wrote to Coates the same day enclosing the loan submission, including general data on the property, proposed financing, net worth statements, financial statements and photographs.

The project comprised two 15-storey buildings each containing 178 units of mixed bachelor, one bedroom, and two bedroom units.

The proposal stated that the project was not subject to rent control and both buildings were certified as MURBs for income tax purposes. It further contained a draft offer to purchase the subject property by Khoury Real Estate Services Ltd. from CMHC as vendor for a purchase price of $8,407,940. Khoury was to guarantee the indebtedness of the borrower.

Coates provided a copy of the proposal to his underwriting assistant Richard Warner ("Warner") who, in turn, provided a copy of the proposal to Roger Boddy ("Boddy"), then the manager of Confederation's Mortgage Investments-Ontario ("MIO") office. In his covering note to Boddy, Warner asked that Boddy have a quick look at the proposal and advised that Confederation might be interested in one half of the proposed loan.

Between June 20 and July 22, 1982 Confederation considered Khoury's loan proposal. Confederation analyzed and inspected the property and considered the financial support which CMHC was prepared to provide to facilitate the transaction. This support included, among other things, CMHC insurance in respect of Confederation's loan and ARP and ARP-like financing assistance. The nature and extent of the CMHC assistance was summarized in a Tentative Loan Inquiry compiled in early July, 1982 by Victor Gosselin ("Gosselin") of Confederation who was Boddy's assistant manager.

Mr. Rattray, Confederation's assistant vice-president and director of mortgage investments, authorized Coates and Boddy to consider making this loan at an interest rate of 18.5% over a 20 year term. Boddy was instructed to have Khoury submit a formal loan application and pay to Confederation a standby fee in an amount of $150,000.

Confederation do what they call a matching of funds. In this case Polysar as an investor had pension funds they sought to invest for 20 years. Khoury was to get a 20 year mortgage. Confederation matched the funds and looked for an interest spread generally of 1/2 to 3/4 of a percent between borrower and lender as its fee, though the spread on this transaction was tighter.

On July 22, 1982, Boddy contacted Mr. Hall, an in-house solicitor employed by Confederation, to determine whether he could act as the solicitor on this transaction on behalf of Confederation. As he was unable to do so, Mr. Hall, after consulting Martindale and Hubble to determine the rating which had been accorded to the Shepherd, McKenzie firm, recommended that Boddy contact Mr. George Plaxton ("Plaxton") of the Shepherd, McKenzie. Boddy then contacted Plaxton. Plaxton advised Boddy of a number of corporate clients for whom his firm had done mortgage work, including the Bank of Montreal, the Royal Bank of Canada, Equitable Life and Sunoco. That day, the Shepherd, McKenzie firm provided Boddy with an estimate of $10,000 in respect of its legal fees pertaining to the transaction and indicated that the necessary legal work could be completed by the then scheduled closing date of August 9, 1982. Boddy's recollection is that this information was conveyed to him on July 22, 1982 in a telephone call in which Plaxton and his partner James Henry (Kim) Little ("Little") participated by speaker phone. Mr. Little testified that he does not recall participating in that call and believes that his first contact with Confederation occurred in early August, 1982.

On August 10, 1982, Confederation retained Shepherd, McKenzie, and in particular Plaxton and Little, to act as their solicitors on the mortgage financing. No mention was made by either Plaxton or Little to Confederation at that time that they had earlier been retained by Goodman & Goodman to search title to the property on behalf of Khoury.

Written instructions to the solicitors bearing the same date confirmed that the mortgage was for $7,167,294.11 at 18.25% interest for a 20 year term with no prepayment privilege. Some time after Boddy forwarded the initial commitment letter to Khoury on August 10, 1982, Coates received a telephone call from Khoury in which Khoury requested that Confederation agree to include in the commitment letter a clause which required Confederation to consent to the registration of the Skyview Towers complex as a condominium. Coates told Khoury that Confederation would consider his request. Coates immediately contacted Boddy and instructed Boddy to investigate Khoury's request. Coates said that he specifically told Boddy that he would only consider the request if it did not affect any of the terms of the loan which Confederation proposed to make, including its term of 20 years. Boddy testified that while he does not recall the specific instructions he received from Coates, there is no question in his mind that his instructions were to conduct an investigation to ensure that the intrusion of the condominium conversion clause into the commitment letter would not affect any of the business terms of the transaction, including the closed 20 year term of the loan. For that reason, Boddy considered it essential that Shepherd, McKenzie, as Confederation's lawyers responsible for the transaction, would review the principle and the wording of any such clause. Boddy testified that given his years of experience working with Coates, he is certain that he would have sought the advice of Shepherd, McKenzie in respect of this clause before seeking the approval of Coates because that was what was expected of him.

Boddy testified that after he was initially requested by Coates to investigate Khoury's request, he discussed the wording of a proposed condominium clause with Khoury and possibly with Khoury's lawyer, Gerald Ross of the Goodman & Goodman firm. When the wording had been assembled in what Boddy considered to be a clear and sensible form, he approached the Shepherd, McKenzie firm concerning this clause to seek that firm's approval as to the principle and wording of the clause. Boddy testified that he wanted to ensure that this clause would not affect any of the terms of Confederation's loan. Boddy testified that he believes there is a remote possibility that his initial discussion with the Shepherd, McKenzie firm occurred prior to the commencement of the week of August 23, 1982 with someone other than Little. He testified that while he does not specifically recall the discussion, he believes that it occurred with Little on either August 23 or 24, 1982 and that during their discussion Little confirmed that the condominium clause was satisfactory both in principle and in wording.

Boddy was examined for discovery in this action on behalf of Confederation. He testified during his discovery that he believed his initial discussion with the Shepherd, McKenzie firm pertaining to the condominium clause occurred prior to August 19, 1982 rather than during the beginning of the week of August 23, 1982. He explained at trial that he now believes that at the time of his discovery in 1987, he placed too much emphasis on a brief note at the bottom of Khoury's telex dated August 13, 1982. The note is dated August 19, 1982 and states "amended in red on commitment letter and approved by JHC [Coates] - signed commitment letter in mail to us". Boddy testified that four of the five changes listed in Khoury's telex (none of which include or pertain to the condominium clause) were typed in red on Confederation's copy of the commitment letter. The condominium clause was also typed in red on that copy of the commitment letter. Boddy testified that in 1987, at the time of his discovery, he concluded that the brief note at the bottom of the telex must have referred to all of the changes in red on the commitment letter, including the condominium clause, and that if that clause had been approved by Coates on August 19, he must have spoken to the Shepherd, McKenzie firm on or prior to that date to obtain its advice in respect of the clause. This is so because Boddy would not have sought the consent of Coates without having first obtained the approval of Confederation's lawyers.

Boddy testified at trial that having given this issue further consideration in preparing to testify at trial, he now believes that his evidence at discovery in respect of this issue was incorrect. He testified that by the time he arrived at this conclusion, he was no longer in the employ of Confederation and was no longer in the mortgage business. He was alone in his hotel room in Toronto reviewing documents and productions when he came to this realization and was not asked or encouraged to change his evidence by anyone. Boddy testified that in preparing to give evidence at trial, he began to focus on Khoury's style as a negotiator which was to negotiate a particular issue and, once that issue had been resolved, to then attempt to negotiate another concession. Boddy testified that he now believes that after Khoury had obtained Confederation's consent to the changes listed in his telex of August 13, 1982, which consent was given by Confederation on August 19, 1982, Khoury then raised with Coates the condominium conversion issue. Boddy does not believe now that he discussed this issue with Little, or with anyone else from the Shepherd, McKenzie firm until the beginning of the week of August 23, 1982, although he recognizes that there is a remote possibility that he may have done so.

Boddy was not cross-examined at trial in respect of this change in his evidence.

Boddy testified that following his initial discussion with Little pertaining to the principle and wording of the condominium clause, he spoke with Coates. Boddy testified that after he told Coates that the clause had been approved by Confederation's solicitors, Coates gave his approval in respect of the clause. Boddy then contacted Khoury in respect of this matter. Khoury told Boddy that he would execute the commitment letter, amended to include this clause, and then return it to Confederation.

Boddy's recollection is that he again spoke with Little by telephone on August 25, 1982 concerning the condominium clause. At Little's request, Boddy dictated the wording of the clause to Little over the telephone into Little's dictation machine. Little recorded the wording of the clause in order that his secretary could transcribe the wording.

Also on August 25, 1982, Khoury deposited an executed copy of the commitment letter with Confederation's Fredericton office. The executed copy was then transmitted from Fredericton to Toronto and was received by Boddy on the morning of Friday, August 27, 1982. Boddy immediately examined the condominium clause and noticed that Khoury had made two changes to the wording of the clause which had been approved by Confederation and by Little. Boddy said he discussed these changes with Little by telephone. He asked Little whether, in view of these changes, it was satisfactory for Confederation to proceed with this transaction with Khoury by accepting the changes which Khoury had made to the commitment letter. Boddy said that Little approved the changes, including the changes which Khoury had made to the condominium clause. Boddy then sought and obtained head office approval to these changes. After having done so he initialled the various changes to the commitment letter and returned the fully executed and initialled copy to Khoury on the afternoon of Friday, August 27, 1982.

Little acknowledged during his evidence-in-chief that he had in his file a typed transcription of clause 29 of the commitment letter, the condominium clause. He stated that he believed he received this wording on August 27, rather than on August 25 and that he did not believe he was asked to address the potential implications of the Condominium Act when this clause was dictated to him by Boddy. He testified that he was simply told to insert this clause into the mortgage.

In cross-examination, however, Little admitted that:

(a) the typed version of clause 29 may have been received by him on a day other than August 27, and potentially as early as August 25;

(b) he began drafting the mortgage on August 24. He drafted the mortgage as well on August 25. The draft mortgage was checked by him on August 26 and on August 27 was sent by him to Confederation;

(c) he cannot say that he was not asked about clause 29 and whether it would affect any other term of the loan. He cannot say when he first heard of this clause; and

(d) Boddy contacted him concerning the revisions made to the condominium clause by Khoury. Little was aware that Confederation would have to agree to these changes, and to initial them on the commitment letter, before its agreement with Khoury would be effective.

Little conceded, during his examination for discovery, that he was consulted by Boddy as to the effect of clause 29 of the commitment letter [the condominium conversion clause] before the commitment letter was executed by Confederation. The following questions and answers from Little's discovery transcript, among others, were read into evidence at trial:

1450. Q. You were told yesterday, sir, when Boddy gave you 16 and 29 that he put them to you and asked for you [sic] comments on them.

A. He said can we work, are they okay. 1451. Q. Yes.

A. Can we use them in documents.

1452. Q. Yes.

A. That was my understanding of it.

1453. Q. When you got the typed second page of 29, I am suggesting to you you can't take the position that that was after the commitment letter, the revised commitment letter was sent by Confederation Life.

A. I don't intend to take that position. The position I intend to take is that I don't know when that commitment letter was sent.

1454. Q. Therefore, it would have been open to you when you got this signed condominium clause, if you had been aware of it at the time and you twigged to it, to say look, because of 7(9) and 7(10), that could cause you problems.

A. I could have said that to them at any time if I had been aware.

Little proceeded to perform the legal work required to permit the transaction to close. He drafted a mortgage, the purpose of which was to secure for Confederation a closed 20 year term at an interest rate of 18.25% with no prepayment privilege whatsoever. He confirmed to Confederation, prior to closing, that Khoury had a binding commitment on a 20 year term with no prepayment privilege. The mortgage drafted by Little included, among others, the following provision:

28A) The Mortgagee covenants and agrees that it will, upon the request of the Mortgagor, execute such consents, authorities and other documents as the mortgagor may reasonably require for the constitution of the lands and premises mortgaged hereby as a condominium pursuant to The Condominium Act of Ontario, R.S.O. 1980, as the same may be amended from time to time. PROVIDED that the Mortgagee shall have the right to approve the Declaration, description, By-laws and all other documents constituting the said lands and premises as a condominium, which approval shall not be unreasonably withheld. PROVIDED FURTHER that during the full term of this mortgage, the lands and premises mortgaged hereby shall be operated as a single rental apartment project, and in the event of the sale or transfer of any one or more individual condominium units to a purchaser or purchasers who occupies or occupy any such unit or manages the same as a rental unit or units separate from the remainder of the units in the said condominium, then all moneys hereby secured with accrued interest thereon shall forthwith become due and payable. PROVIDED FURTHER that all reasonable legal fees incurred by the Mortgagee in so executing an approving shall be borne by the Mortgagor, shall be payable forthwith, and shall be a charge on the lands mortgaged hereby with interest as herein provided until paid.

The transaction closed on September 22, 1982. The mortgage which had been drafted by Little and executed both by Khoury and by 511666 was registered against title to the Skyview Towers property. On the day of closing, Little executed a document entitled "Preliminary Report and Request for Funds", in which he certified that on closing Confederation would receive a first charge on the Skyview Towers property in accordance with its Instructions to Solicitors. This document was handed by Little to Gosselin at the closing on September 22, 1982. Confederation then released its first advance of funds under its mortgage in an amount of $6,863,544.11. The remainder of the funds under the mortgage, an amount of $303,750, was released by Confederation on December 15, 1982.

Sections 7(9),7(10) and 61 of the Condominium Act provided:

7-(9) Any unit and common interest may be discharged from such an encumbrance by payment to the claimant of a portion of the sum claimed, determined by the proportions specified in the declaration for sharing the common interests.

(10) Upon payment of a portion of the encumbrance sufficient to discharge a unit and common interest, and upon demand, the claimant shall give to the owner a discharge of that unit and common interest in accordance with the regulations.

61. This Act applies notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary.

Little did not alert Confederation to the risk that the registration of this project as a condominium would enable 511666 to prepay the mortgage. He did not identify or refer to the relevant provisions of the Condominium Act. He admitted in cross-examination that he forgot about those provisions in advising Confederation in respect of the transaction. Little did not advise Confederation as to the steps which might have been available to it to protect against the risk of prepayment. Nor did he draft provisions in the mortgage which would have protected adequately the rights and interests of Confederation. This is so even though it was a fundamental term of the instructions which were provided to Little that Confederation's mortgage was to be for a closed term of 20 years at an interest rate which, by the scheduled closing date, was above the interest rate then prevailing in the market. Little was aware at the time that Confederation had matched the funds it had loaned to Khoury with its obligations to Polysar.

Boddy testified that if he had been advised by Little that the condominium clause might have given rise to a risk of prepayment, he would not have agreed to the clause unless Little could have suggested wording which protected against that risk.

Little held himself out to Confederation as having considerable expertise in the area of real estate law. At the time of the transaction, Little had practised for 22 years. Approximately 85% of his time was spent practising in the real estate area. In the ten year period prior to August, 1982, Little had acted on four or five apartment building transactions and for approximately six mortgagors or mortgagees in connection with condominium transactions. At no time did Little advise Confederation that he was not competent to act as the solicitor on this transaction, either before or after the condominium issue arose. Little was aware of the provisions of ss. 7(9), 7(10) and 61 of the Condominium Act as at August, 1982. He had been so aware for a number of years. He failed, however, to direct his mind to these provisions in advising Confederation in respect of the transaction and in performing the legal work pertaining to the transaction in August and September, 1982. On Little's own admission he forgot about these provisions.

Little conceded during his examination for discovery that if he could do this transaction today, having regard to the relevant provisions of the Condominium Act, he would do "something completely different" from what he did in 1982. This evidence was read in at trial. Little testified that if he could do the transaction again, he would incorporate clauses in the mortgage to counteract the effects of ss. 7(9) and (10) of the Condominium Act for the purpose of protecting the interests of Confederation. On June 3, 1983 Khoury wrote to Coates and enclosed three pages of cash flow projections which he said had been prepared by Ralph Neville ("Neville") of Dunwoody. Neville was Khoury's financial advisor and had advised Khoury in respect of the syndication of Skyview Towers as a MURB. Khoury maintained that because of, among other things, Confederation's 18.25% interest rate mortgage, the Skyview Towers project had no medium or long term economic viability. He asked that Confederation agree to substantial reductions in the interest rate under its mortgage. In a telex dated June 8, 1983, Khoury reiterated this request. He maintained that he intended to sell the project completely by December 31, 1983.

Coates provided to Boddy, Khoury's letter of June 3, 1983 and the accompanying schedules, as well as Khoury's telex of June 8, 1983, and asked Boddy to review these documents with a view to making a recommendation to Coates as to the manner in which Confederation should respond to Khoury's request. Boddy was assisted in this task by Gosselin, who had considerable experience in cash flow analysis. Neither Gosselin nor Boddy considered the unsubstantiated figures which had been provided by Khoury to be particularly plausible. Boddy testified that throughout this period, he had doubts as to the veracity or reliability of Khoury's figures.

On June 15, 1983, Boddy met with Khoury for the purpose of discussing Khoury's stated concerns pertaining to the viability of the Skyview Towers project. During this meeting, Khoury told Boddy that he had received a written opinion from Mr. Donahue of the McCarthy & McCarthy firm to the effect that upon registration of the project as a condominium the mortgagor could demand that Confederation accept repayment in full of the amounts then outstanding under its mortgage. Khoury did not provide Boddy with a copy of Mr. Donahue's opinion. He specifically prohibited Boddy from contacting either Mr. Neville or Mr. Donahue.

Boddy reacted to Khoury's statement concerning the legal opinion he had apparently received with surprise, alarm and disbelief. He immediately contacted Coates to advise him of what had transpired and then contacted Little. Little told Boddy that by means of a waiver by Confederation, clause 28A of the mortgage, which required Confederation to consent to the registration of the Skyview Towers complex as a condominium, could be nullified. Boddy testified that Little undertook to look into the matter further and write to Confederation.

On June 17, 1983, Little forwarded his written opinion in respect of the prepayment issue to Boddy. The first paragraph of Little's letter stated the following:

You have asked us to express to you our opinion concerning the right of the mortgagor under Section 28A to make payment in full of the amount secured by the mortgage in the event the project is registered as a condominium, and individual lots are sold and either occupied by the owner or operated as rental units outside the rental pool relating to the balance of the building.

In his letter of June 17, 1983, Little concluded by expressing the unqualified opinion that because Confederation had the right to waive a condition in clause 28A of the mortgage in respect of the use of the Skyview Towers property as a single rental apartment project, the mortgagor was not entitled to oblige Confederation to accept payment of the full amount of the mortgage under this clause.

In researching and writing his opinion letter, dated June 17, 1983, Little did not refer to, or even advert to, the provisions of ss. 7(9), 7(10) or 61 of the Condominium Act. He did not direct his mind to these provisions, even though they were directly relevant to the subject matter of the letter. Little admitted that in writing the letter, he did not answer the question which was put to him. Little conceded during his examination for discovery that if he knew in 1982 what he knew at the time of his discovery, he would have referred to the relevant provisions of the Condominium Act in writing his opinion letter. This evidence was read in at trial.

Craig Arthurs ("Arthurs"), currently a legal vice-president and associate general counsel of Confederation, said that he met with and interviewed Little at Little's office in London, Ontario, on September 25, 1984. He said that his memorandum of September 27, 1984 summarizes accurately the nature of his discussion with Little during their meeting. That memorandum states, among other things, the following:

In any event, Mr. Little showed a note to his file (copy attached) which he says records a telephone conversation he had with Roger Boddy in which Mr. Boddy provided him with the wording to clause 29 (later addendum 5) dealing with the registration of the property as a condominium ...

I asked Mr. Little whether Mr. Boddy was reporting this wording to Mr. Little as a fait accompli. He states that this was not the case and he believes that Mr. Boddy was asking him what he thought of the clause prior to agreeing to it. He did not find anything wrong with it at the time ...

Mr. Little stated that at the time of closing they were not really concerned with protecting a high interest rate but rather ensuring that the property itself or units could not be sold to someone who Confederation Life did not approve of. He stated that he was not then aware of any argument to the effect that the provisions of the Condominium Act would allow the discharge of a blanket mortgage once the condominium was registered. The first time he was aware of this argument was when Chris [Ahlvik] contacted him in June or July of 1983

Little had at least five separate retainers on behalf of Khoury. They included the following:

FIRST: Little was retained on July 5, 1982 to act as agent for Khoury's solicitors, Goodman & Goodman, in arranging for a full title search in respect of the Skyview Towers properties. He forwarded his title searcher's notes relating to this task to Goodman & Goodman on July 21, 1982;

SECOND: In August, 1982, Little was retained by Khoury to provide an opinion on the title of the Skyview Towers property;

THIRD: Little was retained by Khoury in approximately September or October, 1982, to register the Skyview Towers property as a condominium;

FOURTH: Little was retained by Khoury after September, 1982 to handle certain landlord and tenant issues which arose in respect of the Skyview Towers property; and FIFTH: Little was retained by Khoury to undertake a name search for him.

Little conceded in cross-examination that it is doubtful that he told Confederation about his first retainer, that of searching title for Khoury in respect of the Skyview Towers property, at the time Shepherd, McKenzie was first contacted by Confederation in respect of this transaction in July, 1982. He agreed in cross-examination that the only reason for not telling Confederation about his first retainer is that if he had told Confederation about that retainer, Confederation would probably have retained someone else to handle the transaction. Boddy testified that he was never told about this retainer. He testified that if he had been told of this retainer when he first contacted the Shepherd, McKenzie firm, he would probably have excused himself from his conversation and gone back to discuss the issue with Mr. Hall, Confederation's senior in-house real estate lawyer. Boddy explained that it was not Confederation's policy, other than for staff loans, to use the borrower's solicitor for mortgage work. This was so because Confederation wanted to have its own solicitors look after its interests.

Little also conceded that he did not advise Confederation of his fourth or fifth retainers; nor did he contact Confederation to seek its approval before accepting his third retainer from Khoury in September or October, 1982 in respect of the conversion of the Skyview Towers project into a condominium. This was so even though Little was still acting as the solicitor for Confederation at the time in respect of the mortgage transaction. On June 15, 1983, Little advised Boddy that he saw a conflict of interest in acting on behalf of Khoury in respect of the condominium conversion. He told Boddy that he regarded Confederation as his primary client and that he would proceed very carefully or stop acting for Khoury. He had been told that day of Boddy's concerns as to the potential implications which a condominium conversion might have in respect of the prepayment of Confederation's mortgage. Little continued, however, to act on Khoury's behalf in respect of the conversion of the Skyview Towers property into a condominium. Indeed, on June 17, 1983, the very day that he forwarded his written opinion to Confederation in respect of the prepayment issue in which he failed to refer to the relevant provisions of the Condominium Act and two days after he told Boddy that he was aware he was in a position of conflict, Little met with London Development Consulting Services and Khoury for the purposes of proceeding with the conversion of Skyview Towers into a condominium.

Furthermore, Little continued to perform services for Khoury in respect of the conversion of Skyview Towers into a condominium throughout 1983. On July 11, 1983, acting in his capacity as the solicitor for Khoury, Little forwarded to Boddy a draft declaration of condominium and asked that Confederation provide its comments in respect of the draft declaration as soon as possible. Shortly thereafter, Little began assisting Confederation in redrafting the condominium conversion documents he had originally drafted on behalf of Khoury for the purpose of protecting the 20 year term of Confederation's mortgage by defeating Khoury's right or ability to prepay the mortgage. Little did not advise Khoury that he had undertaken this task for Confederation. Nor did he seek Khoury's consent before doing so. Little denied at trial that he was in a position of conflict at the time. He conceded, however, that in hindsight, knowing what he knows today, he would have sought the consent of Confederation before purporting to act on Khoury's behalf in respect of the conversion of the Skyview Towers project to a condominium.

KHOURY LITIGATION

Khoury expressed concern repeatedly in July and August, 1983 concerning the refusal of Confederation to consent unconditionally to the registration of Skyview Towers as a condominium. He wrote to Gosselin on July 21, 1983 and asked that the consent of Confederation be provided as soon as possible. He took the position that any delay by Confederation in providing its consent could have very serious consequences for the marketing of Skyview Towers. Khoury reiterated this concern in a letter to Gosselin dated July 29, 1983.

On August 2, 1983, Khoury wrote to Confederation to advise that he would no longer make payments under the Confederation mortgage. Khoury took this position because Confederation had refused to consent to the conversion of the Skyview Towers project into a condominium. No amounts were paid by Khoury under the mortgage between September, 1983 and April, 1985.

After Khoury stopped making payments under the mortgage in August, 1983, he persisted in his attempts to require Confederation to provide its unqualified consent to the conversion of Skyview Towers to a condominium. Confederation refused to do so, and sought to compel Khoury to execute a condominium conversion documents which would protect the term of Confederation's mortgage. Litigation ensued between the borrower and the lender.

Craig Arthurs was called to the Bar of Ontario in 1979 and thereafter practised with the Toronto law firm of Torkin, Manes & Cohen as a litigation counsel. In that capacity, Arthurs handled predominantly commercial litigation and practised before all levels of courts in Ontario. He was actively involved both in trial work and appellate work. In 1981, Arthurs joined the legal department of Confederation as assistant counsel. Throughout his career with Confederation, he has continued to be responsible for litigation matters.

Arthurs testified at length concerning the litigation which arose in 1984 and 1985 between Confederation and Khoury. He explained that in that period, five separate proceedings were commenced between the parties. Arthurs testified that Confederation's obligation to consent to the conversion of the Skyview Towers project to a condominium was central to each of these proceedings. They were:

(a) Confederation's action against Khoury and his company 511666 for arrears under the mortgage commenced by specially endorsed writ in March, 1984;

(b) Confederation's action against Khoury and his company 511666 for arrears under the mortgage commenced by way of specially endorsed writ in July, 1984;

(c) Khoury's action against Confederation for declarations, mandatory orders and damages commenced in October, 1983 and served in May, 1984;

(d) Confederation's application for the appointment of a receiver in respect of the Skyview Towers project; and

(e) Khoury's application to determine a number of points of law pertaining to the condominium conversion clause and the effect of ss. 7(9) and 7(10) of the Condominium Act.

In these proceedings, the only substantive issue raised by Khoury which did not pertain to the obligations of Confederation to consent to condominium registration pertained to Khoury's argument that he was released from his personal covenant. Arthurs testified that Confederation was confident in its position that Khoury was still bound by his covenant.

Arthurs testified that in the fall of 1983, Confederation retained Fraser & Beatty to act on its behalf in respect of the litigation involving Khoury. Confederation was represented, in particular, by John Adams, a senior litigator with particular expertise in mortgage enforcement proceedings. Khoury was represented by Thomas Heintzman of the McCarthy & McCarthy firm. Arthurs testified that McCarthy took every procedural step available to it to delay and hinder Confederation's actions against Khoury. Repeated threats were made by Khoury, through his solicitors, to hold Confederation liable for millions of dollars of damages arising out of Confederation's refusal to provide it unconditional consent to the registration of the Skyview Towers project as a condominium. Khoury provided Confederation with reports from his MURB expert, Mr. Neville, to substantiate his claim for damages.

On September 28, 1984, Confederation proceeded with an application for the appointment of an interim receiver of the Skyview towers project to receive the rents from the project and to pay the amounts due under the mortgage. Arthurs testified that Confederation had initially been reluctant to pursue such a remedy because there was a slight risk that by doing so it would confer upon Khoury the right to redeem the mortgage. There were several judicial decisions in the spring of 1984, however, in Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia which clarified the law in this area and held that no right of redemption would arise if a mortgagee appointed a receiver of mortgaged premises or went into possession.

Confederation's application was heard by Mr. Justice Smith. For reasons released on October 22, 1984, Mr. Justice Smith dismissed the application. In responding to the application, Khoury had taken the position that Confederation was disentitled to the relief sought by it because, among other things, Confederation had unreasonably withheld its consent to the registration of the Skyview Towers project as a condominium. Mr. Justice Smith indicated in his reasons that he was inclined to favour Khoury's position and stated that in his view the case of Confederation was "generally speaking a weak one". Mr. Justice Smith awarded the costs of the application to Khoury in any event of the cause.

In January and February, 1985, Khoury proceeded with an application for the following declarations:

(a) that the mortgagee under the terms of the mortgage is not entitled to insist that the declaration proposed to be filed by the mortgagor for the purpose of constituting and registering the mortgaged premises, a condominium, ... shall contain certain conditions demanded by the mortgagee in the form of Articles IX and X, hereafter set out; and

(b) That after the mortgaged premises are constituted and registered as a condominium, any unit holders may, by virtue of s. 7(9) and 7(10) of the Condominium Act discharge the mortgage from any and all units by a single lump sum payment or payments on a unit-by-unit basis, equal in the aggregate to the principal amount secured under the mortgage, at the date of payment, plus accrued interest.

The application was heard by Mr. Justice Griffiths (as he then was). He held that:

(a) in respect of the declaration set out in paragraph (a) above, the answer was negative. Mr. Justice Griffiths held that Articles IX and X were not, by law, authorized to be inserted in the condominium declaration; and

(b) in respect of the declaration sought in paragraph (b) above, the answer was in the affirmative. Mr. Justice Griffiths held that the effect of ss. 7(9) and 7(10) of the Condominium Act is that once a mortgagee has consented to the registration of a condominium declaration, as he found Confederation had covenanted to do, the mortgagee thereby agrees to the granting of partial discharges even though the mortgage is a closed mortgage and is not redeemable for a term certain. Mr. Justice Griffiths held that Confederation had expressly recognized the right of the mortgagor to convert the apartment buildings into a condominium and had covenanted to execute the necessary consent and any of the documents as the mortgagor might reasonably require.

Mr. Justice Griffiths left open several issues to be determined at trial. These issues included the right of Confederation to enforce the provisions of the commitment letter which prohibited the sale of individual condominium units during the term of the mortgage and whether, in the circumstances, Khoury was estopped from exercising his rights under clause 28A of the mortgage.

THE SETTLEMENT

Arthurs said that Confederation was extremely concerned by the decisions of Mr. Justice Smith and Mr. Justice Griffiths. By the end of February, 1985 Confederation had not received any payments under its mortgage for a period of approximately 17 months. Confederation had no reasonable prospect of securing the rents in the short term. Confederation was faced with the prospect of protracted and expensive litigation with Khoury and with a sizeable counterclaim for damages by Khoury that increased with the passage of time. There were a number of weaknesses in Confederation's estoppel claim against Khoury and the matter was not expected to reach trial for approximately two-and-a-half years. As a result of these and other factors, Confederation decided to attempt to settle all of the outstanding litigation with Khoury. In making this decision, Confederation considered fully all of the options and arguments available to it, including the so-called estoppel argument.

Confederation ultimately reached a settlement with Khoury on March 28, 1985. Pursuant to this settlement, Khoury agreed to pay to Confederation the mortgage principal as well as all arrears and compound interest up to and including April 12, 1985.

Arthurs testified that having regard to, among other things, his professional experience, both as litigation counsel and as counsel to Confederation, his knowledge and understanding of Confederation's business transaction with Khoury, his knowledge and understanding of Confederation's various dealings with Khoury and his counsel from August, 1982 onwards, his knowledge and understanding of the ongoing litigation between Confederation and Khoury as at March, 1985, and the possible outcome of that litigation, and having regard to the assistance and advice which Confederation had received from experts who were consulted by it at the time, including MURB experts, his opinion at the time was that the settlement reached with Khoury in March, 1985 was fair and reasonable in the circumstances. Arthurs testified that in his view, settlement with Khoury at that time was the only practical alternative available to Confederation.

LIABILITY

When Confederation contacted Shepherd, McKenzie in July, 1982 to act on its behalf on this commercial mortgage transaction, they held themselves out as experienced, competent and available. Little was put forward as a senior member of the Bar able to handle all aspects of such a transaction. Confederation was told of other clients of the firm for whom complex and sizeable transactions had been handled. Availability was critical because the original closing date was to have been in a few weeks, namely, September 9. Not a word was said to Boddy about the retainer Little had from Goodman & Goodman to search the same title for Khoury weeks earlier. Confederation might have sought another firm of solicitors if it had been advised of Little's earlier retainer. Indeed Boddy said he might have gone elsewhere had he been told.

There can be no dispute about the term of Shepherd, McKenzie's retainer. It was to prepare a mortgage for a 20 year term at 18.25% with no prepayment provision. Shepherd, McKenzie had to give proper legal advice for the preparation of the mortgage. It was important to Coates and Boddy that when Khoury requested a condominium clause be put in the commitment letter, that it should not alter the closed feature of the mortgage because of the matching feature. Boddy says he spoke to Little three times about the condominium clause, on the 23rd or 24th of August, the 25th of August when the actual wording was discussed, and again on the 27th when the Khoury revision was discussed.

I find that the commitment letter was not finalized by Confederation until they had Little's assurance that consent to the condominium clause did not affect the term of the mortgage.

I am satisfied that without that assurance, Confederation would not have agreed to the inclusion of the clause in the commitment letter. Little was asked in chief about clause 29 of the commitment letter being dictated to him and why he did not have the Condominium Act in mind. His answer to his own solicitor was he was not asked about the Act. I find that to be incredible. It was his duty to advise Confederation of the effect of a public statute. He admitted in cross-examination that he forgot to address his mind to the Act. He also admitted that he could not say that Boddy had not asked him about the effect of the Act. He was aware of the provisions of ss. 7(9) and 7(10) but failed to direct his mind to them.

Arthurs confirmed that Little told him in 1984 that Boddy had asked him what he thought of the condominium clause before Confederation initialled the commitment letter.

A solicitor has a duty to inform a client about the legal effect of a factual situation put before him.

I conclude that Confederation acted to their detriment on Little's advice.

When drafting the mortgage, Little had two potential conflicting clauses. He had an obligation to draft provisions to negative inconsistency.

Two experts gave uncontradicted evidence as to how that could be done. The first, Reuben M. Rosenblatt, is a senior partner of the Toronto law firm Minden, Gross, Grafstein & Greenstein. Mr. Rosenblatt graduated from Osgoode Hall in 1959 and obtained the degree of Masters of Law in 1977. He has acted in virtually all aspects of real estate transactions and has dealt extensively with mortgages in both commercial and residential transactions. He has lectured in real estate law at Osgoode Hall Law School for the last 15 years and does opinion work for the Law Society of Upper Canada pertaining to the issue of solicitor's negligence.

Mr. Rosenblatt testified that in his opinion, one of the fundamental terms of the commitment letter executed by Khoury and Confederation was that the loan from Confederation be for a closed term of 20 years. He testified that in his opinion, Little should have been aware of the effect which ss. 7(9), 7(10) and 61 of the Condominium Act might have in the circumstances of this case and that registration of the Skyview Towers project as a condominium could result in the fracturing of the mortgage. He said that in his opinion, Little had a duty to advise Confederation of this risk. He testified that this duty existed both in London and in Toronto and existed whether the client was an individual or a sophisticated lending institution. Mr. Rosenblatt also testified that even if Little had only been consulted after the terms of the commitment letter had been finalized and agreed to between Confederation and Khoury, he had an obligation to advise Confederation as to the potential inconsistency between the condominium conversion clause and the closed 20 year term of the mortgage. He testified that Little would then have had an obligation to attempt to draft provisions in the mortgage which reconciled these provisions, such as, for instance, by including in the mortgage a provision pursuant to which the mortgagor, upon prepayment of the mortgage, would be required to pay a penalty in accordance with a predetermined actuarial formula designed to adequately compensate the mortgagee.

Mr. Rosenblatt, in cross-examination, was asked whether Confederation could simply have enforced the provision of the mortgage in clause 28A which required the mortgagor to operate Skyview Towers as a single rental project during the full term of the mortgage, and the term in Addendum 5 to the commitment letter which provided that for the full term of the mortgage there would be no sales of individual condominium units. Mr. Rosenblatt testified that in his opinion these obligations were unenforceable. He testified that in his opinion, a mortgagee could not prohibit the sale of individual condominium units under the Condominium Act.

The second expert who testified in respect of this issue for Confederation was Abraham Feinstein of the Ottawa law firm Soloway, Wright. Mr. Feinstein is a senior partner of that firm, having been called to the Bar of Ontario in 1965. He carries on an active real estate and devotes in excess of 90% of his time to that area. His practice involves, among other things, mortgage financing and commercial real estate transactions. He has acted for borrowers and for lenders. Mr. Feinstein has lectured for the Canadian Bar Association and the Law Society of Upper Canada in real estate matters and has been a lecturer or group leader in real estate courses for the Bar Admission course. He is a bencher of the Law Society of Upper Canada.

Mr. Feinstein testified that in his opinion, in the circumstances of this case, Little had a duty to make himself aware of the risk that ss. 7(9) and 7(10) of the Condominium Act exposed Confederation's mortgage to prepayment by the mortgagor upon registration of the Skyview Towers project as a condominium. He testified that in his opinion, Little also had a duty to advise Confederation of that risk. Mr. Feinstein testified that if Little had sought to draft the mortgage in an effort to reconcile the two potentially conflicting provisions in the commitment letter, he could have reconciled these by using his authority under clause 6(a) of the commitment letter to include a provision which made it a condition of Confederation's consent to the registration of the premises as a condominium that the borrower agree to register a mortgage with similar terms on each individual unit to replace the mortgagee's blanket mortgage.

John Robert Cowan was called as an expert in respect of this issue by the defendants. Mr. Cowan was called to the Bar of Ontario in 1962. He practised for many years with the firm Dyer, Brown in London and recently joined the firm Harrison, Elwood. Mr. Cowan devotes approximately 60% of his time to real estate matters. He also acts for small businesses, such as car dealerships and food processors.

Mr. Cowan testified that in his opinion, the effect of ss. 7(9) and 7(10) of the Condominium Act was not 'widely known' in London prior to the decision of Mr. Justice Griffiths in February, 1985, and that he does not believe that the "average solicitor" in London had a clear appreciation of these provisions in 1982, particularly when considered together with s. 61. He testified that if he had been asked to draft a provision in a mortgage which gave effect to the condominium clause in the commitment letter, he might have ended up with a clause like Little's clause 28A. He described this as a "pretty good clause".

Mr. Cowan testified that in his opinion, Little should have referred to ss. 7(9) and 7(10) of the Condominium Act in writing his opinion letter of June 17, 1983.

Mr. Cowan conceded in cross-examination that there is no different standard which applies in respect of a solicitor's obligations in London when compared with either Toronto or Ottawa. He testified that if a solicitor was aware of the inconsistencies in the commitment letter, he had an obligation to so advise his clients. He also testified that in providing his opinion in respect of this matter, he assumed that Little was not asked by Confederation whether the condominium clause in the commitment letter could affect the term of Confederation's mortgage. Mr. Cowan stated that in preparing his opinion, he had met with and interviewed Little who had been a friend of his for many years. Mr. Cowan conceded that if Little was asked for his advice in respect of the condominium clause, he had an obligation to advise Confederation as to the potential effects which might be caused by the relevant provisions of the Condominium Act. He agreed that even if a client was a large and sophisticated insurance company, the client was entitled to receive full and competent advice. Mr. Cowan agreed that if one considered clause 28A of the mortgage in light of the relevant provisions of the Condominium Act, one could not say that it was "a pretty good clause".

Because of the close friendship between Mr. Cowan and Mr. Little, and because of the greater experience of Confederation's experts over that of Mr. Cowan, where there is conflict I accept the opinion of Rosenblatt and Feinstein.

I accept the evidence of Boddy where it conflicts with that of Little. I felt Boddy had better detailed recollection than Little.

The Supreme Court of Canada considered the vexed question of concurrent liability in tort and contract in Central Trust Co. v. Rafuse, [1986] 2 S.C.R. 147. LeDain J., speaking for the Court, said at pp. 204-206:

I must now attempt to draw conclusions from what I fear has been a much too lengthy survey of judicial opinion on the question of concurrent liability. My conclusions as to what I conceive, with great respect, to be the opinion with which I am in agreement on the various issues underlying this question may be summarized as follows.

1. The common law duty of care that is created by a relationship of sufficient proximity, in accordance with the general principle affirmed by Lord Wilberforce in Anns v. Merton London Borough Council, is not confined to relationships that arise apart from contract. Although the relationships in Donoghue v. Stevenson, Hedley Byrne and Anns were all of a non-contractual nature and there was necessarily reference in the judgments to a duty of care that exists apart from or independently of contract. I find nothing in the statements of general principle in those cases to suggest that the principle was intended to be confined to relationships that arise apart from contract. Indeed, the dictum of Lord Macmillan in Donoghue v. Stevenson concerning concurrent liability, which I have quoted earlier, would clearly suggest the contrary. I also find this conclusion to be persuasively demonstrated, with particular reference to Hedley Byrne, by the judgment of Oliver J. in Midland Bank Trust. As he suggests, the question is whether there is a relationship of sufficient proximity, not how it arose. The principle of tortious liability is for reasons of public policy a general one. See Arenson v. Casson Beckman Rutley & Co., [1977] A.C. 405, per Lord Simon of Glaisdale at p. 417. Junior Books Ltd. v. Veitchi Co., [1983] 1 A.C. 521, in which an owner sued flooring subcontractors directly in tort, is authority for the proposition that a common law duty of care may be created by a relationship of proximity that would not have arisen but for a contract.

2. What is undertaken by the contract will indicate the nature of the relationship that gives rise to the common law duty of care, but the nature and scope of the duty of care that is asserted as the foundation of the tortious liability must not depend on specific obligations or duties created by the express terms of the contract. It is in that sense that the common law duty of care must be independent of the contract. The distinction, in so far as the terms of the contract are concerned, is, broadly speaking, between what is to be done and how it is to be done. A claim cannot be said to be in tort if it depends for the nature and scope of the asserted duty of care on the manner in which an obligation or duty has been expressly and specifically defined by a contract. Where the common law duty of care is co-extensive with that which arises as an implied term of the contract it obviously does not depend on the terms of the contract, and there is nothing flowing from contractual intention which should preclude reliance on a concurrent or alternative liability in tort. The same is also true of reliance on a common law duty of care that falls short of a specific obligation or duty imposed by the express terms of a contract.

4. The above principles apply to the liability of a solicitor to a client for negligence in the performance of the professional services for which he has been retained. There is no sound reason of principle or policy why the solicitor should be in a different position in respect of concurrent liability from that of other professionals.

5. The basis of the solicitor's liability in tort for negligence and the client's right in such case to recover for purely financial loss is the principle affirmed in Hedley Byrne and treated in Anns as an application of a general principle of tortious liability for negligence based on the breach of a duty of care arising from a relationship of sufficient proximity. That principle is not confined to professional advice but applies to any act or omission in the performance of the services for which a solicitor has been retained. See Midland Bank Trust Co. v. Hett, Stubbs & Kemp, at p. 416, Tracy v. Atkins (1979), 105 D.L.R. (3d) 632, at p. 638.

Little breached his fiduciary duty to Confederation when they retained him by failing to advise of his earlier retainer to search title on the same property for Khoury. That alone is insufficient to attract any liability. However, the undisclosed retainers continued through 1983. Little acted for Khoury in getting the condominium registered, the very thing that affected the closed mortgage. Little told Boddy that Confederation was his primary client and he would be careful.

The very day that Little wrote a letter of June 17th to Boddy giving an opinion on right of redemption he met with agents of Khoury in London working on the condominium registration. Little prepared condominium documents for Khoury. They were sent to Confederation for execution. When Confederation said they needed more protection, Little re-worked for Confederation the documents he had crafted for Khoury to send to Confederation. He did not even tell Khoury that he was re-drafting the documents for Confederation.

In my view, Little showed a complete misapprehension of the duty a solicitor owes to a client. There is a higher duty on one who works both sides of the street.

Wilson J.A., as she then was, looked at the duty of solicitors in Davey v. Woolley, Hames, Dale & Dingwall et al. (1982), 35 O.R. (2d) 599 (leave to appeal to S.C.C. denied) at p. 602:

... A solicitor is in a fiduciary relationship to his client and must avoid situations where he has or potentially may develop a conflict of interests: see Boardman et al. v. Phipps, [1967] 2 A.C. 46, [1966] 3 All E.R. 721 at 756. This is not confined to situations where his client's interests and his own are in conflict although it of course covers that situation. It also precludes him from acting for two clients adverse in interest unless, having been fully informed of the conflict and understanding its implications, they have agreed in advance to his doing so. The underlying premise in both these situations is that, human nature being what it is, the solicitor cannot give his exclusive, undivided attention to the interests of his client if he is torn between his client's interests and his own or his client's interests and those of another client to whom he owes the self-same duty of loyalty, dedication and good faith.

It was submitted by counsel for the defendants that it is not a hard and fast rule that solicitors cannot act on both sides of a transaction and, indeed, that it is not uncommon for solicitors, particularly in rural areas, to represent both vendor and purchaser on a real estate deal provided they make full disclosure and both parties consent to their acting. This may well be true although even in the case of a so-called "simple" real estate deal, I doubt that it is good practice. In any event the solicitor unquestionably assumes a dual role at his own risk, the onus being on him in any lawsuit that ensues to establish that the client has had "the best professional assistance which, if he had been engaged in a transaction with a third party, he could possibly have afforded": see London Loan & Savings Co. of Canada et al. v. Brickenden, [1933] S.C.R. 257 at 262, [1933] 3 D.L.R. 161 [affirmed [1934] 3 D.L.R. 465, [1934] 2 W.W.R. 545 (P.C.)] (Crocket J. quoting from Lord O'Hagan in McPherson v. Watt (1877), 3 App. Cas. 254 at 266). Even on the simple real estate deal the consequences of conflict can manifest themselves in a failure to make the requisition that allegedly should have been made and would have been made if the solicitor had been motivated solely by a concern for the plaintiff. On a transaction of the degree of complexity of the one before the Court on this appeal I think it is clear that the solicitor cannot act on both sides and all the more so when there is superadded to the divided loyalty owed to the two clients adverse in interest the personal financial interest of the solicitor's senior partner. ... I think the trial judge was also wrong in thinking that Mr. Stevens was relieved of the obligation to warn the plaintiff against aspects of the transaction, if any, on which he was vulnerable just because he had his accountant to advise him. None of these things, it seems to me, excuse the solicitor from making a determination when he is first approached to act on a transaction whether he can in fact do so. He has to take stock of his position at that time and, looking down the road, decide as conscientiously as he can if he can represent the client or should send him elsewhere. Obviously there will be situations which fall on the border line and the issue for the solicitor will be whether or not to take a calculated risk. I do not view this as one of those cases.

As the transaction progressed the plaintiff's need for truly independent legal advice became even clearer. Should he have been advised of the risks of giving a warranty to the purchaser that the company's loss in the year of sale would not exceed a certain figure? Should he have received guarantees of the indebtedness on the notes representing the non-cash portion of the purchase price? Should he have received security for these notes? Should there have been an acceleration clause in the agreement making the unpaid balance fall due on default? Was the plaintiff prejudiced by the fact that the defendant law firm, having acted for the plaintiff and his companies previously, knew that he had been unsuccessful in having his credit extended at the bank and was therefore very anxious to sell? Was he prejudiced by the fact that they also knew from acting for Corporate Master Limited and from Mr. Woolley's personal involvement that unsecured and unguaranteed notes of Corporate Master Limited represented a substantial risk? In my opinion, Mr. Stevens, in undertaking to represent the plaintiff on this transaction, put himself in a position where it was virtually impossible for him to satisfy the onus of showing that the plaintiff had not been adversely affected by his divided loyalty. Indeed, when a dispute subsequently arose between the parties as to their legal rights under the agreement and a settlement of the dispute was negotiated, Mr. Stevens continued to act on both sides, reporting directly to Mr. Woolley by in-house memorandum on the progress of the negotiations. This memorandum makes it clear that Mr. Stevens was not devoting his efforts exclusively to the plaintiff.

On the appeal counsel for the defendants relied very heavily on an acknowledgment signed by the plaintiff on the closing of the transaction. In it the plaintiff acknowledged that he had been told that the defendants were acting on both sides of the transaction and that Mr. Woolley had a personal interest in it and that he nevertheless consented to have the defendants represent him. However, Mr. Stevens testified that the need "to take some precautions" of this kind did not occur to him until October or November of 1975 when he realized that the Howe option was going to be exercised and Corporate Master Limited was going to be the purchaser.

Little failed in his duty to warn Confederation of the effect of the condominium clause in the commitment letter. He had a duty of care under his retainer as well as a common law duty of care that arose from the solicitor-client relationship.

Where, as in this case, a solicitor undertakes to provide advice and legal services in respect of a transaction which is governed or affected, in whole or in part, by a public statute such as the Condominium Act, the solicitor bears the burden of exercising reasonable care and skill to ascertain by an examination of the relevant legislation the manner in which that legislation may impact upon the transaction. The solicitor is obliged to advise his client of any risks or concerns which such legislation may give rise to. (Central Trust Company v. Rafuse et al., supra, at p. 212 per LeDain J.; Elcano Acceptance Ltd. et al. v. Richmond Richmond, Stambler & Mills (1989), 68 O.R. (2d) 165 (H.Ct.), at pp. 176-178 per O'Leary J.; supplementary reasons (1989), 68 O.R. (2d) 641; aff'd (1991) 3 O.R. (3d) 123 (CA), at p. 124.)

Where a solicitor holds himself out to his client as having particular expertise in a given area of law, such as in respect of sophisticated real estate transactions, a higher standard applies. The requisite standard is not that of a reasonably competent solicitor or ordinary prudent solicitor, but that of a reasonably competent expert in commercial real estate transactions. (Elcano Acceptance Ltd. et al. v. Richmond, Richmond, Stambler & Mills (1985), 31 C.C.L.T. 201 (Ont. H.Ct.) at 212-214 per Smith J.; rev'd on other grounds (1986), 55 O.R. (2d) 56 (C.A.).)

To the extent that there is any suggestion in this case that Little, in failing to advert to, research or advise of the potential effects of ss. 7(9) and 7(10) of the Condominium Act was simply acting in accordance with the then prevailing practice in London, Ontario in 1982, that practice was neither prudent, nor diligent, nor reasonable in the circumstances. As such, Little in following such a practice breached his obligations and duty of care to Confederation. (Dorion v. Roberge et al., [1991] 1 S.C.R. 374, at pp. 434-441 per L'Heureux-Dube J.; Glivar v. Noble et al. (1985), 8 O.A.C. 60 (C.A.), at p. 66 per Blair J.A.)

Goodman J. (as he then was) considered the duty to warn in Major v. Buchanan et al. (1975), 9 O.R. (2d) 491 at 514:

These two decisions, in my opinion, establish a principle mentioned only incidentally, if at all, in the other cases referred to me by counsel, namely, that a solicitor has the duty of warning a client of the risk involved in a course of action, contemplated by the client or by his solicitor on his behalf, and of exercising reasonable care and skill in advising him. If he fails to warn the client of the risk involved in the course of action and it appears probably that the client would not have taken the risk if he had been so warned, the solicitor will be liable. If he warns the client of the risk involved in the course of action, then he can only proceed to follow such course if the client instructs him so to do. If he fails to exercise reasonable care and skill in advising the client with respect to his risk and the client or solicitor on his behalf adopts a course of action which the client would probably not have taken or authorized if he had been properly advised, again, the solicitor will be liable if the client suffers a loss.

Absent the professional opinions, I would find Little liable for negligence and breach of contract. I am reinforced in this opinion by the experts called by Confederation which, I believe, accurately indicate the duty of care of a specialist. Mr. Cowan, in his opinion, merely referred to the conduct of a general practitioner in London. Little must be judged as a reasonably competent specialist. In my judgment he fell well below the line.

In addition, I believe cumulatively that Little breached his fiduciary duty to his client Confederation. He paid little heed to Rule 5 in Professional Conduct Handbook:

The lawyer must not advise or represent both sides of a dispute and, save after adequate disclosure to and with the consent of the client or prospective client concerned, should not act or continue to act in a matter when there is or there is likely to be a conflicting interest.

The problem started from day one. The failure to disclose ultimately blossomed into a direct conflict, previously recited, when Little did a redraft for Confederation of documents he had prepared for Khoury.

THE CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE DEFENCE

Little cannot shelter under the fact that Confederation had its own legal department. This issue was addressed in Central Trust, supra, at pp. 214-15. LeDain J. said:

The respondents contend that if they were negligent there was contributory negligence on the part of the Nova Scotia Trust Company or those for whom it was responsible and that accordingly there should be an apportionment of liability between the appellant and the respondents. This contention is based essentially on the fact that the mortgage loan to Stonehouse was recommended and approved by persons of legal training and experience, who knew that the proceeds of the loan were to be used to purchase the shares of the company. Mr. John Mroz, the mortgage manager of the Nova Scotia Trust Company, who recommended the loan to the Executive Committee of the Board of Directors of the trust company, and Mr. D.G. Grant, the President of the company and a member of the Executive Committee, were both graduates in law with some experience in practice before joining the company and members of the Bar of Nova Scotia. Mr. Lorne Clarke, Q.C., one of the members of the Truro Advisory Board which advised the trust company as to whether Stonehouse was a good risk, was an experienced practitioner. At least two members of the Executive Committee, besides Mr. Grant, who were present at the meeting which approved the loan, were lawyers. Mr. John A. Walker, Q.C., was a prominent and experienced member of the Nova Scotia Bar, although he was apparently retired from practice at the time the loan was approved. Although the testimony on this point was not too clear, the trial judge found that Mr. Mroz and Mr. Grant, and by implication the other members of the Executive Committee, must have known from the documentation that the proceeds of the mortgage loan were to be used to purchase the shares. In my opinion the defence of contributory negligence must fail. The executive officers of the Nova Scotia Trust Company and the members of the Executive Committee of the Board of Directors did not have a duty of care with respect to the legal aspects of a transaction other than to retain qualified solicitors to perform the necessary legal services. As the testimony of Mr. Mroz and Mr. Grant indicated, they were administrative officers who, despite their legal qualifications, were not expected to provide the company with legal advice.

Confederation relied on the expertise of Little and not their own solicitors.

In Riggins et al. v. Alberta (Workers' Compensation Board) (September 14, 1992, unreported, Alta. C.A.), Mr. Justice Major J.A. (as he then was) said at p. 3:

With respect to the appellants' second argument, the submission that the respondent was contributorily negligent in relying on the negligent advice of its solicitor is untenable. That the respondent had a staff of three lawyers is irrelevant; once they sought the opinion of outside counsel they were entitled to rely on the advice given. A lawyer who provides negligent advice does so at his peril, not at the client's. I see no reason to make any exceptions to the general rule in this case where employees of the clients themselves are lawyers. Much significance was attached to internal respondent memoranda regarding the quantum of damage after the fact that the respondent, as any client, was entitled to an informed opinion from its lawyer and never received one. The respondent's internal memoranda in this instance are not relevant.

There is no evidence that anyone with legal training other than the defendants gave Confederation legal advice on the transaction until a year after the event when the damage was done.

I see no merit in the contributory negligence defence.

THE CAUSATION DEFENCE Mr. McNeil contends that Confederation's losses do not flow from Little's conduct. It is, he says, the product of deliberate steps by Confederation to resolve problems with its borrower. Mr. Morphy's position is that the whole mess is attributable to Little.

Put simply, the defence' position is that Confederation committed a fatal error in effecting a settlement of its litigation with Khoury. Shepherd, McKenzie argues that Confederation had a very strong case against Khoury and had McNeil says that this Court must resolve those disputed facts which remained in the Griffiths' motion. Until the Court finds that Khoury could have got out of the mortgage, he says no liability can flow to Little.

I conclude that:

- (1) it was the condominium clause that gave Khoury his leverage to pressure Confederation;
- (2) Confederation consulted Little about the condominium clause before approving the commitment letter;
- (3) Little approved the condominium clause in principle and in form;
- (4) Little drafted clause 28A of the mortgage, the clause his own expert Cowan said was not a very good clause;
- (5) if Confederation had received the advice it was entitled to, there would have been no condominium clause, or at the least a proviso of the type referred to by Feinstein;
- (6) Confederation relied on Little's advice to their detriment.

Little's advice should have been that the clause could not be put in with any assurance of maintaining the 20 year term so do not accede to it. If there had been no condominium clause there would have been no motion before Griffiths J. and no factual issue to be decided. Indeed, the factual issue only arises as part of a salvage operation to rescue Confederation from the position they were put in by Little and to avoid redemption. Confederation was involved in the multiplicity of legal proceedings because Little's advice put them there. They then had to consider their options. They were entitled to act reasonably and prudently and conclude that settlement of all the litigation was in their best interest. They had no obligation to see their dispute with Khoury to a judicial disposition before pursuing their solicitors.

I adopt the words of Anderson J. in Karpenko v. Paroian, Courey, Cohen & Houston (1980), 30 O.R. (2d) 776 at 790 In my view, an important element of public policy is involved. It is in the interests of public policy to discourage suits and encourage settlements. The vast majority of suits are settled. It is the almost universal practice among responsible members of the legal profession to pursue settlement until some circumstance or combination of circumstances leads them to conclude that a particular dispute can only be resolved by a trial. I say nothing of the suits which are settled by reason of sloth, or inexperience, or lack of stomach for the fight. They have nothing to do with this case. What is relevant and material to the public interest is that an industrious and competent practitioner should not be unduly inhibited in making a decision to settle a case by the apprehension that some Judge, viewing the matter subsequently, with all the acuity of vision given by hindsight, and from the calm security of the Bench, may tell him he should have done otherwise. To the decision to settle a lawyer brings all his talents and experience both recollected and existing somewhere below the level of the conscious mind, all his knowledge of the law and its processes. Not least he brings to it his hard-earned knowledge that the trial of a lawsuit is costly, time-consuming and taxing for everyone involved and attended by a host of contingencies, foreseen and unforeseen. Upon all of this he must decide whether he should take what is available by way of settlement, or press on. I can think of few areas where the difficult question of what constitutes negligence, which gives rise to liability, and what constitutes at worst an error in judgment, which does not, is harder to answer. In my view it would be only in the case of some egregious error, to use the phrase adopted by my brother Krever in Demarco that negligence would be found.

In my judgment, the settlement made by Confederation with Khoury was a reasonable one. Confederation had the benefit not only of input from their in-house solicitor but that of Fraser & Beatty as well. I accept the evidence of Mr. Arthurs who itemized all the factors he took into account in considering settlement.

According to Robert Martin, an accounting expert called by Shepherd, McKenzie, if Confederation had proceeded to trial and lost, their damages would have been $3,936,581 as of January 1, 1987, over a million more than the loss figure in April, 1985.

The estoppel argument was complex and risky to Confederation and was taken into account by them in making the settlement.

I therefore reject the argument that there is no causal connection between the damages suffered by Confederation and the negligence and breach of contract and breach of fiduciary duty of its solicitors. The causation defence fails. Another ground of defence was that the project was never viable given a 20 year mortgage at 18.25% interest.

Allan Grossman is a chartered accountant and a senior partner with Orenstein & Co. with considerable experience in tax driven real estate syndication. It was his opinion that the project was viable and could result in a full payout to Confederation at 18.25% interest if syndicated on a MURB basis on his model.

Mr. Grossman said that in his opinion, Skyview Towers could have been structured properly and sold successfully in 1984 as a MURB investment vehicle on a basis which would have ensured that Confederation would have been paid in full its entitlement under its mortgage. The model utilized by Mr. Grossman contemplates a sale of Skyview Towers within 10 years and which contemplates the discharge of Confederation's mortgage at the time of sale, with full payment to penalty. Mr. Grossman testified that in his opinion, this was an attractive property for syndication and that the syndication could have been structured in such a way that:

- (a) investors would only have been required to pay a minimal deposit of approximately $1,000;
- (b) the cash flow requirements of the project could have been satisfied fully by the reinvestment into the project by investors of their tax savings pertaining to the project. For this reason, the negative cash flow from the operations of Skyview Towers commented upon both by Mr. Hughes and by Mr. Martin would not have impaired in any way the successful syndication of Skyview Towers; and
- (c) depending upon the extent to which the Skyview Towers project appreciated in value over time, investors could achieve after tax returns of between $83,000 and $173,000 per unit upon the sale of the project (after 10 years). The syndicators and promoters could earn approximately $4.7 million for their services in syndicating the project. Khoury, as promoter, would have earned approximately $1,645,000 had he utilized a model similar to that employed by Mr. Grossman.

Mr. Grossman testified that if his model had been used in a syndication of Skyview Towers and the property had been sold in 1988 at a price of $17,750,000 (as occurred in June, 1988 when Berrier Hill Investments Ltd. acquired the property), there would have been sufficient proceeds of disposition to pay to Confederation the entire amount of its applicable mortgage discharge penalty while leaving a profit to the investors of $2,068,000.

It was clear to Confederation, from the outset of its dealings with Khoury, that Khoury intended to syndicate the Skyview Towers project as a MURB. Khoury took that position repeatedly during the course of his dealings with Confederation and argued, among other things, that Confederation's failure to consent unconditionally to the registration of the project as a condominium on a timely basis had rendered him unable to proceed with the MURB syndication.

The position taken at trial by the defendants concerning the viability of the Skyview Towers project depends upon, among other things, cogent evidence as to the personal circumstances, financial position and intentions of Khoury in 1984, 1985 and subsequent years. Khoury, however, was not called as a witness at trial. Nor was any attempt made to obtain his evidence at trial, either on a commission basis or pursuant to letters of request.

Mr. Grossman, in arriving at his conclusion, relied in part upon Skyview Towers having an appraised value as at September, 1984 of $9,250,000. This was the type of appraisal which Mr. Grossman would have relied upon at the time in a syndication of Skyview Towers.

Confederation called as its second witness on the issue of damages L. John Simmons, the president and chief executive officer of The L.J. Simmons Group Ltd. in London, Ontario.

Mr. Simmons is an accredited member of the Appraisal Institute of Canada, a Fellow of the Real Estate Institute of Canada and a Charter Member of the Association of Ontario Land Economists. He has lectured on real estate appraisal courses at the University of Western Ontario on behalf of the Appraisal Institute of Canada. Mr. Simmons is the past chairman and director of the London and District Chapter of the Real Estate Institute of Canada and the past chairman of the London Chapter of the Appraisal Institute of Canada. He has, for many years, acted as an appraiser and consultant for a broad variety of clients, including banks and other financial institutions. He is experienced in preparing valuation estimates in respect of the purchase and sale of property, as well as in mortgage financing transactions.

Mr. Simmons was retained to prepare an appraisal estimating the market value of Skyview Towers as at September 1, 1984. In arriving at his conclusions, Mr. Simmons utilized a cost approach, an income approach and a comparative approach to valuation. He considered, in particular, the peculiar circumstances of the Skyview Towers project as at September 1, 1984, including the mortgage of Confederation. He considered the area and neighbourhood in which Skyview Towers is located and the nature of the real estate market in London in 1984. He considered the amenities at the site, as well as its construction and mix of suites. Mr. Simmons considered rental rates and vacancy rates, as well as the revenues and operating expenses of Skyview Towers. Mr. Simmons compared Skyview Towers with four other mid-rise elevated apartment buildings in London constructed after 1979, three of which had MURB status. He concluded that the market value of Skyview Towers, as at September 1, 1984, with Confederation's mortgage in place, was $9,250,000. The defence's experts delivered reports in which they purported to express opinions which were beyond their area of expertise. The first witness, Robert Hughes, is a real estate appraiser and valuator from London, Ontario. He did not prepare a market value appraisal of the Skyview Towers property. Rather, he examined "price trends" in respect of nine properties in London which he regarded as similar to Skyview Towers. On the basis of his review, Mr. Hughes concluded that Skyview Towers became less attractive to investors over time because of the high interest rate mortgage of Confederation. He also concluded that if Skyview Towers had been operated as an apartment complex, it would have had a cash flow deficiency. Mr. Hughes recognized, however, that the true value of Skyview Towers was not as an apartment complex but as a MURB.

Mr. Hughes conceded in cross-examination that when using a comparable approach to valuation based on the sales of comparable properties, one must consider sales made under normal arm length circumstances. To the extent that sales are made in distress, appropriate adjustments must be made. He admitted, however, that even though a number of the properties he relied upon in conducting his analysis were sold in distress, either by a court appointed receiver or in power of sale proceedings, he made no such adjustments. He used incomplete information in respect of some of the properties he relied upon in completing his analysis. He relied upon the Egerton appraisal of November, 1984 pertaining to Skyview Towers, even though he conceded that it was at best incomplete. He did not consider the fact that Skyview Towers was sold in 1985 for $14 million and in 1988 for $17,750,000. He did not consider that in December, 1989, 145 condominium units in Skyview Towers were sold at an average purchase price of $64,180 per unit. Had all of the units in Skyview Towers been sold at such a price, the purchase price pertaining to the entire project would have exceeded $22.8 million.

Mr. Hughes said that he was prohibited by his rules of professional ethics from considering the 1988 sale of Skyview Towers because he could not verify the sale price. He testified that he could not properly consider the 1989 sales of individual condominium units because those sales all occurred on a single day. Mr. Harry Sweeney was called in reply by Confederation. He was an executive associated with Berrier Hill Investments Ltd. in 1988. He confirmed that Berrier Hill purchased the Skyview Towers project in June, 1988 on an arm's length basis for a purchase price of $17,750,000 and that 145 condominium units were sold on December 29, 1989 at an average purchase price of $64,180.58. Mr. Sweeney explained that this price pertained only to the real estate portion of the sales transactions and that the purchasers actually acquired, in addition, a services package which increased the purchase price of these units by approximately 25%. He also testified that although the date of these sales was stated to be December 29, 1989 in the documents registered in relation to the sales, this date was selected for tax purposes. All of the units were, in fact, sold over a period of 5 to 6 months preceding December 29, 1989.

The last expert witness called by the defendants on the issue of damages was Mr. Martin, a principal in the business investment group of Coopers & Lybrand Limited. Mr. Martin, however, was not permitted to express an opinion concerning either the value of the Skyview Towers project or the viability of this project as a MURB syndication. Nor was he permitted to express an opinion as to the options which might have been open to Confederation in its litigation with Khoury had he not had the condominium conversion argument available to him.

In light of the opinions of Simmons and Grossman, and the large sale price of the premises in 1985 and 1989, I conclude that the project was viable as a MURB. I preferred the opinion of Confederation's experts because of their experience and objectivity. Mr. Hughes failed to discount distress sales. He did not therefore select appropriate comparables.

Mr. McNeil raised the issue of subrogation for the first time in argument. It was neither pleaded, nor was there any evidentiary foundation to argue it. No questions were ever put in cross-examination to any witness to suggest that it was an issue. I, therefore, reject the defence that his client has been denied rights of subrogation.

DAMAGES

Counsel agreed that the loss to Confederation as at the March, 1985 settlement with Khoury was $2,458,880, represented by the shortfall in reinvesting the fund at 13%, rather than 18.25%, over the balance of the term from April 12, 1985.

There also appeared to be no substantial issue with the expenses incurred by Confederation to conduct its litigation with Khoury in the sum of $211,175. I, therefore, assess the damages at $2,669,615 as of April 12, 1985.

PREJUDGMENT INTEREST

Confederation seeks prejudgment interest from April 12, 1985 at a rate of 13% compounded semi-annually. The defence contend that simple interest at 11% is appropriate. The difference between their positions amounts to approximately $2 million.

Confederation puts its argument on two grounds:

(1) exercise of the Court's equitable jurisdiction;

(2) the Court's discretion under s. 130(1) of the Courts of Justice Act. In Brock v. Cole et al. (1983), 40 O.R. (2d) 97, Thorson J.A., delivering the judgment of the Court, concluded that courts of equity had jurisdiction to award compound interest. At pp. 99-100, the Court said:

In awarding judgment to the plaintiff the trial judge found that the defendants were clearly in breach of their contract to deliver a first mortgage on the terms described and which they had been retained to provide. With respect, on the facts as found by the trial judge, I think that the defendants' action went well beyond a mere breach of contract. This was a case of money advanced to the defendants as solicitors in trust, to be invested by them for the plaintiff on certain specified terms. The defendants by their conduct in dealing with the money quite obviously breached that trust. Moreover, there could be no justification of the defendants' subsequent neglect or failure to make any accounting of the money which had been entrusted to them until compelled to do so by the judgment in favour of the plaintiff obtained seven years after the making of the advance. And at pp. 102-103:

Counsel for the appellant notes in his statement of fact and law that the trial judge, at the time when the clarification of his judgment respecting interest was being sought, did not have the benefit of the decision of this court in Wotherspoon et al. v. Canadian Pacific Ltd. et al. (1982), 35 O.R. (2d) 449, 129 D.L.R. (3d) 1 [leave to appeal to S.C.C. granted 37 O.R. (2d) 73n, 44 N.R. 83n] and counsel was candid to state that neither did the trial judge have a review of the authorities dealing with the awarding of compound interest as damages in cases involving moneys received by trustees for investment purposes or moneys wrongfully detained. Whether this case is viewed as falling within one or the other of the classes of cases considered by Hughes J. in his judgment at trial in the Wotherspoon case (cited as 22 O.R. (2d) 385, 92 D.L.R. (3d) 545) at pp. 579-82 O.R., namely those cases where the defendant was a trustee who ought to have invested moneys entrusted into his hands and thereby earned compound interest, and those cases where compound interest was awarded by courts of equity as damages by reason of a "wrongful detention of money which ought to have been paid", the case at bar, in my opinion, is one in which it is clear that an award of compound interest may properly be considered.

As for the authorities cited to this Court in the present appeal, I find in point the decision of the English Court of Appeal (alluded to in the reasons of this court in the Wotherspoon case at p. 495) in Wallersteiner v. Moir (No. 2), [1975] Q.B. 373 and 508n, [1975] 1 All E.R. 849, wherein Lord Denning M.R. at p. 856 All E.R. set forth his understanding of the principles involved in the following terms:

... in equity interest is awarded whenever a wrongdoer deprives a company of money which it needs for use in its business. It is plain that the company should be compensated for the loss thereby occasioned to it. Mere replacement of the money - years later - is by no means adequate compensation, especially in days of inflation. The company should be compensated by the award of interest. ... But the question arises; should it be simple interest or compound interest? On general principles I think it should be presumed that the company (had it not been deprived of the money) would have made the most beneficial use open to it. ... Alternatively, it should be presumed that the wrongdoer made the most beneficial use of it. But, whichever it is, in order to give adequate compensation, the money should be replaced at interest with yearly rests, i.e. compound interest.

The court again in Claiborne Industries Ltd. v. National Bank of Canada (1989), 69 O.R. (2d) 65, following Brock v. Cole, supra, reaffirmed the jurisdiction to award compound interest where stolen funds were involved. On those claims not arising out of stolen funds, simple interest was awarded.

The Court is asked to award compound interest because of the breach of fiduciary duty.

This Court has also discretion to award compound interest pursuant to s. 130(1) of the Courts of Justice Act in cases where that is necessary to compensate the plaintiff for its actual loss. (See Niagara Air Bus Inc. v. Camerman (1991), 3 O.R. (3d) 108 (C.A.).)

Compound interest at 13% compounded half-yearly on $2,669,615 amounts to $4,244,951 for the period April 12, 1985 to November 1, 1992. The per diem rate after November 1 is $950.82 per day.

Section 140 of the Courts of Justice Act, amended January 1, 1985, gives the court broad discretion to award compound interest. The evidence of Mr. Coates and Mr. Boddy was that it was the practice of Confederation to reinvest funds on a compound basis. The evidence indicates that they did invest the settlement funds at 13% on a compound basis.

The only practical way to make Confederation whole is to exercise my discretion in favour of allowing compound interest at 13% compounded half-yearly. This is not done because Confederation is a professional lender. It is not awarded as damages or as a penalty against the solicitors. It is solely the exercise of a discretion to make the plaintiff whole.

Confederation will, therefore, have judgment against the defendants for $2,669,615, plus $4,244,951, plus $950.82 per day from November 1, 1992.

Costs to be spoken to.

1. INTRODUCTION

These proceedings have their origin in a dispute between members of the board of directors of Carleton Condominium Corporation No. 347 (the condominium corporation) for control of the management of the condominium corporation.

Later in these reasons, I will detail the factual basis of the dispute but for the present it is desirable to remark on some preliminary procedural matters.

In Application 52779/91, the condominium corporation, as applicant, seeks, inter alia, a declaration that the respondents in that application are not entitled to vote at a meeting of the owners of the condominium corporation originally scheduled for June 21, 1991, but now scheduled for July 25, 1991.

In Application 52739/91, the condominium corporation, as applicant, seeks, inter alia, against the Royal Bank of Canada, and the Royal Bank Mortgage Corporation, a full and complete accounting of all of the applicants' accounts and investments held by them, and an order directing them to recognize Gayle Duggan and Michael Chatzipantazis as the proper signing officers of the condominium corporation for the purposes of all transactions between the condominium corporation and the bank and mortgage corporation.

In Application 53028/91, Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd., as applicant, seeks, against the condominium corporation and the other respondents named in the application the following relief among others:

(a) an order directing the Defendants Gayle Duggan, Taxiarchis Chatzipantazis, Ashwin Shingadia and Carleton Condominium Corporation No. 347 to properly perform duties imposed by them under the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 84 as amended, and by the Declaration and By-Laws of Carleton Condominium Corporation No. 347, to wit issue proper Notices of Directors' Meetings to all 5 Directors of Carleton Condominium Corporation No. 347 within a timely fashion and directing them to include in such Notice the matters to be dealt with at such Meetings of Directors and to conduct such meetings properly and in accordance with law;

(b) a Declaration declaring the Meetings of Directors of Carleton Condominium Corporation No. 347 held on or about April 8, 1991, May 9, 1991, June 6, 1991 and June 30, 1991 are null and void and that decisions made and resolutions passed thereat including the purported resolution re banking authorities dated June 13, 1991 signed by Gayle Duggan, Taxiarchis Chatzipantazis and Ashwin Shingadia are null and void;

(c) an injunction enjoining the law firm of Nelligan/Power, their partners, associates, employees and others affiliated therewith from acting for the other Respondents and any of them in respect of matters dealing with the affairs of the Respondent, Carleton Condominium Corporation No. 347, or relating directly or indirectly with the Special Owners' Meeting to be held June 21, 1991;

(d) a declaration declaring the law firm of Nelligan/Power was not properly retained by Carleton Condominium No. 347 to assist in soliciting or receiving proxies for the Special Owners' Meeting to be held June 21, 1991;

(e) a declaration declaring Gayle Duggan, Taxiarchis Chatzipantazis and Ashwin Shingadia improperly tried to take control of certain assets of Carleton Condominium Corporation No. 347;

(f) a declaration that the said law firm of Nelligan/Power knew or ought to have known of the impropriety of the actions of the said Gayle Duggan, Taxiarchis Chatzipantazis and Ashwin Shingadia and that they were a nullity;

(g) an injunction enjoining the Respondents from using directly or indirectly and voting at the Special Owners' Meeting of June 21, 1991 and adjournments thereof any proxies on the forms attached as Exhibit No. 19 to the Affidavit of Thomas Gregory Assaly filed in this action and a declaration declaring the same null and void.

Because the condominium corporation was represented by counsel from the firm of Nelligan/Power who were solicitors of record and because the retainer of that firm had been challenged in Application 53028/91 and an injunction sought restraining them from acting on behalf of the condominium corporation, I invited argument from counsel on this aspect of Application 53028/91 first.

The contention of Mr. Habib, counsel for the applicant, Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd., in support of this aspect of the application may be shortly stated as follows: Nelligan/Power are solicitors for the condominium corporation and they are also solicitors for three members of the board of directors with whom his clients are in dispute. The interests of these directors, even though they are a majority, are not necessarily the same as those of the condominium corporation. Therefore those directors have a conflict of interest with the corporation. Since Nelligan/Power had been retained by those directors to represent the condominium corporation, they too have a conflict of interest and cannot represent both the condominium corporation and the directors. Mr. Habib relied on Chapter 5 of the Code of Professional Conduct, published by the Canadian Bar Association, and on Rule 5 of the Rules of Professional Conduct, published by the Law Society of Upper Canada. He also relied on MTS International Services Inc. v. Warnat Corporation (1980), 31 O.R. (2d) 221, 118 D.L.R. (3d) 561 (H.C.J.), and Lukic v. Urquhart (1984), 47 O.R. (2d) 463, 11 D.L.R. (4th) 638 (H.C.J.) [varied (1985), 50 O.R. (2d) 47, 15 D.L.R. (4th) 639 (C.A.)]. He contended further that Nelligan/Power had been improperly retained because the board of directors had not passed a proper resolution authorizing the bringing of the application.

Mr. Davidson, for the condominium corporation, indicated that the firm of Nelligan/Power had been solicitors to the corporation for many years and had routinely, on instructions from the board, represented the corporation in contentious proceedings. In this case, he said, a majority of the board had authorized his firm to represent the condominium corporation in the proceedings now pending before me. He contended further that there was no conflict between the condominium corporation and the three directors from whom his firm had received instructions. Those directors, he said, were in the courtroom and could testify, if required.

In the event, I did not require the directors to testify because it seemed to me that the issue of conflict of interest had been misconceived. Firstly, there is nothing in the Code of Professional Conduct or in the Rules of Professional Conduct, already mentioned, which governs this case. There is no allegation that the firm of Nelligan/Power had advised all the directors and were now acting for some against others. This is simply a case where two of five directors, having been thwarted by the majority, had embarked on a course of conduct to remove the majority. The majority, acting according to their best judgment, had instructed the corporation's solicitors to initiate legal proceedings in the name of the corporation against the respondents in Application 52779/91. In my view, the majority of directors acted quite properly in doing so. Article 7 of By-Law No. 1 of the condominium corporation provides that a quorum of three directors may exercise all the powers of the Board so long as a quorum remains in office. Section 15(1) of the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 84 (the Act) provides that the affairs of the corporation shall be managed by the board of directors. I therefore see nothing nefarious or contrary to the interest of the corporation if the majority of directors, in the exercise of their best judgment, determined to instruct the corporation's solicitors to initiate legal proceedings against persons whose conduct appeared to them to be inimical to the interest of the corporation. Since the principles in the cases cited have no application to the facts of this case, I concluded that there was no valid reason to prevent Messrs. Nelligan/Power from continuing to act and I ruled accordingly, dismissing this aspect of Application 53028/91.

As I have already said, Application 52739/91, seeks, inter alia, a mandatory order compelling the Royal Bank of Canada and the Royal Bank Mortgage Corporation to honour the signatures of two of the majority directors as the proper signing officers on behalf of the condominium corporation in respect of banking and related documents. Since, up to the date of notification of the change in signing officers, the signing officers had been the proper officers of the management company, Asgo Management Ltd., I directed that the management company be made a party respondent to this application and be served with the notice of application and supporting materials.

All applications were then adjourned to July 8, 1991, on terms which are endorsed on the back of Application Record 52739/91.

On July 8, I made an order consolidating the three applications and heard them together. At the conclusion of argument, I reserved judgment, stating that I would deliver judgment and reasons on July 19, 1991. My reasons follow.

2. THE FACTS

The applicant condominium corporation was incorporated pursuant to the provisions of the Act by registration of a declaration and description on August 29, 1986, by the respondent Trendsetter Developments Ltd., as declarant. The property comprised in the condominium corporation and subject to the Act, is a high-rise building containing 219 residential units and 7 commercial units, known as Kent Towers in the City of Ottawa.

By articles of amalgamation issued on September 1, 1988, pursuant to the Business Corporations Act, 1982, S.O. 1982, c. 4, as amended, Trendsetter Developments Ltd. was amalgamated with Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. and continued under the name Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd.

Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. is the owner of two residential and seven commercial units in the condominium corporation. It is also the registered owner of more than 15 per cent of the junior mortgages of all units in the building. Thomas C. Assaly is president of Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. and is the owner of 53 residential units in the building. The first mortgage on all units in the building is held by the Royal Trust Company.

The members of the board of directors of the condominium corporation are: Gayle Duggan, T. (Mike) Chatzipantazis, Thomas G. Assaly, Ashwin Shingadia and Gillian Brown. They are also owners of units in the building. Thomas G. Assaly is the son of Thomas C. Assaly and an employee of the Assaly Group of Companies which include Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. and Asgo Management Ltd.

Asgo Management Limited is the manager of the property and assets of the condominium corporation under an agreement dated October 14, 1986. This agreement is for a term of five years from its effective date and will expire on or about October 14, 1991. Paragraph 19 of the agreement provides for earlier termination of the agreement, but there is no evidence that it has been invoked.

Pursuant to Article 4.1 of By-Law No. 1 of the condominium corporation, the management agreement was approved by By-Law No. 3, dated October 1, 1986, the agreement being for a period of more than one year. It should be noted that the approval of the unit holders was signified by the signature of Trendsetter Developments Ltd. which, at the time, was the owner of 100 per cent of all the units. The turnover meeting was not held until January 14, 1987.

In para. 5 of her affidavit sworn on June 19, 1991, Gayle Duggan deposed that Asgo Management Ltd. is an affiliate of Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. and in para. 3 thereof she deposed that the respondent Thomas C. Assaly controls directly or indirectly Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. and its affiliates. This evidence was not contradicted.

Thomas G. Assaly deposed in para. 13 of his affidavit, sworn on June 20, 1991, that on or about November 20, 1990, the board of directors of the condominium corporation created a sub-committee consisting of Gayle Duggan, Ashwin Shingadia and Gillian

Brown to solicit proposals for the future management of the condominium corporation and to make recommendations to the board in respect thereof.

The minutes of the meeting of the board, held on March 27, 1991, Exhibit 4 to the affidavit of Thomas G. Assaly, record that on that date Gillian Brown made a proposal concerning the appointment of a manager of the condominium corporation and the appointment of a board member with responsibility for supervising the manager. These minutes also record that the next meeting would be held on April 25, 1991 and would be limited to a discussion of property management.

The agenda for the meeting of April 25, 1991 was filed as part of Exhibit 4 and it shows clearly that the last two agenda items concerned the presentation of management proposals and discussion of and agreement upon a property manager.

Meetings of the board were held on April 30, May 7 and May 9, 1991. From the materials filed, it appears that a majority of the board, consisting of Duggan, Chatzipantazis and Shingadia were of the view that the management contract of Asgo Management Ltd. should not be renewed on its expiry. Assaly and Brown were of the contrary view. Brown submitted a report of her own in which she proposed herself as managing director at an annual salary of $25,000. Under this proposal, Brown would manage the manager. Not unnaturally, there arose from this disagreement allegations by the majority of conflict of interest against Assaly and Brown and counter-allegations by the minority of mismanagement and neglect of duty against the majority.

On June 3, 1991, the investor relations administration of Asgo Management Ltd. sent to all directors a notice of meetings to be held on June 6 and June 13, 1991, respectively together with agendas for both meetings and other material (Exhibit 10, affidavit of Thomas G. Assaly). Included in this material was a report of the sub-committee on management contracts submitted by Chatzipantazis and Shingadia. The report stated that eight proposals had been received, explained why five were not acceptable and recommended three for consideration by the board. Asgo Management Ltd. was not among the three. The report recommended that the three be allowed to make presentations to the board on June 6, each of one hour's duration. Gillian Brown was also scheduled to make a one-hour presentation to the board.

The minutes of the meeting of June 6, 1991 (Exhibit 18 to the affidavit of Thomas G. Assaly) record that four presentations were made as recommended in the report. The minutes continue as follows:

There was a great deal of discussion on the presentations and the merits and demerits of the various proposals submitted.

There was also discussion on the question of Board of Directors and conflict of interest as identified for T.G. Assaly Jr. and with respect to G. Brown's proposals and its close ties with Asgo. The attached legal opinion (not attached) was tabled and the two directors walked out. With a quorum present, the Board continued its deliberations and unanimously decided to award the contract to DEL and authorized the President to ascertain that a full-time on-site property manager for Kent Towers was agreed to, prior to signing the final contract. It was unanimously agreed that the President, G. Duggan, and the Treasurer, Mike Pantazzi (sic.) be given the authority to sign the contract with DEL.

The next meeting was fixed for June 13, 1991.

On June 7, 1991, Brown and Assaly wrote to the other directors (Exhibit 14 to the affidavit of Thomas G. Assaly) notifying them that the meeting of June 6 had been conducted contrary to law and that all business conducted thereat was null and void. They accused those directors of ejecting them from the meeting.

The letter indicates that, if necessary, Brown and Assaly would bring applications to the court to have the meeting and decisions made thereat declared null and void or quashed, and it concludes as follows: Further, please be advised that we have been notified by Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd., a mortgagee who holds mortgages on more than 15% of the units that it is today calling a Special Meeting of Owners pursuant to Section 18(2) of the Condominium Act, to remove you from the Board of Directors of Carleton Condominium Corporation No. 347, and to elect replacement members. The Corporation will not recognize any contracts entered into by you with respect of the management of the property and will look to you personally to indemnify the Corporation for any and all costs and damages which it may incur or suffer. Further, in light of the Special Owners' Meeting called by the Mortgagee to remove you, you are formally put on notice that any actions by you will not be recognized by the Corporation.

I digress here to observe that this letter, following hard on the heels of the meeting of June 6 and the allegations of conflict made therein, affords support, in my opinion, for the conclusion that Brown and Assaly were, to say the least, not impartial to the interests of Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. and its affiliates, including Asgo Management Ltd.

By letter dated June 7, 1991, Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. wrote to unit owners of the condominium corporation enclosing a notice of special meeting of the owners to remove "certain persons from the board" of the condominium corporation (see Exhibit 16 to the affidavit of Thomas G. Assaly).

The letter stated that it was in the best interests of the condominium corporation that Asgo Management Ltd. be continued as manager and gave reasons for that conclusion. It noted that some members of the board were of the same view and that others were not. It alleged that those directors who did not had ejected from the meeting of June 6 those who did. Hence, the necessity to remove directors named in the notice (Duggan, Chatzipantazis and Shingadia). Their actions, the letter noted, could not be condoned.

The notice itself is dated June 7, 1991. It stated that the meeting was scheduled for June 21, 1991. It contained two agenda items, viz.: removal of the three named directors and the election of their replacement to the board.

The notice contains the following statement: This meeting is being called by Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd., a mortgagee holding mortgages on not less than 15% of the units in Carleton Condominium No. 347, pursuant to section 18(2) of the Condominium Act.

In her affidavit sworn on June 17, 1991, Gayle Duggan deposed that following the action taken by Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd., she and the other two directors decided to assume control of the finances of the condominium corporation. To achieve that objective they instructed the solicitors of the condominium corporation to write to its banker, the Royal Bank of Canada, notifying the bank of the dispute with Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. and Asgo Management Ltd. and requesting that no withdrawals from named accounts of the condominium corporation should be permitted without the express written authority of herself and Chatzipantazis. The letter indicated that a confirmatory resolution of the board would follow in "the next couple of days". The letter also instructed that its contents should be kept "strictly confidential" and not be discussed with "representatives of Assaly or Asgo Management". A copy of this letter dated June 11, 1991 was filed as Exhibit D to Duggan's affidavit. On June 13, 1991, the three directors (Duggan, Chatzipantazis and Shingadia), being a quorum of the board, passed a resolution pursuant to Article 10.01 of By-Law No. 1 of the condominium corporation designating Duggan and Chatzipantazis as officers of the corporation having exclusive authority to transact all banking business of the condominium corporation. The resolution is signed by the three directors and was sent to the bank by the solicitors of the condominium corporation together with a covering letter dated June 14, 1991. A copy of the letter and of the resolution were filed as Exhibit E to Duggan's affidavit.

On the same date, June 13, 1991, the same three directors, being the president, treasurer and secretary of the condominium corporation, respectively, wrote to unit owners advising them of the dispute, noting that Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. had convened the meeting for June 21, 1991 and soliciting proxies for the meeting.

The Royal Bank of Canada refused to honour the resolution and froze the accounts. The condominium corporation thereupon launched Application 52739/91 seeking a full and complete accounting of all the accounts and investments of the condominium corporation and an order directing the bank to recognize the officers named in the resolution dated June 13, 1991, as the exclusive officers having authority to transact banking business on its behalf and Application 52779/91 seeking a declaration that the respondents named therein are not entitled to vote at the meeting scheduled for June 21, 1991. For its part Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. launched Application 53028/91 seeking the relief I have already mentioned.

3. ISSUES

(a) Application 52739/91

In this application, as I have already noted, the condominium corporation seeks two remedies: first, a full and complete accounting of its monies and investments; secondly, an order compelling recognition of the resolution of the board dated June 13, 1991, the new banking resolution.

The materials filed did not include facts which suggested that an accounting was warranted and no argument was addressed by any one as to the desirability of or necessity for an accounting in the circumstances of this case. Accordingly, I make no order in this respect.

The request for the second remedy was vigorously contested by both sides of the dispute. I will deal with their contentions shortly. However, before doing so, I should advert briefly to the facts giving rise to the dispute and to the position taken by counsel for the bank.

Under the management agreement made between the condominium corporation and Asgo Management Ltd. in October 1986, Asgo Management Ltd. was appointed manager of the property of the condominium corporation for a period of five (5) years and its duties as such manager were prescribed in para. 5 thereof. Those duties included the collection of monies owing to the condominium corporation and depositing the same in trust. As a consequence, the banking function of the condominium corporation was performed by Asgo Management Ltd. And it was with Asgo Management Ltd. that the bank dealt until it received notice of the dispute between the directors and the banking resolution of June 13, 1991.

By its terms that resolution does not expressly revoke the authority of Asgo Management Ltd. to continue performing the banking function. But it does so by clear implication, since the authority to perform that function is given exclusively to the two officers named therein. As a result, the bank took the position, not unreasonably, that it would freeze the accounts of the condominium corporation until the situation clarified.

In argument, Mr. O'Toole for the bank, took the position that the bank was quite prepared to honour the resolution of June 13, 1991, but wished to have the question of banking authority regularized. First, he said, the resolution does not expressly revoke the authority of Asgo Management Ltd. Secondly, he said, the accounts are in the name of Asgo Management Ltd. as trustee, and there was an issue as to whether the trustee's authority could be revoked without its consent. In this case such consent had not been filed with the bank. He asked that there be an order discharging the old relationship between the bank and Asgo Management Ltd. establishing a new relationship between the condominium corporation and the bank, based on the new resolution and that the trustee be notified that the order has been made.

The position taken by Mr. Davidson for the condominium corporation may be summarized as follows: the banking resolution passed by three of five directors on June 13, 1991, is valid, notwithstanding that notice of the meeting containing the banking resolution as a specific agenda item was not given to all directors. The failure to include this item in the notice of meeting is a direct consequence of the dispute between the directors and, at most, amounts to a procedural irregularity which should not be held to invalidate the resolution, given the circumstances of the case.

Mr. McKinnon for Asgo Management Ltd. contended that the letter from Nelligan/Power to the bank was ill-conceived and so was the resolution. By para. 2 of the management agreement, so the argument ran, sole and exclusive management of the condominium corporation was vested in Asgo Management Ltd. This included the banking function which is specifically provided for in para. 5(e) of the agreement. The agreement itself was confirmed by By-Law No. 3 of the condominium corporation which was approved by the unit owners. The resolution, he said, was an improper attempt to revoke By-Law No. 3.

With respect to the conduct of the meeting on June 6, 1991, Mr. McKinnon contended that the majority directors were quite wrong in alleging conflict of interest against Brown and Assaly. Section 17 of the Act defined conflict of interest as it relates to the conduct of the business of a condominium corporation and was exhaustive. The conduct of Brown and Assaly did not come within the definition of conflict in s. 17. Accordingly, all actions taken by the majority directors based on alleged conflict was misconceived and improper. Consequently, the failure to give notice that the banking resolution would be discussed at the meeting of directors on June 13, 1991, was more than a procedural irregularity and was fatal to the validity of the resolution.

Mr. Leal, who appeared with Mr. McKinnon, added submissions concerning the scope of the rule in Saunders v. Vautier (1841), 4 Beav. 115, 49 E.R. 282 (S.C.) [aff'd [1835-42] All E.R. Rep. 58, 41 E.R. 482 (L.C.)], and its application, but since I have concluded that reliance upon that rule was not necessary in this case, I do not reproduce those submissions. Mr. Leal also drew attention to s. 39 of the Act which provides a modality for termination of a management agreement.

On the basis of the materials filed and the submissions made, I have reached the conclusion that the banking resolution of June 13, 1991 was validly passed.

In my respectful view, it is clear from all the materials filed that Assaly and Brown were determined that the management agreement with Asgo Management Ltd. should be renewed on its expiry on October 14, 1991, regardless of the views of the majority directors. As I read the materials, Assaly and Brown left the meeting of June 6, 1991, when it became clear to them that the other directors were serious about not renewing the management contract with Asgo Management Ltd. That is the true reason for their leaving, in my opinion. They did not leave because they had been ejected.

That Assaly and Brown were partial to the interest of Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. and its affiliates is certainly borne out not only by their own subsequent conduct but by the conduct of Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. itself. The steps taken by these two directors and by the corporation on June 7, 1991 support this conclusion, in my opinion.

In the circumstances then prevailing, notices of future meetings of the board to Assaly and Brown would have been mere formalities, since they had given notice that they were now dedicated to the removal of the majority directors from the board. Hence, in my view, the failure to observe the formality of giving notice of the meeting of June 13, 1991, while regrettable, amounted merely to a procedural irregularity in the circumstances of this case and did not operate so as to invalidate the resolution.

By virtue of s. 15(1) of the Act and Article 7.1, Article 9 and Article 10.1 of By-Law No. 1 of the condominium corporation, the majority directors had undoubted authority to pass the banking resolution that they did. In the circumstances in which they found themselves on June 13, 1991, the due discharge of their mandate from unit owners, whose interest they represented, did not afford them any other viable alternative. In acting as they did to secure the funds of the condominium corporation in the face of hostile acts, they did not revoke By-Law No. 3 or effect a breach of the management agreement with Asgo Management Ltd., in my opinion. The most that can be said of their conduct is that it had the effect of relieving Asgo Management Ltd. of one of its functions under the agreement. This could hardly be said to amount to a breach of the agreement. For these reasons, I conclude that the condominium corporation is entitled to the order sought in para. (b) of the notice of Application 52739/91.

On this application, the applicant seeks a declaration that the respondents are not entitled to vote at the meeting of owners which has been convened by Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. and is now scheduled to be held on July 25, 1991.

Although the application names three respondents, relief is in fact sought against two, viz., Thomas C. Assaly and Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd., since any voting rights to which the third respondent, Trendsetter Development Ltd., was entitled passed to Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. on the amalgamation.

In deciding whether or not the relief sought should be granted against either or both of the two respondents, it is necessary to discover the legal basis on which their right to vote depends. Section 18(2) of the Act authorizes the meeting convened by Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. in the following terms:

18(2) The board, or any mortgagee holding mortgages on not less than 15 per cent of the units, may at any time call a meeting of the owners of the corporation for the transaction of any business, the nature of which shall be specified in the notice calling the meeting.

Subsection (3) of s. 18 prescribes the quorum for the transaction of business at such a meeting.

The right of unit owners to vote is given by s. 22(1) of the Act, on the basis of one vote per unit.

The right of a mortgagee to vote is given by s. 48 of the Act in the following terms:

48. Where a mortgage of a unit and common interest contains a provision that authorizes the mortgagee to exercise the right of the owner to vote ... the mortgagee may exercise the right, and, where two or more such mortgages contain such a provision, the right may be exercised by the mortgagee who has priority.

By s. 20(3), a mortgagee who receives notice of an owner's meeting shall, in order to be entitled to exercise the right to vote, notify the condominium corporation and the owner of its intention to exercise the right to vote at least two days before the date of the meeting specified in the notice.

By s. 22 votes may be given either personally or by proxy.

In these proceedings the notice of meeting given by Thomas C. Assaly Corporation has not been challenged. I therefore accept it as a sufficient compliance with s. 18(2) of the Act. Similarly, the claim by Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. that it is a mortgagee holding mortgages on not less than 15 per cent of the units in the condominium corporation has not been challenged. I therefore accept that claim as an accurate statement of fact.

In her affidavit sworn on June 19, 1991, and filed in support of this application Gayle Duggan has deposed on information and belief that Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. has given notices to unit owners of its intention to exercise its right to vote at the meeting of owners. A copy of one such notice is filed as Exhibit D to her affidavit.

In his affidavit sworn on July 8, 1991, and filed on this application, Leslie D. Warren, secretary-treasurer of Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. deposed that Thomas C. Assaly is the owner of 53 units in the condominium corporation. He supported this statement by reference to exhibits to the affidavit.

Mr. Davidson for the corporation contended that neither Thomas C. Assaly nor Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. has the right to vote.

I deal first with the submissions made in support of the contention that Thomas C. Assaly personally was not entitled to vote.

Mr. Davidson first stated (factum, para. 18) that Thomas C. Assaly controls Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd., Trendsetter Developments Ltd. and Asgo Management Limited. Because of this, he argued, Thomas C. Assaly can have a personal interest which conflicts with the interests of unit owners. Trendsetter Developments Ltd., which amalgamated with Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. to become Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd., was the developer and declarant named in the declaration by which the condominium corporation was created. As such it is under a duty to protect the interests of all unit owners both present and prospective and cannot put its own interests above those of the other unit owners. York Condominium Corp. No. 167 v. Newrey Holdings Ltd. (1981), 32 O.R. (2d) 458, 122 D.L.R. (3d) 280 (C.A.) [leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused (1981), 32 O.R. (2d) 458n, 38 N.R. 129n] was cited in support of this proposition. Mr. Davidson emphasized the fiduciary obligation of the developer as laid down by the Court of Appeal in York Condominium Corp. and argued that both Thomas C. Assaly as controlling shareholder of both Trendsetter Developments Ltd. and its successor Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. and the latter corporation itself are fixed with the same fiduciary obligation.

He argued further that the purported sale of the 53 units to Thomas C. Assaly was in violation of s. 51 of the Act and he relied on the decision of Carruthers J. in Peel Condominium Corp. No. 199 v. Sanrose Construction (Dixie) Ltd. (1989), 68 O.R. (2d) 513, 5 R.P.R. (2d) 70 (H.C.J.), in support of this proposition. At p. 528 O.R., p. 87 R.P.R., of that decision, Carruthers J. stated:

I have commented above on the intention of the Act (s. 51) that the declarant must dispose of all the units. The specific obligation, as I have also noted, is to "take all reasonable steps ... without delay" to do so. There does not appear to be any provision in the Act ... which concerns the prospect of the declarant, whether developer as well or not, purchasing units for his, her or its own use either before or after the declaration is registered.

Mr. Davidson's final submission was that Thomas C. Assaly was not a bona fide purchaser. He was, so the submission went, a "declarant" within the meaning of the Act and, as such, could not be a bona fide purchaser. The units which he owned should be considered unsold. As a result Thomas C. Assaly was not a unit owner to whom the protective umbrella of the Act extended. He was, therefore, not entitled to vote. Reliance was placed on Carleton Condominium Corp. No. 279 v. Rochon (1987), 59 O.R. (2d) 545, 38 D.L.R. (4th) 430 (C.A.) to support this proposition. There, at p. 554 O.R., p. 439 D.L.R., Finlayson J.A., in delivering the judgment of the court, stated:

He (a declarant) can never be a bona fide purchaser of a unit and it is these "unit owners" that the Condominium Act is intended to protect.

Reliance was also placed on the definition of "declarant" in s. 1(1)(l) of the Act.

(l) "declarant" means the owner or owners in fee simple of the land described in the description at the time of registration of the declaration and description of the land, and includes any successor or assignee of such owner or owners but does not include a bona fide purchaser of a unit who pays fair market value or any successor or assignee of such purchaser ...

[Emphasis added]

Mr. McKinnon for Thomas C. Assaly and Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. contended that Thomas C. Assaly was a bona fide purchaser who purchased 53 units at fair market value and as such falls within the exception in the definition of "declarant" in s. 1(1)(l) of the Act. Consequently, he argued, Thomas C. Assaly is a unit owner to whom the protection of the Act extends. He is therefore entitled to vote at the meeting. Mr. McKinnon stated further that all but six of the units owned by Thomas C. Assaly which are unsold have been rented to tenants.

Mr. McKinnon contended, in the alternative, that if I should conclude that Thomas C. Assaly was a declarant, there was no prohibition in the Act against voting by declarants.

I am unable to accept Mr. McKinnon's contentions.

It is not disputed that Thomas C. Assaly is the controlling shareholder in both Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd., the successor to Trendsetter Developments Ltd., and Asgo Management Ltd. It is also common ground that the dispute which gave rise to these proceedings arose because a majority of the board of directors, duly elected by unit owners, determined that the management contract of Asgo Management Limited should not be renewed on its expiry. Given the position of Thomas C. Assaly in both Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. and Asgo Management Ltd. it can hardly be said that he is impartial. Indeed, Mr. McKinnon in his submissions made no secret about the fact that Thomas C. Assaly has a large investment in the project and, consequently, that his interest should receive greater protection than those of individual unit owners who had invested small amounts ($2,000, it was said). The difficulty with this position, in my respectful view, is that it is contrary to the intention of the Act. The principles laid down in cases such as York Condominium No. 167, Peel Condominium Corp. No. 199, and Carleton Condominium Corp. No. 279, supra, are, first, that the Act was intended to benefit unit owners who are bona fide purchasers, secondly, that declarants and their successors and assignees stand in a fiduciary relationship to unit owners, and finally, that they may not use their positions to further their own economic interests at the expense of bona fide unit owners.

The decision by Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. to invoke the machinery of s. 18(2) of the Act in order to remove from office the majority directors of the board because they had the temerity to vote against renewal of the management agreement with Asgo Management Ltd. is, in my respectful view, nothing short of a massive use of its position to further its own economic advantage. This is the type of conduct which Carruthers J., in a different factual context, excoriated in Peel Condominium Corporation Corp. No. 199, supra, and I find it no less reprehensible here.

It follows from the foregoing that I accept the submissions of Mr. Davidson for the applicant that Thomas C. Assaly is not entitled to vote at the meeting.

I turn now to the issue whether Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd., as the holder of junior mortgages on not less than 15 per cent of the units in the condominium corporation, is entitled to vote.

The argument of this issue focused on the proper construction of s. 48 of the Act which reads:

48. Where a mortgage of a unit and common interest contains a provision that authorizes the mortgagee to exercise the right of the owner to vote or to consent, the mortgagee may exercise the right, and, where two or more such mortgages contain such a provision, the right may be exercised by the mortgagee who has priority.

It is common ground that the first mortgages on the units are held by Royal Trust Company and that Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. holds junior mortgages on not less than 15 per cent of the units. It is also common ground that each mortgage "contains a provision that authorizes the mortgagee to exercise the right of the owner to vote".

The materials indicate that Royal Trust Company, the first mortgagee, has not signified its intention to vote.

Relying on the decision of Philp J. in Keyes v. Metropolitan Toronto Condominium Corporation No. 876 (1990), 73 O.R. (2d) 568, 11 R.P.R. (2d) 129 (H.C.J.), Mr. Davidson contended that, properly construed, s. 48 would disentitle Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. from exercising the owners' rights to vote because it is not "the mortgagee who has priority" since Royal Trust Company is the holder of the first mortgages.

Mr. McKinnon on the other hand contended, quite properly, that s. 48 should be construed in light of other provisions of the Act, such as ss. 12(5), 14, 18, 20 and 31(3). When construed in that way, so the argument went, s. 48 does entitle Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. to exercise the owners' rights to vote in the circumstances of this case since the mortgagee who has priority has not signified its right to vote. Mr. McKinnon contended further that Keyes was wrongly decided and should not be followed.

Although I am in full agreement with Mr. McKinnon's approach to the construction of s. 48, I am unable to conclude that Keyes was wrongly decided. In any case, having regard to what I have already said concerning the relationship between Thomas C. Assaly and Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. and their obligations vis-a-vis unit holders, it is, in my respectful view, consistent with the principles laid down in the authorities cited and the intent of the Act that Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd., as mortgagee, should not be entitled to vote. For similar reasons, I am of the opinion that Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd., as owner of two residential and seven commercial units, is not entitled to vote at the meeting.

On July 8, the applicant filed a motion on this application seeking the following relief:

(a) a declaration confirming that all proxies attached as Exhibit "D" to the Affidavit of Gayle A. Duggan in support of this motion and obtained for the meeting of unit owners originally scheduled for June 21, 1991 are valid and subsisting proxies for use at that meeting to be re-scheduled on a date to be determined by the Court, subject only to revocation by the unit owners prior to any vote taken at that meeting;

(b) an order declaring that the rescheduled meeting of the owners (originally scheduled for June 21, 1991) is to be chaired by the President of Carleton Condominium Corporation No. 347, Gayle A. Duggan.

Mr. McKinnon contended that the declaration sought in para. (a) of the notice of motion should not be made because the solicitation sent to unit owners did not state the purpose for which they were sought. In the circumstances of this case, given the fact that the meeting and its purpose had been so well publicized, I see no merit in the contention and I make the declaration in the terms sought in para. (a) of the notice of motion.

Mr. McKinnon also objected to the granting of the relief sought in para. (b) of the notice of motion. Article 6.6(a) of By-Law No. 1 of the condominium corporation provides that the president of the corporation shall act as chairman of meetings of unit owners and authorizes a substitute only in case the president is absent. I see no reason to make any order that would effect any alteration of that provision. As I have indicated, the allegations of impropriety against Gayle Duggan and the other majority directors were unfounded and any alteration of the normal rules of conduct of the business of the condominium corporation would simply lend an air of credibility to those allegations. Accordingly, I make the declaration sought in para. (b) of the notice of motion.

(c) Application 53028/91

The reliefs sought in this application have as their premise that the majority directors and Nelligan/Power, the solicitors for the condominium corporation, have acted unlawfully or improperly. Earlier in these reasons I indicated that I had found no unlawfulness or impropriety in the actions of Messrs. Nelligan/Power. As well, in my reasons with respect to Application 52739/91, I indicated that I found no unlawfulness or impropriety in the actions of the majority directors. On the contrary, I found that their actions had been taken in the best interests of the condominium corporation, according to their best judgment. In light of these findings, it follows that Application 53028/91 should be dismissed.

4. SUMMARY

(a) Application 52739/91

The applicant is entitled to the order sought in para. (b) of the notice of application. The order should contain such reasonable provisions as the bank may require to give effect to the order made.

(b) Application 52779/91

(1) There will be a declaration that the respondents to this application, Thomas C. Assaly and Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd., are not entitled to vote at the meeting of owners of the condominium corporation now scheduled to be held on July 25, 1991.

(2) There will be declarations as requested in paras. (a) and (b) of the applicant's motion dated July 4, 1991, concerning confirmation of proxies obtained by Gayle Duggan and the chairing of the meeting to be held on July 25, 1991.

(c) Application 53028/91

The application is dismissed in its entirety.

5. COSTS

Costs of the Royal Bank of Canada and the Royal Bank Mortgage Corporation are fixed at $2,000 and are payable forthwith by the condominium corporation. Costs of the applicant for all proceedings are payable on a party-and-party basis by Thomas C. Assaly and Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. forthwith after assessment.

Counsel may speak with me concerning any matter that might be required to give effect to this judgment. Arrangements for this purpose are to be made through the trial co-ordinator's office.

Order accordingly.

York Region Condominium Corp. No. 585 v. Gilbert

Action No. M186454/89

Ontario District Court - York Judicial District Toronto, Ontario Gilbert D.C.J. January 23, 1990

P.M. Conway, for the Applicant. J.I. Laskin, for the Respondents.

GILBERT D.C.J.:-- This is an application under Section 49 of the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 84, as amended, for an order requiring the respondents, Philip Gilbert and Shirley Gilbert, to cease the keeping of a dog in Unit 611 of the applicant's building on the grounds that the Declaration and the Rules and Regulations of this condominium Corporation prohibit the keeping of pets in the units and common elements.

The York Regional Condominium Corporation No. 585 is a condominium corporation duly created by registration of its Declaration in accordance with the provisions of the Condominium Act R.S.O. 1980, c. 84 as amended. It is a high rise building composed of 198 residential units and is called "Promenade Towers". It is located at 7420 Bathurst Street in the Town of Vaughan in the Regional Municipality of York.

Paragraph 3.01(e) of the registered Declaration provides as follows -

"No animal, livestock, fowl or any pet shall be kept or allowed in any unit."

Paragraph 4.05 of the registered Declaration provides as follows -

"Pets: No animal, livestock, fowl or any pet shall be kept upon the common elements, including those parts thereof of which any owner has the exclusive use."

Rule 30 of the Rules and Regulations of Promenade Towers provides as follows -

"Pets: No pets shall be kept or allowed in any units or on the common elements, including those parts thereof of which any owner has the exclusive use (pets are prohibited by the Condominium Declaration)".

The Gilberts are the owners of Unit 611, one of the residential units in the Promenade Towers. They have a long hair collie dog. Shirley Gilbert, wife of Philip Gilbert, entered into an agreement to purchase the unit in April 1988. The transaction closed at the end of July 1988 and the Gilberts entered into possession at the end of August 1988. The Gilberts were represented by the law firm of Robins, Appleby.

Mr. Gilbert saw a "No pets" sign at the entrance to Promenade Towers when he inspected the suite in April 1988. Before the closing at the end of July 1988 and before taking possession of the unit at the end of August 1988, Mr. Gilbert received a copy of the Declaration on or about July 28, 1989 from the law clerk at Robins, Appleby and was told to read it.

In September 1988, Marcia Hollander, the on-site Property Manager, of Promenade Towers, met Mr. Gilbert on one of the stairwells of the building when he was walking down the stairs with his dog. Ms. Hollander asked Mr. Gilbert whether the dog was his and he responded that it was not, that it belonged to his son, and was staying at the unit only for the day.

In the following months, Ms. Hollander received several complaints from unit owners advising that they had seen Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert with a dog in the parking garage and elsewhere on the common elements and requested her to enforce the Declaration which prohibits the keeping of dogs.

By letter dated November 29, 1988, Ms. Hollander advised the Gilberts that the Declaration prohibits the keeping of pets and requested that the dog be removed from the premises immediately. On December 1989 the Board of Directors instructed Ms. Hollander to ensure that the Declaration and rules of the Condominium Corporation were complied with. Shortly thereafter, Ms. Hollander was visited in the property management office by Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert on separate occasions. Both advised Ms. Hollander they were aware of the Declaration's provisions prohibiting the keeping of dogs and indicated they knew this when they moved in. Mrs. Gilbert indicated that she would be very upset to have to get rid of the dog. Ms. Hollander advised the Board of Directors in January 1989 of the Gilberts' response. The Gilberts were requested to attend the next meeting of the Board of Directors to take place on February 16, 1989 but declined to attend.

At the next meeting of the Board of Directors in March 1989, the Board instructed the Corporation's solicitors to write to the Gilberts requiring compliance with the Declaration and rules. The Corporation's solicitors did so and received a response from the Gilberts' solicitors. On April 13, 1989 the Corporation's solicitors sent a further letter to the Gilberts requesting the dog be removed within seven days. The dog has not been removed.

At the June meeting of the Board, a resolution was passed authorizing the commencement of this application to the court for an Order authorizing the Gilberts to comply with the Declaration and rules of the Corporation relating to their dog in their unit and on the common elements in the building.

The Position of the Applicant

Ms. Patricia M. Conway, counsel for the applicant submits that -

1. A condominium operates on the basis of mutual rights and obligations. The Corporation through its Board of Directors has an obligation to enforce the Declaration, the by-laws and the rules. Each unit owner is bound by and required to comply with the Declaration, the by-laws and the rules and every unit owner has a right to compliance by other owners with the Declaration, by-laws and rules of the condominium. Condominium Act. R.S.O. 1980, c. 84, s. 12(3), s. 31(1) and (2).

2. The Declaration of the Condominium Corporation is in the nature of a covenant running with the land circumscribing the extent and limits of the enjoyment and use by a unit owner of his unit and of the common elements. York Condominium Corporation No. 216 v. Borsodi, et al. (1983) 42 O.R. (2nd) 99. 3. The provisions in the Declaration of the Condominium Corporation prohibiting the keeping of pets is one respecting the occupation and use of the unit and common elements and is within the power of the Condominium Corporation to enact and enforce. Condominium Act R.S.O. 1980, c. 84, s. 3(3)(b) Re: York Condominium Corporation No. 42 v. Melanson (1975) 9 O.R. (2d) 116 at 119. York Condominium Corporation No. 375 v. Grecchi (unreported Decision of Judge S.P. Webb, D.C.O. dated November 1, 1984). Peel Condominium Corporation No. 78 v. Harthen et al. (1978) 20 O.R. (2nd) 225.

4. Rule 30 of the Rules and Regulations of the Condominium Corporation prohibiting the keeping of pets is within the powers of the Board of Directors to make rules respecting the use of the common elements and units or any of them to promote the safety or welfare of the owners and of the property or for the purpose of preventing unreasonable interference with the use and enjoyment of the common elements and of other units. Condominium Act R.S.O. 1980, s. 29(1), (2) and (3).

5. The Gilberts are in breach of the provisions of the Declaration and the rules of the Condominium Corporation by having a dog on their premises, having knowledge of the prohibition of pets by unit owners and, therefore, the applicant is entitled to an Order requiring the Gilberts (respondents) to comply with the provisions in the registered Declaration, in particular Articles 3.01(c) and 4.05 and Rule 30 of the Rules and Regulations of the Condominium Corporation by ceasing the keeping of a dog in Unit 611 and the common elements of the building of the applicant Corporation.

The Position of the Respondent

Mr. John I. Laskin, counsel for the respondents submits that - 1. The "No pets" provisions in the applicant's Declaration are ultra vires of the applicant's Condominium Corporation and of the Condominium Act. He stated that a declaration under the Condominium Act is a creature of that statute and is, therefore, prescribed by it. A declaration may only restrict rights and impose duties if the statute authorizes it to do so and that dog ownership is an incident of unit ownership in the building. Statutes which encroach upon the rights of an owner are subject to strict construction and it is appropriate to strictly construe a statutory provision which may permit the encroachment on or the restriction of the rights of an individual. Peel Condominium on No. 11 and Caroe (1974) 4 O.R. (2d) 543 at 545.

2. The declaration is not the place to deal with pet restrictions relating to a condominium. The pet provisions should be in the bylaws of a condominium corporation. Re: York Condominium No. 42 v. Melanson (1975) 9 O.R. (2d) 116 at 122.

3. The owner of a condominium unit is in a worse position than a tenant. In a landlord-tenant relationship, the landlord must show, on a balance of probabilities, that a tenant's conduct by keeping a pet substantially interferes with the reasonable enjoyment of the premises by the landlord or other tenants. A condominium unit owner has no similar right or protection. Kay v. Park Forest (1982) 35 O.R. (2d) 329. Re: York Condominium Corporation No. 42 v. Melanson (as above) at p. 124. Re: Waterloo North Condominium Corporation No. 31 v. Indico Ltd. (1984) 23 A.C.W.S. (2d) 545.

4. Section 3(3)(b) of the Condominium Act relating to provisions respecting the occupation and use of the units and common elements that a declaration may contain should be subject to an implied term of being reasonable and consistent with the Condominium Act. Sections 28(4) and 29(2) of the Condominium Act R.S.O. 1980, c. 84, contain express terms that the bylaws and rules of a condominium shall be reasonable and consistent with the Act, the declaration and the bylaws. Condominium Act R.S.O. 1980, c. 84, s. 8(4) and s. 29(2). York Condominium Corporation No. 375 v. Lorenzo Crecchi, et al. (as above).

5. This court has power to exercise a discretion under Section 49(2) of the Condominium Act and should do so because the respondents were not aware of the no pets provision in the Declaration or rules of the applicant Condominium corporation when Mrs. Gilbert signed the Offer to Purchase the unit in the building, therefore had no knowledge of the pet restrictions. Also, there has been no unreasonable interference by the Gilberts' dog which substantially interfered with the reasonable enjoyment of the premises by the Condominium corporation or the other unit owners in the building. York Condominium Corporation No. 288 v. Bianca McDougall, et al. unreported Decision of Judge Sheard, D.C.O. dated July 1978. Conclusions

1. The provisions set forth in Article 3.01(e) and Article 4.05 of the registered Declaration of the applicant relating to the prohibition of pets in the units and common elements of the building are intra vires and are enforceable by the unit owners and the Board of Directors of the applicant condominium corporation.

I accept and apply the law and reasoning of His Honour Judge Misener in Re. Peel Condominium Corporation No. 78 v. Harthen et al. as above. The prohibiting pet provision in the Declaration relates to the occupation and use of the units and common elements by the unit owners. The "occupation" refers to the manner or nature of the physical possession of the units or common elements in itself and "use" refers to the enjoyment of the premises or units and common elements once physical possession has been acquired.

I do not accept the reasoning of Mr. Laskin that the prohibitive pet provisions are ultra vires of the applicant condominium corporation or the Condominium Act itself. The decision of Mr. Justice Galligan in Re. Peel Condominium Corporation No. 11 v. Caroe related to a provision in the Declaration that a unit may be only "occupied as a one-family residence by the owner, his family and guests". The court held that the restricting provision in the Declaration imposed a restriction and encroachment on the right of alienation of the unit owners which is one of the fundamental incidents of ownership and one of the important forms of alienation is the leasing or renting of property. The court found there was no clear indication of legislative intention in sec. 3(2)(c) of the Act (now sec. 3(3)(b)) to restrict the fundamental right of alienation. Therefore, the restriction in the Declaration limiting the units to a one-family residence to be occupied by the owner, his family and guests thereby prohibited the owners from renting their units was not authorized by the Condominium Act and was invalid.

In the present case, Mr. Laskin submitted that ownership of a dog is an incidence of ownership of a unit and common elements in the applicant's condominium building. I do not agree that it is so. When a person buys a unit with common elements in a condominium, the person is bound by and shall comply with the provisions in the Declaration provided the provisions are intra vires of the Condominium Act and each owner has a right to the compliance by the other owners to the provisions in the Declaration, the bylaws and rules of the condominium.

For the above reason, I find the provisions in the Declaration and the rules prohibiting pets are intra vires respecting the occupation and use of the units and common elements and are, therefore, enforceable by the unit owners and the applicant corporation.

2. Ms. Conway, counsel for the applicant, stated that a Declaration of the applicant condominium is in the nature of a covenant running with the land and circumscribing the extent and limits the enjoyment and use by the unit owners and of the common elements. The Honourable Judge Allen in York Condominium Corporation No. 216 v. Borsodi et al. at p. 107 quoted Judge Moore of the District Court of Appeal of Florida in Hidden Harbour Estates, Inc. v. Basso (1981) 393 (2d) 637 at pp. 638 and 639 as follows:

"As we opined in Sterling Village Condominium, Inc. v. Breitenbach, 251 So. 2d 685 (Fla. 4th DCA 1971):

"Daily in this state thousands of citizens are investing millions of dollars in condominium property. Chapter 711, F.S.A. 1967, the Florida Condominium Act, and the Articles or Declarations of Condominiums provided for thereunder ought to be construed strictly to assure these investors that what the buyer sees the buyer gets. Every man may justly consider his home his castle and himself as the king thereof; nonetheless his sovereign fiat to use his property as he pleases must yield, at least in degree, where ownership is in common or cooperation with others. The benefits of condominiums living and ownership demand no less. The individual ought not be permitted to disrupt the integrity of the common scheme through his desire for change, however laudable that change might be."

Later at p. 639 Judge Moore quoted with approval the following extract from another decision [Pepe v. Whispering Sands condominium Ass'n (1977), 351 So. 2d 7751:

"A declaration of a condominium is more than a mere contract spelling out mutual rights and obligations of the parties thereto - it assumes some of the attributes of a covenant running with the land, circumscribing the extent and limits of the enjoyment and use of real property. Stated otherwise, it spells out the true extent of the purchased, and thus granted, use interest therein. Absent consent, or an amendment of the declaration of condominium as may be provided for in each declaration, or as may be provided by statute in the absence of such a provision, this enjoyment and use cannot be impaired or diminished."

Judge Moore went on to write as follows at pp. 639-40:

"There are essentially two categories of cases in which a condominium association attempts to enforce rules of restrictive uses. The first category is that dealing with the validity of restrictions found in the declaration of condominium itself. The second category of cases involves the validity of rules promulgated by the association's board of directors or the refusal of the board of directors to allow a particular use when the board is invested with the power to grant or deny a particular use.

(1) In the first category, the restrictions are clothed with a very strong presumption of validity which arises from the fact that each individual unit owner purchases his unit knowing of and accepting the restrictions to be imposed. Such restrictions are very much in the nature of covenants running with the land and they will not be invalidated absent a showing that they are wholly arbitrary in their application, in violation of public policy, or that they abrogate some fundamental constitutional right. See, White Egret Condominium, Inc. v. Franklin, 379 So. 2d 346 (Fla. 1979). Thus, although case law has applied the word "reasonable" to determine whether such restrictions are valid, this is not the appropriate test, and to the extent that our decisions have been interpreted otherwise, we disagree. Indeed, a use restriction in a declaration of condominium may have a certain degree of unreasonableness to it, and yet withstand attack in the courts. If it were otherwise, a unit owner could not rely on the restrictions found in the declaration of condominium, since such restrictions would be in a potential condition of continuous flux."

The rationale of that judgment is of assistance and applicable to the present case. 3. Mr. Laskin submitted there is an implied term that the provisions in the Declaration of the condominium corporation must be reasonable and consistent with the Act in the same way as the bylaws and rules governing the units and common elements are. (See sec. 28(4) and sec. 29(2) of the Act).

The endorsement by the Ontario Court of Appeal in the case of York Condominium Corporation No. 375 v. Lorenzo Grecchi (as above) in part stated:

"In our view the trial judge exercised his discretion properly and the restriction contained in the Declaration and the bylaw were reasonable and reasonably relates to the legitimate purposes of the condominium corporation."

The prohibitive restriction related to the keeping of a dog in the units and common elements of the condominium building.

I find that the pet prohibitions set forth in the Declaration and the rules of the applicant condominium corporation are reasonable and reasonably relate to the legitimate purposes of the condominium. 4. Mr. Laskin submitted that the pet restrictions relating to the condominium should not be in the Declaration provisions but should be in the bylaws of the condominium corporation.

In Re. York Condominium Corporation No. 42 v. Melanson (see above) Chief Justice Howland stated at p. 122:

"Under s. 3(2)(c) of the Act, the right to include a provision in the declaration respecting occupation of the units would embrace such matters as restricting the use to single-family residences. On the other hand, the right to restrict the keeping of animals in such units as incidental to such single-family use would seem properly to fall within the power to make bylaws governing the use of units."

However, in the same case, Chief Justice Howland stated at p. 119:

"In creating a condominium corporation, a developer has to consider carefully what restrictions it is going to impose on the user of the units and common elements because such restrictions will affect the character of the condominium and the marketability of its units. The prohibitive paragraph could have been included in the declaration pursuant to s. 3(2) of the Act, just as the declaration provided that each unit should be used only as a single-family residence. However, the objection to so doing is that under s. 3(3) of the Act the declaration may be amended only with the consent of all owners and all persons having registered encumbrances against the units and common interests. In the case of a restriction such as the prohibitive paragraph this could be a formidable task."

In the Melanson case, the prohibitive pet restriction was in a bylaw of the condominium corporation and read:

"No animal shall be allowed upon or kept in or about the property"

It seems to me that a prohibitive pet restriction could be contained in the Declaration or the bylaws or the rules of a condominium corporation provided that the prohibitive pet restrictions is brought to the attention of a purchaser of a condominium unit prior to the closing of the sale and purchase of the unit.

The problems arising with regard to amendments to a Declaration may raise problems but these are matters which should be considered at the time of incorporation by the developer of the condominium, keeping in mind the intended use and purposes of the condominium building. The purchaser of a condominium unit should be aware of the use and purposes of a condominium building before making a purchase or completing a sale of a condominium unit.

In the present case, Mr. Gilbert was aware of the "No Pets" sign in the building on inspecting the property and Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert were given a copy of the Declaration setting forth the pet restriction by a representative of the law firm that acted for them and who told them to read it. In these circumstances it is a reasonable conclusion to make that the Gilberts were deemed to have knowledge of the pet prohibition in the Declaration prior to the closing of the transaction.

The denial of ownership of the dog by Mr. Gilbert when asked by the Property Manager, Ms. Hollander "Who owns the dog?" and his response that it belonged to his son and that the dog was staying only for a day, indicates he was well aware of the pet prohibition in the building. Also, shortly after Ms. Hollander was visited in the management office by Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert on separate occasions and both advised her that they were aware of the dog prohibition in the Declaration when they moved in. Mrs. Gilbert said she would be upset if she had to get rid of the dog.

To accede to permitting the Gilberts to keep their dog in the unit and common elements of the building would be to utterly ignore the occupation and use of the units and common elements in the building and an intended purpose of the incorporation of the condominium. To do otherwise would lead to chaos in the management of condominiums and the rights, obligations and duties of the unit owners and the condominium corporation.

5. Mr. Laskin submitted that the owner of a condominium unit is in a worse position than a tenant because in a landlord-tenant relationship, the landlord must show on a balance of probabilities that a tenant's conduct by keeping a pet on the premises substantially interferes with the reasonable enjoyment of the premises by the landlord and other tenants. Re. York Condominium Corporation No. 42 v. Melanson. There is a vast difference between a landlord-tenant relationship and the relationship of unit owners of a condominium. The landlord and tenant are bound by the terms of a lease agreement. The unit owners of a condominium are bound by the Declaration, the bylaws and the rules of the condominium and the Condominium Act requiring the duty of compliance and the right of enforcement by the unit owners and the condominium corporation.

As long as a restriction in a Declaration bylaw or rule of a condominium corporation is intra vires and is reasonable and consistent with the condominium Act, it should be enforceable. In the present case, there were complaints made to the Property Manager by unit owners to the Gilberts having a dog in their unit and in the common elements of the condominium building which the unit owners must have felt was in breach of the Declaration and the rules prohibiting dogs and to their right to reasonable enjoyment of the premises by themselves and other owners and the condominium corporation took the necessary steps to enforce their rights which was reasonable in the circumstances.

Accordingly, there will be an Order directing the respondents to comply with the registered Declaration of the applicant, York Region Condominium corporation No. 585, and in particular Articles 3.01(e) and 4.05 and Rule 30 of the Rules and Regulations by ceasing to keep a dog in Unit 611 and on the common elements of York Region Condominium No. 585, by April 30, 1990.

Counsel may make representations to me in my chambers regarding the costs of this application within twenty days of the release of these Reasons.

Action Nos. 2215/91U and 2446/91U

Ontario Court (General Division), Borins J. January 16, 1992

Jonathan H. Fine and Mario D. Deo, for applicants in both applications. Kenneth G. Hood, for respondent in both applications.

BORINS J.:--These applications, which were argued together, raise significant issues with respect to the interpretation of certain sections of the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 84, and R.R.O. 1980, Reg. 121 (Condominium Act). Each of the applicants, individually or jointly, has entered into an agreement of purchase and sale with the respondent to purchase a residential condominium unit in a proposed residential condominium project developed and constructed by the respondent in Ajax, Ontario, which is known as "The Breakers".

The issues raised by the applicants are as follows:

- (1) Does the disclosure statement which the respondent delivered to each applicant comply with the requirements of s. 52(6) and (7) of the Condominium Act?
- (2) Is the respondent in default of its obligation under s. 52(1) and (2) of the Act to deliver an amended disclosure statement to the applicants?
- (3) Has the respondent charged some of the applicants an interest rate which exceeds the interest rate provided for in their agreements of purchase and sale and permitted by s. 51(6) para. 1 of the Act in respect to the mortgage interest rate component of the occupancy fee which the applicants are required to pay the respondent?
- (4) What is the "prescribed rate" of interest which the respondent is required by s. 53(2) and (3) of the Act to pay to the applicants on the deposits paid by them to the respondent pursuant to their agreements of purchase and sale?

It is the submission of counsel for the applicants that if the disclosure statement does not comply with the requirements of the Act, or if the respondent is in default in delivering an amended disclosure statement to the applicants, that s. 52(1) of the Act requires that there be a declaration that the agreements of purchase and sale entered into by the applicants are not binding on them. In an eight-page schedule annexed to the notices of application entitled "Disclosure Statement Deficiency Analysis", counsel for the applicants lists almost 70 alleged deficiencies in the disclosure statement any of which, he submits, would enable the purchasers to avoid the final closings of their agreements of purchase and sale on the ground that because the disclosure statement does not comply with the requirements of the Act it is not a disclosure statement for the purpose of s. 52(1) and, therefore, the agreements of purchase and sale are not binding on the purchasers. Counsel for the applicants further submits that because of significant events which have occurred since the purchasers entered into their agreements of purchase and sale the respondent is obliged to deliver a material amendment to the disclosure statement, and because this has not occurred, s. 52(1) enables the purchasers to obtain a declaration that the agreements of purchase and sale are not binding on them. The significant events relied on are the filing of a number of construction liens and certificates of action against the property on which the condominium is being constructed and the failure of the respondent to complete the recreational unit by the date contained in the disclosure statement.

The relevant legislation

Because an understanding of the relevant legislation is necessary to an appreciation of the issues, I propose to set it out at the beginning of my reasons for judgment. What follows are ss. 51(6), 52(1), (2), (4), (5), (6), (7) and (8), and 53(1), (2), (3) and (4) of the Condominium Act:

51(6) Where an agreement of purchase and sale entered into by a proposed declarant for a proposed unit for residential purposes permits or requires the purchaser to take possession of or occupy the unit before a deed or transfer of the unit acceptable for registration is delivered to him, the money paid in respect of such right or obligation to the proposed declarant shall be not greater, on a monthly basis, than the total of the following amounts:

1. The amount of interest that the purchaser would have paid, monthly, in respect of any mortgage or mortgages he is obligated to assume or give under the agreement of purchase and sale on delivery of a deed or transfer of the unit.
2. An amount reasonably estimated on a monthly basis for municipal taxes attributable to the proposed unit.
3. The projected monthly common expense contribution for that unit.

52.(1) An agreement of purchase and sale entered into after the 1st day of June, 1979 by a declarant or proposed declarant of a unit or proposed unit for residential purposes is not binding on the purchaser until the declarant or proposed declarant has delivered to the purchaser a copy of the current disclosure statement and all material amendments thereto.

(2) The purchaser, before receiving delivery of a deed to or transfer of the unit, may rescind the agreement of purchase and sale within ten days after receiving the disclosure statement or, where there has been a material amendment thereto, within ten days after receiving the material amendment.

(4) Every declarant or proposed declarant who receives notice of rescission under subsection (3) from a person entitled to rescind the agreement of purchase and sale under subsection (2), shall forthwith refund, without penalty or charge, to the person giving notice, all money that he received from that person under the agreement that was credited as payment against purchase price.

(5) Where any statement or material required under this Act to be provided by a declarant or proposed declarant to a purchaser of a unit or proposed unit for residential purposes contains any material statement or information that is false, deceptive or misleading or fails to contain any material statement or information, the corporation or any unit owner who relied on such statement or material is entitled, as against the declarant or the proposed declarant to damages for any loss sustained as a result of such reliance.

(6) The disclosure statement referred to in subsection (1) shall contain and fully and accurately disclose,

(a) the name and municipal address of the declarant or proposed declarant and of the property or proposed property;

(b) a general description of the property or proposed property including the types and number of buildings, units and recreational and other amenities together with any conditions that apply to the provision of amenities;

(c) the portion of units or proposed units which the declarant or proposed declarant intends to market in blocks of units to investors;

(d) a brief narrative description of the significant features of the existing or proposed declaration, by-laws and rules governing the use of common elements and units, and of any contracts or leases that may be subject to termination or expiration under section 39;

(e) a budget statement for the one year period immediately following the registration of the declaration and the description;

(f) where construction of amenities is not completed, a schedule of the proposed commencement and completion dates; and

(g) any other matters required by the regulations to be disclosed. (7) The budget statement mentioned in clause (6)(e) shall set out,

(a) the common expenses;

(b) the proposed amount of each expense;

(c) particulars of the type, frequency and level of the services to be provided;

(d) the projected monthly common expense contribution for each type of unit;

(e) a statement of the portion of the common expense to be paid into a reserve fund;

(f) a statement of the assumed inflation factor;

(g) a statement of any judgments against the corporation, the status of any pending lawsuits to which the corporation is a party and the status of any pending lawsuits material to the property of which the declarant or proposed declarant has actual knowledge;

(h) any current or expected fees or charges to be paid by unit owners or any of them for the use of the common elements or part thereof and other facilities related to the property;

(i) any services not included in the budget that the declarant or proposed declarant provides, or expenses that he pays and that might reasonably be expected to become, at any subsequent time, a common expense and the projected common expense contribution attributable to each of those services or expenses for each type of unit;

(j) the amounts in all reserve funds; and

(k) any other matters required by the regulations to be disclosed.

(8) Where the total amount incurred for the common expenses provided for in the budget statement exceeds the total of the proposed amounts set out in the statement, for the period covered by the budget statement mentioned in clause (6)(e) the declarant shall forthwith pay to the corporation the amount of the excess except in respect of increased expenses attributable to the termination of an agreement under section 39.

53.(1) All money received by or on behalf of a proposed declarant from a purchaser on account of a sale or an agreement for the purchase and sale of a proposed unit for residential purposes before the registration of the declaration and description, other than money paid as rent or as an occupancy charge, shall, notwithstanding the registration of the declaration and description thereafter, be held in trust by the person receiving such money for the person entitled thereto in respect of the agreement and such money shall be held in a separate account designated as a trust account at a chartered bank or trust company or a loan company or credit union authorized by law to receive money on deposit or a Province of Ontario Savings Office until,

(a) its disposition to the person entitled thereto; or

(b) delivery of prescribed security to the purchaser for repayment.

(2) Where an agreement of purchase and sale referred to in subsection (1) is terminated and the purchaser is entitled to the return of any money paid under the agreement, the proposed declarant shall pay to the purchaser interest on such money at the prescribed rate.

(3) Subject to subsection (2), where a purchaser of a proposed unit under an agreement of purchase and sale referred to in subsection (1) enters into possession or occupation of the unit before a deed or transfer of the unit acceptable for registration is delivered to him, the proposed declarant shall pay interest at the prescribed rate on all money received by him on account of the purchase price from the day the purchaser enters into possession or occupation until the day a deed or transfer acceptable for registration is delivered to him.

(4) Subject to subsections (2) and (3), the proposed declarant is entitled to any interest earned on the money required to be held in trust under subsection (1).

The following are ss. 32 and 33 of R.R.O. 1980, Reg. 121:

32. Pursuant to subsection 52(6) of the Act, a declarant shall provide the following documents with the disclosure statement:

1. A copy of the corporation's declaration or proposed declaration.
2. A copy of the corporation's by-laws or proposed by-laws.
3. A copy of the corporation's rules or proposed rules.
4. A copy of any insurance trust agreement or proposed insurance trust agreement.

33. The rate of interest under subsections 53(2) and (3) of the Act on money held in trust under subsection 53(1) of the Act shall, (a) for the six months immediately following the last day of March of each year, be 1 per cent per annum below the rate paid on The Province of Ontario Savings Office savings accounts on the 1st day of April of that year; and

(b) for the six months immediately following the last day of September of each year, be 1 per cent per annum below the rate paid on The Province of Ontario Savings Office savings accounts on the 1st day of October of that year.

A typical residential condominium purchase transaction and the relevant provisions of the Condominium Act

A review of relevant provisions of the Condominium Act in the context of a typical residential condominium purchase transaction will be helpful in understanding the issues to be determined in these applications. When a person purchases a newly constructed home from its builder or developer, the transaction is relatively straightforward. The purchaser becomes the owner of the residence and the land on which it was constructed. He or she has no contractual relationship with any neighbour and there are no rules or regulations which govern the activities which may or may not take place in the residence or on the property. No restrictions apply to who may occupy the residence or, for example, to whether or not the occupants can bring pets into the home or park vehicles on the driveway.

The same cannot be said about the purchase of a residential condominium unit. Not only is the purchase of a condominium a more complex transaction than the purchase of a house, it also brings with it the experience of communal living in which each condominium owner is a member of the condominium corporation to which the developer turns over the condominium complex and which corporation is then governed by a board of directors. Thereafter, the condominium, or unit owners, are bound by and must comply with the Act, the declaration (which is similar to the articles of incorporation of a business corporation), the by-laws and rules of the condominium corporation, and they are financially responsible for the maintenance of the common elements of the condominium complex. As well, each unit owner has the right to insist upon and enforce compliance with the by-laws and rules by each of the other unit owners and the condominium corporation has the duty to effect compliance by the owners with the Act, the declaration, the by-laws and the rules. It is little wonder, therefore, that the Act, principally in s. 52, requires that the declarant, which is the developer of the condominium project, must provide each prospective purchaser with a package of information describing what is being sold, what it will cost to live in the condominium unit and the laws and rules by which the condominium owners must abide. This package of information is the disclosure statement referred to in s. 52(1) and its contents are stipulated by s. 52(6) and (7). This duty on the part of the developer or declarant to make disclosure to a prospective purchaser is similar to the duty imposed by s. 52 of the Securities Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 466, on the issuer of a security to file a prospectus. The duty to deliver a disclosure statement and the provisions of the Act prescribing its contents constitute one of the several consumer protection features of the Act.

Because the developer is unable to convey title to a condominium unit to the purchaser until the declaration and description are registered in accordance with the Act, the typical condominium purchase transaction usually requires two closings. The first closing, referred to in practice as the possession, occupancy or interim closing, occurs when the construction of the condominium unit has been completed and it is ready for occupancy and prior to the registration of the declaration and the description. The second closing, referred to in practice as the final closing, title closing, or unit transfer date, occurs after registration, at which time the purchaser acquires exclusive ownership and use of his or her unit, subject to the provisions of the Act, the declaration and the by-laws. At this time, the condominium owners also become tenants in common of the common elements which constitute all of the property in the condominium complex as defined in s. 1(1)(s), except the condominium units. From the date of the occupancy closing until the date of the final closing when the purchaser is required to pay the developer the balance owing for the purchase price of the unit, the purchaser is required to pay a monthly rental or occupancy fee which cannot exceed the amount stipulated by s. 51(6). Section 53(1) requires a developer to deposit in a separate trust account all deposit monies paid by a purchaser and to pay to the purchaser interest on the deposit at the rate described in s. 33 of Reg. 121 where an agreement of purchase and sale is terminated or from the date of the occupancy closing to the date of the final closing. The cap on the amount chargeable as an occupancy fee and the provisions with respect to the payment of interest on deposits are additional consumer protection features of the Act.

This brief overview of the typical residential condominium purchase transaction and the relevant sections of the Act is sufficient, in my view, to understand the issues presented by these applications. I leave for later a more detailed examination and discussion of the provisions of s. 52 which relate to the delivery of the disclosure statement and any material amendments to the disclosure statement.

The agreed facts

The purchasers entered into their agreements of purchase and sale with the respondent between March 29, 1988 and November 25, 1988. Each agreement includes six schedules and contains 24 pages. Schedule D, entitled "General Terms and Conditions", has 16 pages and contains detailed information, inter alia, about the mortgage to be given or assumed by the purchaser, adjustments and other payments, the date of closing, the terms of interim occupancy, default, and the purchaser's and vendor's covenants. Each agreement provided that it "shall be completed on or before the 30th day of November, 1989, or such other date as provided for in paragraph 5 of Schedule 'D'", which provides for interim occupancy prior to final closing.

Each agreement required that the purchaser pay a deposit, by way of instalments, which totals about 25 per cent of the purchase price. Most of the purchasers have paid their entire deposit except for those who are in default of the occupancy closing. Although each agreement provided for a closing date of November 30, 1989, none of the units was ready for occupancy until almost one year later. The earliest date when any of the units was sufficiently completed to permit occupancy was November 23, 1990. Each purchaser who participated in an occupancy closing received an interim statement of adjustments which credited the purchaser with deposits paid to the date of occupancy closing, the amount of the first mortgage assumed by the purchaser and required the purchaser to pay, by way of the final instalment of the deposit, the balance of the purchase price.

Each interim statement of adjustments contained the amount of the occupancy fee to be paid by the purchaser between the date of the occupancy closing and the date of the final closing and said to represent "occupancy fees pursuant to paragraph 6(a) of Schedule 'D' of the Agreement of Purchase and Sale". By way of example, the following is the monthly occupancy fee calculation contained in the interim statement of adjustments of the applicant Richard Greene:

OCCUPANCY FEE Comprised of:

Interest on First Mortgage @ 13.25% per annum $1,754.80

Common Expenses 174.36

Estimated Taxes 211.90

I have reproduced this example because it will be of assistance when I consider the third issue raised by these applications -- the proper rate of interest which the Act permits the respondent to charge each purchaser in respect to the mortgage interest rate component of the occupancy fee. In this regard it is significant that the interest rate charged the purchasers varies from 11.75 per cent per annum to 13.25 per cent per annum. In the case of three purchasers arrangements were made with the respondent to charge an interest rate of 9.75 per cent per annum. I also note that each interim statement of adjustments contains the total amount of the deposits paid by each purchaser which is relevant to the fourth issue to be decided -- the "prescribed rate" of interest which the respondent is required to pay to each purchaser in respect to his or her deposit.

There are significant variations in respect to the status of the various applicants at the present time. The 25 applicants, either jointly or individually, entered into 14 agreements of purchase and sale. Occupancy closings did not take place in respect to four of the units which remain unoccupied and in respect to which no occupancy fees are being paid. Four other units remain empty, with occupancy fees being paid in respect to two and occupancy fees being paid, but not cashed, in respect to the other two. Three units are occupied by the purchasers or members of their family and occupancy fees are being paid. The three remaining units have been leased from time to time by their purchasers who are paying the occupancy fees. However, the total deposit due has not been paid in respect to one of these units. As of December 5, 1991, registration under the Condominium Act had not occurred and, therefore, no date had been set for the final closing of any of the purchases.

Upon signing the agreement of purchase and sale each purchaser received from the respondent a bound booklet entitled "The Breakers" which contained the disclosure statement and the other materials required by s. 32 of Reg. 121. The booklet is comprised of approximately 86 pages, seven of which contain the disclosure statement. The purchasers have not received a revised or amended disclosure statement. The disclosure statement advised the purchasers that the condominium would have as amenities a recreational unit, which included, inter alia, an indoor swimming pool and an exercise room, and an outdoor play area including children's play facilities. It stated that construction of the amenities would begin in October 1988 and would be completed by December 1990. An occupancy permit for the pool was not issued until July 26, 1991 and as of September 16, 1991, the children's play area had not been completed.

At the time the purchasers entered into their agreements of purchase and sale no construction liens had been registered against the property. After February 2, 1989, 42 notices of construction lien and 14 certificates of action were registered. At present, 15 notices of construction lien and 13 certificates of action are still registered against the property. The liens range in amount from $1,396 to approximately $2,100,000. The latter amount represents the total of two liens registered on June 21, 1991 and August 22, 1991 by the general contractor for the project, Atlas-Gest Inc. (formerly Jatlas Inc.) which was dismissed by the respondent in the early summer of 1991.

Additional facts

Michael R. Ryan, the director of marketing for the respondent, provided evidence by way of an affidavit upon which he was cross-examined. His evidence is uncontradicted that it was the respondent's belief that occupancy of the condominium units would be available by November 30, 1989, but due to matters outside of its control the respondent was unable to meet this date. The causes of the delay were labour disputes, material shortages, a severe lack of available labour and delays imposed by the Town of Ajax in which the project is situated. The respondent kept the purchasers informed of the delays through correspondence and through meetings. He stated that as of September 16, 1991, the project was substantially completed, except for final landscaping, the recreational area and the children's play area. He pointed out that he understood that no children live in the building. As for the recreation unit, the exercise room is complete except for decorating and installing the equipment.

Mr. Ryan said that all deposits paid by the purchasers have been deposited in trust with the Montreal Trust Company and amount to $2,580,117.46. He said that the respondent is aware of its obligations under the agreements of purchase and sale in respect to the deposits and will provide the purchasers with the appropriate credit in their statement of adjustments on the final closing, which he stated is standard procedure in the condominium industry. Similarly, on final closing the respondent will make any necessary adjustments in regard to the mortgage interest rate component of the occupancy fees. In this regard, Mr. Ryan conceded that two of the purchasers -- Gatt and Peirce -- were charged slightly higher interest rates than they should have been charged. In his affidavit Mr. Ryan provided considerable information about most of the purchasers. As well, counsel for the respondent examined one or more of the purchasers involved in each of the transactions. There is no need to review in any detail the information about the various purchasers which constitutes a significant portion of the record on the applications. It is sufficient to note that an analysis of the evidence indicates that none of the purchasers registered any complaint about any apparent deficiency in the disclosure statement and the material which accompanied it during the ten-day period provided by s. 52(2) of the Act for rescinding the agreement of purchase and sale. Most of the purchasers gave the disclosure statements to their lawyers to be reviewed by them. As well, the evidence shows that the circumstances of many of the purchasers have changed since they signed their contracts to purchase their condominiums. For example, some of the purchasers have obtained employment elsewhere in Ontario and in the United States and other purchasers have financial problems. Several of the purchasers say there are deficiencies in the construction of their units. Two of the purchasers, who appear to be speculators, are unhappy about the downturn in the real estate market. One of the purchasers remarried. Indeed, when he was cross-examined on his affidavit, one of the applicants, Roger Maslen, stated that the applicants wanted to get out of their deals because their lives had changed and the delays in constructing their condominiums had "messed up" their lives. He said that the disclosure statement was of no importance to any of the applicants other than to see if it had some flaw in it so that they could get out of their contracts.

The disclosure statement and amended disclosure statement issues

Because these issues are closely related it is convenient to deal with them together. Briefly stated, the position of counsel for the applicants is that because the contents of the disclosure statement which the respondent delivered to the applicants do not comply with the requirements of s. 52(6) and (7) of the Act, it is not a disclosure statement for the purposes of s. 52(1), with the result that the agreements of purchase and sale which the applicants signed are not binding upon them. As well, counsel for the applicants submits that the agreements of purchase and sale are not binding on the applicants because events have occurred subsequent to the delivery of the disclosure statement which require the respondent to deliver a material amendment to the disclosure statement and the respondent has not done so.

Counsel have directed my attention to three cases in which s. 52 has been considered. The first, a decision of the Court of Appeal, is Brunott v. Coolmur Properties Ltd., Brooke, Weatherston and Thorson J.J.A., October 24, 1983 [summarized at 22 A.C.W.S. (2d) 509], in which it was held, in the circumstances of that case, that there was not a binding agreement of purchase and sale because the disclosure statement did not meet the requirements of s. 52. In order to properly understand the brief endorsement of Brooke J.A., on behalf of the Court of Appeal, which is set out below, it is necessary to review the case in some detail. I am able to do so because counsel for the applicants has provided me with copies of the appeal book and the statements of the appellants and the respondent.

The appellants were purchasers of three condominium units and sought an order pursuant to Rule 612 of the former Rules of Practice, R.R.O. 1980, Reg. 540, "for a declaration that the agreements of purchase and sale which the applicants entered into with the respondent are not binding on them, because the respondent failed to comply with s. 52 of the Condominium Act by delivering a disclosure statement containing all the matters specified in the Condominium Act". The evidence presented by the appellants consisted of the disclosure statement given to them by the vendor when they entered into their respective agreements of purchase and sale together with copies of the materials listed in s. 32 of Reg. 121. The respondent vendor contested the motion on the ground that the appellants purchased the condominiums not for residential purposes but for commercial purposes, that they were represented by their own lawyers, and that they made no complaint about the insufficiency of the disclosure statement until more than 18 months after they entered into their agreements of purchase and sale. As well, the respondent vendor provided an explanation for the several deficiencies which the appellant purchasers identified in the disclosure statement and the other documents which, it would seem, was intended to establish that the information constituted sufficient compliance with s. 52 under the circumstances existing when the disclosure statement was prepared.

Southey J. dismissed the motion on the ground that the facts relevant to the disposition of the motion were not undisputed. He saw as an unresolved factual issue necessary to the determination of the motion, whether or not the appellants had entered into the agreements of purchase and sale for residential purposes. In this regard Southey J. held: "I do not think the point should be dealt with in a motion under Rule 612, where it appears to me from the material that has been filed by the respondent that there is or may be an issue as to whether the agreements of purchase and sale were entered into in respect of units for residential purposes". If the applicants had not purchased the units "for residential purposes", there would be no obligation on the part of the developer under s. 52(1) to deliver a disclosure statement.

The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal of the appellant purchasers for the following reasons endorsed on the record by Brooke J.A. on behalf of the court comprised of himself and Weatherston and Thorson J.J.A.:

We are all of the opinion that appeal succeeds. We think Southey J. erred in holding that there was an issue of fact to be determined and so the motion could not proceed under Rule 612. The suggestion of future use purchases is not a material fact when the unit was designated as a residential unit and was purchased as such.

The appellant contends that there was no binding agreement of purchase and sale because no disclosure statement was delivered which meets the requirements of s. 52. We agree, without specifying its failures, that the document was no more than a statement of intention -- a proposed statement that lacked information on specific matters the statute enumerated. It is clear that the purpose of s. 52 is that the purchaser be given this information.

A declaration will go that the agreement of purchase and sale is not binding and the deposit monies should be returned.

From this brief endorsement I have difficulty in determining precisely what issues were decided by the Brunott case. From the record before the Court of Appeal it is clear that the court was satisfied that there was no dispute on the evidence before Southey J. that the units had been purchased as residential units. It is also clear that the court was satisfied that the disclosure statement which it was required to consider did not contain information in respect to the matters which by s. 52(6) and (7) it was required to contain and that the purpose of the disclosure statement is to provide this information for the consideration of residential condominium purchasers. As well, the Court of Appeal was able to determine whether or not the disclosure statement met the requirements of the Act by measuring its contents against the requirements of s. 52(6) and (7). Beyond this, in my view, it would be inappropriate to read more into what the Court of Appeal decided. The court did not specify the deficiencies it found in the disclosure statement. Even though it would appear that the Court of Appeal did not find that the purchaser's delay of 18 months in attacking the contents of the disclosure statement did not provide an impediment to an order declaring that the agreements of purchase and sale were not binding, it would appear from the factums filed by the parties that the attention of the court was not directed to an important issue, which is before me for consideration, and which relates to the issue of delay. Specifically, I am asked to determine the purpose of s. 52(2) of the Condominium Act and the effect of the failure of a purchaser to challenge the sufficiency of a disclosure statement during the ten-day cooling-off period provided by that subsection in respect to the binding effect of an agreement of purchase and sale on a purchaser as provided by s. 52(1). In a more general sense, I am asked by the respondent to place a construction on the Condominium Act which prevents a purchaser from attacking the sufficiency of a disclosure statement at any time after the ten-day period contained in s. 52(2) for the exclusive purpose of avoiding an agreement of purchase and sale. In this regard it is significant that s. 52(5) of the Act was not brought to the attention of the Court of Appeal. Nor was the court asked to consider whether it was the intention of the legislature in enacting s. 52, and related sections, to enable a purchaser to avoid his or her contract of purchase and sale at any time up to the date of final closing on the basis of flaws in the disclosure statement. From my reading of the Brunott case I have, with respect, reached the conclusion that, to the extent that the case may be interpreted as having decided these issues, the decision of the court was given per incuriam and that, therefore, it may be distinguished on this basis and that it is open to this court to consider the effect of s. 52(5) in interpreting s. 52 and the intention of the legislature in the enactment of s. 52.

In Benner v. HLS York Developments Ltd. (1985), 52 O.R. (2d) 243, 21 D.L.R. (4th) 652 (H.C.J.), the plaintiff, who had agreed to purchase a residential condominium unit from the defendant, decided not to complete the transaction and brought an action for a declaration that the agreement of purchase and sale was not binding upon him and for the return of his deposit on the ground that the disclosure statement did not comply with the provisions of s. 52(6) and (7) of the Act. Carruthers J. acknowledged that the Brunott case decided that where a disclosure statement does not comply with s. 52 a purchaser is not bound by the agreement of purchase and sale and it is not enforceable against the purchaser who is entitled to a return of his or her deposit. However, he found, in the circumstances of the case that the disclosure statement substantially complied with s. 52.

The following passage from the reasons for judgment of Carruthers J. at pp. 246-47 O.R., p. 655 D.L.R., is relevant to this application:

The Condominium Act provides that a person in the position of Maynard, that is, one who has agreed to purchase a residential condominium unit, may rescind such an agreement 10 days after receiving the disclosure statement. The effect of this provision of the Act is that the agreement is not firm until this 10-day period has elapsed. As well, and of greater significance here, is that this right to rescind remains outstanding until the vendor provides a disclosure statement which complies with the provisions of the Act. Accordingly, as I have noted above, in the absence of such a disclosure statement, Maynard can elect to rescind the agreement at any time. The fact that he did not purport to do so within 10 days of his receipt of a form of disclosure statement offered by the defendant, as is the case here, is of no moment. If a disclosure statement is found wanting so that, in effect, it is not a disclosure statement as required by the provisions of the Condominium Act, then a purchaser is at no time required to complete the transaction in connection with which it has been given.

In deciding whether a proffered disclosure statement complies with the provisions of s. 52, the court is to employ an objective standard. As counsel for Maynard said in argument, that standard is what a reasonable man in an Ontario community would think about its sufficiency. The person to whom it is given has to be able to determine what are the essential elements of what he has agreed to purchase, as the Condominium Act requires them to be given. The purpose of the relevant provisions of the Condominium Act is to permit the purchaser to be able to make an informed decision as to whether to elect to rescind or affirm the outstanding agreement of purchase and sale. In my opinion, the sufficiency or otherwise of a disclosure statement must, as well, be judged on the basis of the materiality of its content. The absence of something not material should not, in itself, in my opinion, permit a purchaser to avoid the completion of an otherwise enforceable agreement of purchase and sale. The Court of Appeal in Brunott did not touch upon the matter of materiality. I have read into the reasons of that court, which are handwritten and short, that the "failures" referred to therein, but not specified, were "information on specific matters" which were material to the purchaser's position allowed for under the Act. I cannot think that the Court of Appeal in Brunott intended that a purchaser be able to avoid an otherwise enforceable agreement only because immaterial information was not provided to the purchaser. To my mind, the provisions of s. 52(5) appear to support this position.

To the extent that the first paragraph from the reasons for judgment of Carruthers J. can be said to be essential to the result which he reached and not, therefore, obiter dictum, for reasons to be explained, I am, with respect, unable to agree in its entirety with the construction which he placed on the Condominium Act. In particular, I am unable to agree that it is "of no moment" that a purchaser who does not decide to rescind an agreement of purchase and sale within the ten days provided by s. 52(2) may do so at any time before the closing date if it is found that the disclosure statement is at variance with the requirements of the Act. If this were so, s. 52(2) would have no meaning and until the date of the final closing a condominium developer would remain at risk that at any time after the ten-day period a purchaser could attack the sufficiency of a disclosure statement and, if successful, obtain a declaration that the agreement of purchase and sale was not binding on the purchaser.

The third case, Abdool v. Somerset Place Developments of Georgetown Ltd. (1991), 4 O.R. (3d) 280, 82 D.L.R. (4th) 50 (Gen. Div.), which is at present under appeal, was also an application by a number of condominium purchasers for a declaration that their respective agreements of purchase and sale were not binding because the disclosure statement did not comply with s. 52 of the Condominium Act. I infer from the reasons for judgment of Blenus Wright J. that when the purchasers entered into their agreements of purchase and sale in 1988 they received a copy of the disclosure statement and none of them complained about any deficiencies in it. The agreements provided for occupancy possession in September 1989. However, occupancy was not available until February 1990 and, even then, the project had not been fully completed. This was because the developer suffered cash flow problems and ultimately lost possession of the property to the first mortgagee.

Wright J. discussed the legislation applicable to disclosure statements and at p. 285 O.R., p. 54 D.L.R., observed that if the declarant fails to comply with s. 52(1) "there does not appear to be any time limit in which to declare an agreement of purchase and sale not binding on the grounds that the disclosure statement is inadequate as long as the purchaser has not become the owner of a unit". In reaching this view it would appear that he was in agreement with the views expressed by Brooke J.A. in the Brunott case and Carruthers J. in the Benner case. However, it would appear that, as in the Brunott case, Wright J. did not take into consideration the effect of s. 52(5) in his interpretation of s. 52(1) and, accordingly, I would on this basis distinguish the decision reached in the Abdool case.

At pp. 284 and 288 O.R., pp. 54 and 57-58 D.L.R., Wright J. described the purpose of the disclosure statement as follows:

Although condominiums have been in existence for a number of years, to a first time buyer the condominium concept of ownership is completely new. It is considerably different from, and foreign to, house ownership. The purpose of a disclosure statement is to summarize and highlight for a purchaser the important matters contained in the declaration, by-laws and rules so that a purchaser receives the pertinent information upon which to make an informed decision whether to purchase.

I suggest that a first time condominium purchaser has three main concerns:

- (1) Am I getting everything that I am paying for?
- (2) What are my rights and responsibilities as a condominium owner?
- (3) How much will it cost to live in this condominium complex?

In my view, a disclosure statement should provide a purchaser with the information which will provide reasonably satisfactory answers to those three concerns.

Wright J., after analyzing the disclosure statement, concluded that it was deficient in many aspects as its contents did not comply fully with the requirements of s. 52(6) and (7). He also concluded that the declarant had failed to provide the purchasers with material amendments to the disclosure statement. In the result, he held that the agreements of purchase and sale were not binding on the purchasers and he ordered that all deposit monies paid by the purchasers were to be refunded.

Although Wright J. provided a thorough and lengthy analysis of what he identified as deficient in the disclosure statement, in the view which I hold of these applications it is unnecessary to review this part of his reasons. However, there is another aspect of his reasons which it is necessary to consider.

Wright J. discussed the language of s. 52(1) and (2) which requires that the developer provide the purchaser with "all material amendments" to the disclosure statement. The phrase "material amendments" is not defined in the Act. At p. 293 O.R., p. 62 D.L.R., Wright J. provided the following definition:

A "material" amendment is an amendment containing information which would provide a purchaser with a reasonable cause to reconsider whether to confirm the agreement of purchase and sale or to rescind.

He noted that the disclosure statement provided that the recreational facilities were to be completed by September 1989, and that failure to complete the facilities by that date was "material information" which placed the developer under an obligation to make a material amendment to the disclosure statement and that its failure to do so constituted non-compliance with s. 52(1).

A second material change requiring an amendment occurs in s. 52(7)(g). It requires that the budget statement shall set out "the status of any pending lawsuits material to the property of which the declarant or proposed declarant has actual knowledge". In this case, there were a number of liens registered against the lands by tradesmen and suppliers who were not being paid. The main contractor vacated the site in April 1990, filed a lien, and commenced an action against the developer for a substantial amount. Such matters of pending lawsuits seem clearly to be "material to the property". In my view, such information is crucial in order for a purchaser to make a decision to purchase. That information fits in with one of the main concerns of a purchaser: how much will it cost to live in the condominium building? If there are substantial pending lawsuits, a purchaser should be informed in order to be able to seek advice whether those pending lawsuits will add any costs to the monthly expenses, and if so, how much. In the case of this project, the information of pending lawsuits would have put purchasers on notice that this project was in financial difficulty, which, at least, would have provided them with an opportunity to determine whether they wished to rescind their agreements. In my view, such information is within the category of "material amendments" to the disclosure statement which should have been provided to the purchasers. Otherwise, subs. 52(1) and 7(g) are meaningless and the consumer protection atmosphere which pervades the Condominium Act is illusory.

Although I agree with the conclusions of Wright J. concerning the purpose of a disclosure statement, I respectfully disagree with his view that no time limit applies to when a declaration may be ordered that an agreement of purchase and sale is not binding on a purchaser because the disclosure statement does not comply with the requirements of the Act. As well, I am unable to agree entirely with his approach to the issue of material amendments to the disclosure statement.

Discussion

It is my view that a consideration of s. 52 and related sections of the Condominium Act does not result in the construction of the Act urged by counsel for the applicants and reached in the Abdool case. Section 52 is a consumer protection provision and requires that a purchaser receive a disclosure statement. If none is received, s. 52(1) says that an agreement of purchase and sale is not binding on the purchaser -- although it remains binding on the vendor. The purpose of the disclosure statement is to inform the purchaser about what he or she is buying, its costs, and the extensive and detailed rights and obligations inherent in condominium ownership and living. A second protection for the consumer is provided by s. 52(2) which allows a purchaser to rescind an agreement to purchase, without any obligation to provide reasons for doing so, within ten days of the receipt of a disclosure statement. Ten days is a relatively lengthy period. It is, no doubt, so as it is intended to give a purchaser a sufficient opportunity to review the lengthy disclosure materials, and to do so with an adviser such as a lawyer or an accountant, as the purchasers did in this case. A third protection is given to the purchaser under s. 52(2) which revives the ten-day rescission period upon delivery to the purchaser of a material amendment to the disclosure statement. A fourth protection is contained in s. 52(1) which provides that if a material amendment to the disclosure statement is not delivered to the purchaser, the agreement of purchase and sale is not binding upon the purchaser. A fifth protection for the purchaser is found in s. 52(5) which gives the purchaser a remedy in damages against the vendor for any false or misleading information in the disclosure statement or in any material amendment to it. The provisions of s. 52(5) are central to my construction of s. 52.

In my opinion, when read as a whole the provisions of s. 52 do not entitle a purchaser to walk away from an agreement to purchase a condominium unit at any time before final closing on discovering that the contents of a disclosure statement do not comply with s. 52(6) and (7). Nor, in my view, was it the intention of the legislature that there should be this result. Either the vendor will deliver a disclosure statement or the vendor will not deliver one. If none is delivered the purchaser, by s. 52(1), is entitled to avoid the binding effect of the agreement of purchase and sale -- which is a contract -- or the purchaser may waive the failure to deliver the disclosure statement and enforce the contract against the vendor. If a disclosure statement is delivered, s. 52(2) gives the purchaser ten days to examine it and, if for any reason the purchaser is dissatisfied, including the failure of the statement to comply with s. 52(6) and (7) in regard to its contents, the purchaser is at liberty to rescind the contract and pursuant to s. 52(4) receive a refund of any deposit. However, if a purchaser fails to exercise the right to rescind the agreement of purchase and sale it is binding on the purchaser and the purchaser must be taken to have accepted the disclosure statement. Should the purchaser subsequently discover that the disclosure statement "contains any material statement or information that is false, deceptive or misleading or fails to contain any material statement or information" (emphasis added), the purchaser's remedy is for damages against the vendor as provided by s. 52(5) and not by way of a declaration that the agreement of purchase and sale is not binding. A similar construction applies with respect to the non-delivery or delivery of an amended disclosure statement. Any other interpretation would render s. 52(2) and s. 52(5) meaningless.

It is important not to lose sight of the fact that each purchaser has entered into a contract with the respondent developer to purchase the unit and that the reason why the purchaser seeks to avoid the contract has little, if anything, to do with any deficiencies on the part of the developer in its performance of the contract. Until these applications were brought, no purchaser complained about any alleged deficiency in the disclosure statement even though the Act gave him or her a ten-day period to do so. It is clear that the purchasers now take a highly technical position in an attempt to avoid their contractual obligations and do so, for the most part, because of an adverse change in economic conditions, or because of changes personal to themselves, which have occurred since they entered into their contracts. Indeed, even if at the time of final closing there exist any deficiencies in the construction of the unit or the common elements, it is unlikely that the purchaser would be able to walk away from his or her contract to purchase the unit. The purchaser's remedy would likely be found in an abatement of the purchase price or he or she may be entitled to damages for the deficiency. But on substantial performance of the building contract by the developer, the purchaser loses the right to withhold the contract price. See, e.g., Miller v. Advanced Farming Systems Ltd., [1969] S.C.R. 845, 5 D.L.R. (3d) 369.

The purchasers have not, of course, suggested that the contracts which they signed to purchase the condominium units were in any way unconscionable. However, it is my view that, if I accept the interpretation of the Condominium Act advanced by their counsel, it would produce an unconscionable result not only in respect to the respondent, but also in respect to the condominium industry which, in turn, would produce adverse economic consequences. If the legislation is interpreted as permitting a purchaser, at any time after the ten-day period for examining the disclosure statement and until the time of final closing, to raise alleged deficiencies in the disclosure statement and thereby avoid his or her contractual obligations, this would result in a harsh and oppressive burden on the condominium industry. The fact that a particular construction of a statute leads to an unreasonable and unintended result is a relevant consideration in the construction of the statute. The more unreasonable the result of the construction of a statute the more unlikely it is that the legislature can have intended it. If the result was intended, the more necessary it is that the legislature be required to make its intention abundantly clear. In interpreting legislation the court should avoid unreasonable and unfair results and, in the context of this application, grotesque consequences. See Elmer A. Driedger, The Construction of Statutes, 2nd ed. (Toronto: Butterworths, 1983), pp. 28 et seq.

This is not a case in which the court is required to interpret particular language in a statute which is said to be vague or ambiguous. What is required in this case is to interpret a statutory scheme and to determine whether it was the intention of the legislature, in effect, to extend the ten-day period within which a purchaser is entitled to rescind an agreement of purchase and sale to the date of the final closing. Generally speaking, the court will not interpret a statute in a manner where its language does not compel such an interpretation. While the likelihood of an unreasonable result has the power to limit the language of a statute, it does not contain the power to extend the language. To extend the operation of the Condominium Act to effect the result urged by counsel for the applicants would, acknowledging the consumer protection features of the Act, produce a result both unreasonable and unfair. A condominium developer should be entitled to rely on any failure by a purchaser to complain during the ten-day period provided by s. 52(2) as an acceptance by the purchaser of the contents of the disclosure statement. To interpret the Act differently would result in substantial uncertainty, inconvenience and expense if a developer, at any time up to the final closing, could be faced with the task of defending the sufficiency of its disclosure statement, not to mention the disastrous economic consequences which would result if contracts, otherwise binding, were to become unenforceable against purchasers because a word-by-word examination of the disclosure statement results in a finding of technical non-compliance with the requirements of the Act. As well, a purchaser, having taken advantage of the ten-day period to examine the disclosure statement provided by s. 52(2), should not be permitted to lie back and wait to see what the future may hold in store before deciding whether or not to try to avoid his or her agreement of purchase and sale based on deficiencies in it, perhaps discovered during the ten-day examination period. In my view, the intention of the legislature in enacting s. 52(1) and (2) was not to create this type of trap for condominium developers.

I cannot underscore enough the significance of the remedy for damages provided by s. 52(5) in the construction which I have placed on s. 52 and in interpreting the intention of the legislature in enacting s. 52. Both s. 52(5) and s. 55 [am. 1989, c. 72, s. 26], which makes it an offence to knowingly contravene s. 52(6) and (7), provide adequate protection to a purchaser to ensure that a developer, in the preparation of a disclosure statement or a material amendment thereto, will comply with the requirements of the Act. I refer to this in support of my opinion that it was not the intention of the legislature that a purchaser should be able to avoid the completion of an otherwise enforceable contract because many months after he or she has received a disclosure statement, and having raised no objection to its contents during the ten-day period provided for this purpose, the disclosure statement is placed under a microscope for the sole purpose of attempting to avoid completion of the contract.

I have been assisted in the construction which I have placed on the Act by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Albrecht v. Opemoco Inc. (1991), 5 O.R. (3d) 385, 85 D.L.R. (4th) 289. This is the case which considered the validity of "phantom mortgages" intended to satisfy the requirements of s. 51(6) para. 1 of the Act to enable condominium developers to charge purchasers of residential condominiums who take possession of their unit before final closing a monthly occupancy fee that includes a mortgage interest component in transactions in which the purchaser does not intend to assume or give back a mortgage on final closing.

From my reading of the reasons for judgment of the Court of Appeal delivered by Robins J.A., it is clear that in interpreting the Act it is important not to lose sight of the fact that there is a contract in existence between vendor and purchaser and that the court should not read into the Act language which it does not contain. It is, as well, important to strike a balance between the consumer protection policies of the Act and the commercial realities which apply to residential condominium transactions. In my view, what Robins J.A. stated at p. 402 O.R. applies to the approach to be taken in interpreting s. 52:

In my respectful view, the obligation of the purchasers to give back a phantom mortgage pursuant to their agreements of purchase and sale constitutes a valid contractual obligation for the purpose of s. 51(6) para. 1. I would not view this obligation as being precluded by or in contravention of the Act. It results in the purchasers being placed in effectively the same position they would be in were possession and final closings contemporaneous. It, furthermore, establishes an occupancy fee that is equitable from the standpoint of both the purchasers and the vendors. In sum, the phantom mortgage concept invoked in these cases, in my view, is consistent with the intended purpose and effect of the section. To conclude otherwise in the circumstances of these cases, and limit the occupancy fee to estimated realty taxes and common expenses only, would be to confer a windfall on these purchasers. This is a result which runs counter to their expectations on entering into the agreements of purchase and sale in question, and one which, in my opinion, is not mandated by s. 51(6).

In reaching this conclusion, I am not unmindful of the artificiality of the phantom mortgage concept or the contention that to sanction it is to permit form to outweigh substance. Nonetheless, for the reasons I have stated, the concept satisfies the requirements of the Act. Moreover, it makes s. 51(6) para. 1 equally applicable to all classes of purchasers, and achieves a fair and equitable result. If this concept were contrary to the consumer protection purpose underlying the section or violative of the spirit of the Act, I think it can fairly be said that, given its wide use over the past decade, one would have expected that the government ministry responsible for the administration of the Act would long since have intervened and caused steps to be taken to protect the numerous condominium purchasers in this province whose interim occupancy rental has been set by reference to phantom mortgages the same as, or comparable to, those in issue here.

On the basis of the interpretation which I have placed on s. 52, it is unnecessary to determine whether or not the disclosure statement contains the deficiencies alleged by counsel for the applicants. Obviously each of the purchasers received a disclosure statement from the respondent and they cannot, therefore, rely on s. 52(1) to avoid the binding effect of the agreement of purchase and sale which each of them signed. If indeed there are deficiencies in the disclosure statement and s. 52(5) applies, the purchasers will not be without a remedy.

I must now deal with the related issue of whether the respondent is in default of its requirement to deliver to the purchasers material amendments to the disclosure statement. It is the position of counsel for the applicants that two events occurred which are material and, therefore, required the respondent to deliver amended disclosure statements:

(1) the delay in the anticipated date of completion of the amenities stated in the disclosure statement;

(2) the registration of numerous notices of construction liens and certificates of action registered against the property, the disclosure of which counsel submits is required by s. 52(7)(g).

Counsel for the applicants submits that failure by the respondent to deliver the amended disclosure statements entitles the purchasers to a declaration by virtue of s. 52(1) that the agreements of purchase and sale are not binding on them.

The Act provides no definition of "material amendment". Nor does it prescribe when the developer is required to deliver a material amendment to the disclosure statement to the purchaser. By way of comparison I note that the Securities Act provides for the filing of an amendment to a prospectus where a "material change" occurs and provides a definition of "material change" as well as a period of time in which the amendment must be filed: ss. 1(1) para. 21 and 56(1). Wright J. provided a definition of "material amendment" in the Abdool case, supra, at p. 293 O.R., which can be found at p. 274, supra, of my reasons. He also concluded that events similar to those relied on by the applicants in this case were "material" for the purpose of s. 52(1) and, therefore, required the delivery of an amended disclosure statement. In my respectful view, the definition of a "material amendment" found in the Abdool case is not helpful because, although it provides a definition of "material", it fails to consider the meaning of "amendment" and would appear to consider amendment as synonymous with a change in circumstances. The relevant language of s. 52(1) is "disclosure statement and all material amendments thereto". Therefore, s. 52(1) requires the developer to provide the purchaser with any amendment to the disclosure statement which is material. In legal proceedings amendments are frequently made to pleadings and indictments. In Osborn's Concise Law Dictionary, 7th ed. (1983), "amendment" is defined as the "correction of some error or omission, or the curing of some defect, in judicial proceedings". In Webster's New World Dictionary, 2nd ed. (1978), "amendment" is defined as a "correction of errors, faults, etc.". In the Shorter Oxford English Dictionary, "material" is defined in this way: "Law, etc. Of such significance as to be likely to influence the determination of cause, to alter the character of an instrument, etc.". Therefore, in my view, an amendment to a disclosure statement is required when it is necessary to correct an error, omission or defect in the contents of the statement prescribed by s. 52(6) and (7) where the amendment is of such significance as to be likely to influence the decision of a reasonable purchaser to purchase the condominium unit or to alter the character of the disclosure statement.

It is my view that the change in the anticipated date for the completion of the amenities does not constitute a material amendment. Delays in the construction of a condominium complex are not unusual and occur for many reasons and to require a developer to deliver an amended disclosure statement with each change in the construction schedule for the amenities, thereby reviving the purchaser's right to rescind the contract, is not what is intended by the Act. There is no evidence to suggest that any of the applicants has suffered any economic loss as a result of the delay in completing the amenities nor is there any evidence that this delay has had any adverse effect on the value of what they have agreed to purchase and, therefore, cannot be said to be likely to influence the decision of a purchaser to purchase the condominium unit. In any event, there is no evidence to suggest that at the time the disclosure statement was prepared there was any error or defect in the scheduled date for the completion of the amenities.

I am of the same opinion with respect to the registration of the notices of construction liens and certificates of action. There is no evidence that they have had any adverse effect on the value of what the purchasers have agreed to buy or that any purchaser has been caused any economic loss as a result of their registration. It may be that a construction lien action comes within the disclosure requirement of s. 52(7) (g) and is therefore capable of requiring the delivery of a material amendment to a disclosure statement in the appropriate circumstances. However, the facts surrounding the action will be important. There is a big difference between a $2,000 lien and a $2,000,000 lien and, as we have seen in this case, many lien claims have already been resolved and removed from title. Although it may be that at a future time the status of the claim made by Atlas-Gest Inc. against the respondent may require a material amendment to the disclosure statement, I am not persuaded that the time has been reached. The Act, as I have stated, does not say when the developer is obliged to inform a purchaser of an amendment to a disclosure statement. As well, it would be unreasonable and contrary to commercial reality to require that a developer deliver an amendment at the time of registration of each construction lien, whether or not it is ultimately enforceable, vacated and regardless of the amount involved. In this case it would have required the developer to deliver 47 amended disclosure statements in regard to liens ranging from about $1,400 to $1,300,000, thereby giving the purchasers 47 opportunities to rescind their contracts. I would add that there is no evidence to suggest that at the time of its preparation the disclosure statement contained any errors or omissions in respect to the requirements of s. 52(7)(g) requiring its amendment.

Accordingly, I would resolve the first two issues in this way. There is no need to determine whether or not the disclosure statement complies with s. 52(6) and (7) of the Act. The respondent is not in default of s. 52(1) and (2) in failing to deliver amendments to the disclosure statement.

The mortgage interest rate component of the occupancy fee issue

As I explained and illustrated on p. 265, supra, the interim statement of adjustments of each applicant who participated in the occupancy closing of his or her condominium unit contained the monthly occupancy fee for that unit, one component of which was the interest on the first mortgage on the condominium. The annual interest rate charged the various applicants ranged from 11.75 per cent to 13.25 per cent, except for three applicants who made arrangements with the respondent to pay interest at the rate of 9.75 per cent during the occupancy period. It is the position of those applicants, except for the three who have made special arrangements, that the interest rate that was used to calculate the mortgage interest component exceeds the interest rate permitted by s. 51(6) para. 1 of the Act, which places a ceiling on the interest rate on the basis of the monthly interest that the purchaser would have paid during the occupancy period under a mortgage to be assumed or given back under the agreement of purchase and sale. Paragraph 1(a) of Schedule D to the agreement of purchase and sale signed by each purchaser prescribes the interest rate which the purchaser will be required to pay for a one-year mortgage which the purchaser assumes or gives back. As well, para. 6(a) of Schedule D provides that the interest rate to be used in calculating the mortgage interest rate component of the occupancy fee will be "the rate charged by the Royal Bank of Canada for two (2) year residential mortgages within thirty (30) days prior to the Occupancy Date". Some of the applicants were charged an interest rate higher than the applicable Royal Bank of Canada two-year residential mortgage rate.

In my view, there is no need to make a determination in respect to this issue at this time. It may be, as counsel for the respondent concedes, that some of the applicants are presently being charged a mortgage interest rate component in excess of what the agreement of purchase and sale permits. In any event, it is really not until the time of final closing that the ceiling set by s. 51(6) para. 1 of the Act can be determined. There will be no difficulty in doing so at that time and there is no need to interpret any provision in the Act or the agreement of purchase and sale to calculate the appropriate interest rate. Counsel for the respondent has undertaken that any necessary adjustment in respect to the mortgage interest rate component of the occupancy fee will appear in the statement of adjustments provided to each purchaser on the final closing. Should there be any problem at that time, which is the proper time to deal with this issue, no doubt any purchaser so affected will seek the appropriate remedy.

The deposit interest rate issue

Paragraph 3 of each agreement of purchase and sale reads as follows:

The Vendor agrees to pay to the Purchaser interest on the deposits from the date the aggregate deposits paid by the Purchaser equal or exceed 15% of the Purchase Price at the rate prescribed under Section 53(3) of the Condominium Act, with such interest to be credited to the Purchaser on the Closing Date or any extensions thereof.

Each purchaser has paid deposits which exceed 15 per cent of the purchase price of his or her unit and, as indicated earlier, most purchasers have completed the occupancy closing of their units. The respondent has placed the deposits in trust accounts with the Montreal Trust Company.

This issue concerns the rate of interest which the respondent is required to pay to the purchasers in respect to their deposits under the terms of the agreement and s. 53 of the Act and s. 33 of Reg. 121 which can be found on pp. 261 and 262, supra, of these reasons for judgment. Section 53(3) requires that the respondent "shall pay interest at the prescribed rate on all money received . . . on account of the purchase price from the day the purchaser enters into possession or occupation until the day a deed or transfer acceptable for registration is delivered" to the purchaser. The "prescribed rate" of interest is defined by s. 33 of Reg. 121 as 1 per cent per annum below the rate of interest paid on the Province of Ontario Savings Office "savings accounts". Pursuant to s. 53(4) the respondent is entitled to keep any interest earned on the deposit monies over and above the "prescribed rate" of interest.

The dispute between the applicants and the respondent is with respect to the interpretation of s. 33 of the regulation, which came into force in 1980. In 1980 the Province of Ontario Savings Office had only one type of savings account. Since 1987 it has had three types of savings accounts -- regular, Trillium in which the amount on deposit is less than $5,000, and Trillium in which the amount on deposit exceeds $5,000. The regular and Trillium under $5,000 savings accounts each paid the same rate of interest as of April 1, 1991, and the interest rate of the Trillium over $5,000 account was 1.50 per cent per annum higher. Because the deposit of each of the applicants exceeds $5,000, their position is that they should receive interest on the basis of the rate paid on the Trillium over $5,000 savings account. The respondent's position is that interest should be based on that paid on the regular savings account as that was the only type of savings account offered by the Province of Ontario Savings Office when s. 33 was enacted in 1980. It is to the advantage of the respondent to pay the purchasers the lower rate of interest on their deposits because under s. 53(4) the respondent is entitled to retain any interest earned on the deposits in excess of the prescribed rate of interest which it must pay to the purchasers. There is no requirement that a developer place the deposit monies in a trust account with the Province of Ontario Savings Office and, therefore, the developer may be able to deposit the monies in a financial institution which pays a higher rate of interest than that paid by the Savings Office.

I appreciate that there is a degree of prematurity to the resolution of this issue as the respondent is not required to credit the purchasers for the interest earned on their deposits until the final closings of their purchases. However, I am quite certain that if this issue is not resolved at this time the parties will be back in court to have s. 33 of the regulation interpreted at a later date. Therefore, I will deal with it at this time. Counsel for the respondent relies on the reasons for judgment of Keenan J. in Ackland v. Yonge-Esplanade Enterprises Ltd., Ont. Gen. Div., delivered on November 6, 1991, in which he interpreted s. 33 of Reg. 121 as requiring the respondent to pay interest on the deposits at the lower rate paid by the Province of Ontario Savings Office on savings accounts. In doing so, Keenan J. observed that when s. 33 was passed in 1980 the Savings Office offered only one type of savings account and when it began to offer the Trillium savings accounts in 1986 s. 33 was not amended to specify what type of savings account would be used to determine the "prescribed rate" of interest which the purchasers were to receive on their deposits. He interpreted the phrase "savings accounts" in s. 33(a) and (b) as meaning "all individual accounts in that category". Keenan J. then applied a rule of statutory interpretation known as contemporanea expositio which requires that a "statute be interpreted in the light of the clear meaning of its wording in the light of the circumstances existing at the time of enactment". He added: "The meaning to be given is the clear meaning that would have been given the day after the statute was passed, unless some subsequent statute has declared that some other construction is to be adopted or has altered the previous statute". Having earlier noted that there was only one savings account in existence when s. 33 was passed, Keenan J. concluded that "the developer was entitled to rely on the absence of any amendment to the regulation as a confirmation that the previously existing measure of the interest rate was to continue". In arriving at this conclusion, Keenan J. relied on the following authorities: Black-Clawson International Ltd. v. Papierwerke Waldhof-Aschaffenburg A-G, [1975] A.C. 591, [1975] 1 All E.R. 810, at pp. 613-14 A.C., p. 814 All E.R.; Sharp v. Wakefield (1888), 22 Q.B.D. 239, 58 L.J.M.C. 57 (C.A.) [aff'd [1891] A.C. 173, [1886-90] All E.R. Rep. 651]; Stamford (Township) v. Welland (County) (1916), 37 O.L.R. 155, 31 D.L.R. 206 (abridged) (C.A.), at p. 182 O.L.R.; and Driedger, Construction of Statutes, supra, at p. 163.

With respect, I am unable to agree with the result reached by Keenan J. for two reasons. First, it is my opinion that the language of s. 33 is plain and unambiguous and produces a different interpretation than that made by Keenan J. Second, because s. 33 is capable of interpretation without the assistance of the doctrine of contemporanea expositio there is no need to have recourse to the doctrine in the interpretation of s. 33. It will be helpful to reproduce s. 33 again:

33. The rate of interest under subsections 53(2) and (3) of the Act on money held in trust under subsection 53(1) of the Act shall,

(a) for the six months immediately following the last day of March of each year, be 1 per cent per annum below the rate paid on The Province of Ontario Savings Office savings accounts on the 1st day of April of that year; and

(b) for the six months immediately following the last day of September of each year, be 1 per cent per annum below the rate paid on The Province of Ontario Savings Office savings accounts on the 1st day of October of that year.

(Emphasis added)

In interpreting s. 33 it is necessary first to have regard to its purpose. Its purpose is to provide a convenient formula for the determination of the rate of interest which a developer must pay to a purchaser on all money received from the purchaser where the agreement of purchase and sale is terminated (s. 53(2) of the Act) or from the time the purchaser enters into possession or occupation of the unit until the date of final closing (s. 53(3) of the Act). It does so by declaring the rate of interest shall be 1 per cent per annum below the rate paid on Province of Ontario Savings Office savings accounts on April 1 and October 1 of each year. By providing for a semi-annual recalculation of interest rates, the legislature has recognized the fact that interest rates do not remain static. By the use of the phrase "savings accounts" the legislature has recognized that financial institutions generally maintain more than one type of savings account. The language of s. 33 speaks to future events. In this regard, s. 4 of the Interpretation Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 219, applies and provides that the "law shall be considered as always speaking and, where a matter or thing is expressed in the present tense, it is to be applied to circumstances as they arise, so that effect may be given to each Act and every part of it according to its true intent and meaning". As worded, s. 33 eliminates the need for frequent amendments to accommodate each change in the types of savings accounts and interest rates offered by the Province of Ontario Savings Office. In my view, it would be unreasonable to assume that, by using the phrase "savings accounts", the legislature intended to restrict the rate of interest to be paid on purchasers' deposits to interest paid on the types of savings accounts offered by the Savings Office in 1980 when s. 33 was passed and to exclude from consideration the savings accounts in existence on April 1 or October 1 of the year in which the rate of interest is to be calculated.

In my opinion, the intent of s. 33 is clear as it is written and there is no need to have recourse to other than its plain and unambiguous language in its interpretation. Thus, s. 33 should be applied in the following manner to calculate the rate of interest which the purchasers will be entitled to receive on their deposits on the date of closing. First, one determines the amount of the deposit paid by the purchaser as of the date he or she assumes occupancy or possession of the unit. In each case, the amount exceeds $5,000. Then one determines the savings account appropriate to the amount of the deposit. At the present time this would be the Trillium over $5,000 savings account. Next the annual rate of interest as of April 1 and October 1 is determined, and 1 per cent per annum is deducted. Finally, the amount of interest is calculated. Thus, the interest rate to which the purchasers are entitled is that paid by the Province of Ontario Savings Office on April and October 1 of each relevant year on savings accounts in which the amount on deposit exceeds $5,000 less 1 per cent per annum.

There is, therefore, no need to have recourse to the doctrine of contemporanea expositio in the interpretation of s. 33. It is a doctrine which is used in the interpretation of ancient statutes and, in construing the language used by the legislature in its natural and ordinary sense, it requires the court to determine the meaning which the words used ordinarily bore at the time when the statute was passed. Contemporanea expositio ought rarely, if ever, to be applied to modern legislation: Craies on Statute Law, 7th ed. (London: Sweet & Maxwell, 1971), at p. 81. In Governors of Campbell College, Belfast v. Commissioner of Valuation for Northern Ireland, [1964] 2 All E.R. 705, [1964] 1 W.L.R. 912, the House of Lords declared that it is of no value in construing a modern statute. At p. 727 All E.R., p. 941 W.L.R., Lord Upjohn said that contemporanea expositio could have no application to a statute, although it was passed over 100 years ago, the language of which was plain and unambiguous. As I have concluded, the language of s. 33 is plain and unambiguous and, in any event, there is no suggestion the words which it contains have any different meaning today than when it was passed in 1980.

Rule 14.05

Counsel for the respondent took the position that because there are material facts in dispute subrule 14.05(3)(h) [am. O. Reg. 711/89, s. 15] of the Rules of Civil Procedure, O. Reg. 560/84, prohibited the court from resolving the issues raised in this case on the basis of an application and required the court to order that the whole application proceed to trial. This submission requires little comment. The resolution of the issues raised by the applications involved an exercise of statutory interpretation. All of the facts necessary to permit this exercise to take place were either the subject of an agreed statement of facts or were not in dispute. Therefore, there was no need for a trial.

Result

I would answer the four issues raised by these applications in this way:

- (1) There is no need to determine whether the disclosure statement complied with s. 52(6) and (7) of the Condominium Act.
- (2) The respondent is not in default of its obligation under s. 52(1) and (2) of the Act to deliver an amended disclosure statement.
- (3) There is no need to determine this issue.
- (4) The "prescribed rate of interest" which the respondent is required to pay the applicants on their deposits is 1 per cent per annum below the rate paid on the Province of Ontario Savings Office savings accounts in which the amount on deposit exceeds $5,000 on April 1 and October 1 of the relevant year or years.

Counsel may make arrangements to speak to me, if necessary, with regard to costs.

Order accordingly.

Susan A. Armstrong, plaintiff, and London Life Insurance Company, Lynn Marie Armstrong, Middlesex Condominium Corporation No. 130 and Parkside Management Limited, defendants And between London Life Insurance Company, plaintiff by counterclaim, and Susan Alana Armstrong and Otto Herman Rudolph, defendants by counterclaim

Court File No. 17580/94 Ontario Superior Court of Justice Flinn J. Heard: April 12-16, 19 and 20, 1999. Judgment: September 13, 1999.

Counsel: Stuart McKay and K. Egan, for the plaintiff and defendants by counterclaim. Paul Vogel and R. Martella, for Lynn Marie Armstrong and London Life insurance Company. W. Woodward, for Middlesex Condo Corp. No. 130 and Parkside Management Ltd.

[1] FLINN J.:-- In February of 1992 the plaintiff purchased from London Life Insurance Company a penthouse condominium on Ridout Street in the City of London, one of the condominium units in Middlesex Condominium No. 130 which condominium corporation was managed by Parkside Management Incorporation Limited. London Life took back a substantial mortgage which was guaranteed by the other defendant by counterclaim.

[2] The penthouse unit had been owned since 1989 by the defendant Lynn Armstrong (no relation) and she was the first owner. In the summer of 1991 Lynn Armstrong's husband, one Brock Armstrong, who was a senior executive with London Life, was transferred by his company to California to run a subsidiary company. The Armstrongs moved in September of 1991. The arrangement with London Life was to buy the condominium. After appraisals were made London Life and the Brock Armstrongs agreed that they would be paid $305,000 for the condominium by the London Life and thereafter London Life would look after all expenses, including any mortgage payments insurance, taxes, condominium fees or anything else. Brock Armstrong testified that in fact he received the money approximately two or three weeks after he moved and London Life became the owner of the condominium unit but left the registered title in the name of Lynn Armstrong, presumably to avoid land transfer tax, as the London Life intended to dispose of the condominium.

[3] Accordingly, the unit was administered by the London Life until such time as the transaction between the plaintiff and the London Life closed in June of 1992.

[4] The plaintiff says that soon after she moved in, which was shortly after closing, there were problems with water infiltrating into the unit, particularly from the balcony and the west wall. These are subject of a complaint to the condominium corporation in November of 1992. She stated that during the winter of 1992/93 the condominium, particularly the den and the living room, were exceedingly cold such that they needed to import electric heaters to make the unit habitable. Repairs were made, However, as a result of deficiencies in the construction substantial repairs were made in the fall of 1993. By that time the plaintiff says that she was unhappy about the condition of the unit and sought information with respect to its construction. As a result, she came to the conclusion that she had been misled and commenced a short-lived correspondence with London Life in which she demanded that they make some arrangement to take her out of the condominium unit. She retained counsel and as a result of counsel obtaining the files of the solicitor who looked after her interests when she bought the condominium unit, she discovered that the estoppel certificate which had been issued to her solicitor and upon which he apparently relied, was incorrect. In fact she found that a proper estoppel certificate had been issued three days after the date of closing which had not been forwarded to her nor indeed to London Life.

[5] She commenced this litigation in 1994, stopped making her mortgage payments to London Life and condominium fees to the Condominium Corporation and continued not to pay taxes to the municipality.

[6] As a result London Life took power of sale proceedings. On motion for possession, the plaintiff resisted and London Life failed to get possession of the condominium. The plaintiff remained in possession of the condominium until 1997 when she delivered the keys to London Life and moved out. She now sues for rescission of the agreement and damages and alternate relief.

[7] The plaintiff claims:

- a) Fraudulent misrepresentation on the part of Lynn Armstrong and London Life.
- b) In the alternative, negligent misrepresentation of Lynn Armstrong, London Life, the Condominium Corporation and its manager Parkside.
- c) Breach of authority and,
- d) The remedy of rescission or damages or both.

[8] The defendant Lynn Armstrong with her husband, Brock Armstrong, purchased the condominium unit in early 1989 while it was under construction. They had certain upgrades included in the finishing of the condominium and moved in early that year.

[9] Brock Armstrong completed a certificate of completion and possession for the home warranty programme on which he set forth matters to be corrected. In accordance with directions from Arthur Smith Windsor as acting director for the Middlesex Condominium Corporation Armstrong wrote to the Ontario New Home Warranty Program on December the 12th, 1989, listing these deficiencies with some description. These included soundproofing problems, elevator noise, water leaks in the kitchen and living-room, fireplace problems, window problems, a terrace floor problem and cracks in the ceiling on the parking garage. Brock Armstrong testified that in fact all of these complaints were rectified. Lynn Armstrong confirmed that in fact all of these deficiencies were fixed. She said: "It was our home for two and a half years and we loved it.

[10] Their evidence was that during their stay they had no difficulty with the builder. There was a man by the name of Eric on site who was not only friendly but helpful and appeared to repair anything about which he was asked.

[11] The condominium corporation now actively operating, had retained a manager, Parkside Management Limited, one of the defendants. Lynn Armstrong testified that on recommendation from Parkside, the condominium corporation retained Trow Ontario Limited Consulting Engineers in the early summer of 1990 to prepare a technical audit, the objective of which is described in their proposal as comparing details of the design, drawings and specifications, with applicable codes, standards and methods of good building practice, provide a list of deficiencies, identify existing and potential problem areas. In addition, they would provide a reserve fund study that is to say, a study which would indicate what reserve funds the Condominium Corporation should require and maintain in order to have funds to maintain the building to an appropriate standard. This report was received by Condominium Corporation in October of 1990.

[12] Lynn Armstrong testified to the effect that the technical audit at first blush was of some concern but that this concern was substantially tempered by the reserve report which followed in late November of 1990. She was of the opinion that there were no serious problems. Lynn Armstrong said that she had no reason to believe the cooperation of the builder would not continue. Brock Armstrong was of the same view.

[13] As will be noted in the reports and the subsequent correspondence, clarification of many of the concerns was required from the consulting engineers who had been involved in the design and building of the condominium building.

[14] During this period Lynn Armstrong was one of three directors of the Condominium Corporation and testified that her job was the house committee, in other words, to see that the place was kept clean, the gardens were looked after, etc. Arthur Smith Windsor, another unit owner, had taken on the task of dealing with the builder and during this period it was his opinion that there was cooperation from the builder and there was no concern assuming that the matters referred to in the Trow Report would be looked after.

[15] Brock Armstrong said that after they moved London Life Insurance Company looked after the condominium unit. They had taken power of attorney from both Brock Armstrong and Lynn Armstrong in order to convey the unit and as Brock Armstrong said they heard nothing about the condominium unit until this litigation. Both Brock and Lynn Armstrong said that London Life had bought the condominium. Certainly equitable title passed to London Life Insurance Company; and with the powers of attorney, it might be suggested that it had legal title as well.

[16] Prior to leaving, Brock Armstrong had obtained two appraisals and had listed the condominium unit for sale with a real estate agent. The listing expired and when the listing was renewed, it was renewed by London Life in its own name. The listing agent was one Isabel Campbell with Royal LePage.

[17] In the fall of 1991 the plaintiff saw the advertisement and made inquiries from the real estate agent as to whether the condominium unit could be rented. London Life advised her that they were not interested in renting the condominium unit and were only interested in selling. After some negotiations on February the 13th, 1992 the plaintiff entered into an agreement of purchase and sale with London Life Insurance Company. In the course of the negotiations the plaintiff indicated concern with respect to maintaining a dog in the condominium unit and, as a result, the real estate agent obtained an estoppel certificate from Parkside Management which was a "clear" certificate. The legal matters proceeded and the transaction closed on June the 25th, 1992. The plaintiff made no investigation of the affairs of the condominium corporation before closing relying on her solicitor.

[18] The plaintiff's testimony was that she first noticed water pounding on the balcony and that it would seep in through the balcony doors and "soak" the carpet in the den. She then noted water on the window sills in the kitchen and in the living-room there was a water stain on the west wall of the living room although she cannot say when she first noticed this stain. At all events, in November of 1992 a tradesman was retained to repair the balcony problem and in December of 1992 the same tradesman repaired some drywall in the living room damaged by a roof leak.

[19] During the winter they continued to have problems. They found the place brutally cold and drafty. In December, 1992 at the Christmas meeting, the owners were informed by the directors that there was to be a special assessment of some $207,000 for repair of deficiencies. The result would be $3,240 per unit. The plaintiff referred to the December, '92 meeting as more of a social meeting. At the annual meeting in April of 1993 she found the information coming from the engineering consultant with Trow and Associates, Mr. Tom Ng to be a "shocker". She said she now realized that the building had a lot of problems. She understood the outside walls in every unit would be opened from the inside to allow insulation to be inspected and if deficient more to be installed. There was a subsequent assessment of $3000 per unit in the summer of 1993 which she refused to pay and it was the plaintiff's evidence that by this time she decided that they wanted their condominium to be repaired and that they would sell. Her position is set forth most strongly in a letter dated November the 12th, 1993 to London Life Insurance Company which is found at Tab 38 of Vol. 1 of Exhibit 3.

[20] What had transpired between the time that Lynn Armstrong conveyed her interest to London Life Insurance Company is reflected in the minutes of the condominium corporation and other documents. Suffice it to say that the anticipated cooperation from the builder and the builder's consulting engineer was not forthcoming resulting in a letter being sent by the solicitor to the condominium corporation in December, 1991 demanding action or litigation.

[21] The agreement of purchase and sale between London Life Insurance Company and the plaintiffs (purported to be in the trust) was executed by the plaintiff on the 7th of February, 1992, the witness to her signature was Isabel Campbell, the real estate agent. It was amended and executed by Norman Campbell (no relation) on behalf of the London Life Insurance Company on the 11th of February, 1992 and the changes in the agreement were subsequently initialled by the plaintiff.

[22] The allegations of fraud against the defendants London Life Insurance Company and Lynn Armstrong are founded in a statutory declaration of Norton Campbell given on closing and found at Tab 28 Ex. 1 and clauses 9 and 11 of the agreement of purchase and sale which I set out as follows: 9. Vendor represents and warrants to purchaser that to the best of his knowledge, information and belief there are no special assessments contemplated by the condominium corporation: voting rights have not been assigned and there are no legal actions pending or contemplated by or against the condominium corporation.

11. Vendor further represents and warrants to purchaser that at the time of the acceptance of this offer he has not received a notice convening a special or general meeting of the Unit holders of the Condominium Corporation respecting any of the following matters;

- (a) the termination of the government of the condominium property;
- (b) any substantial alteration in or substantial addition to the common elements or the renovation thereof, or

(c) any substantial change in the assets or liabilities of the Condominium Corporation; and vendor covenants that if he receives any such notice prior to the date of completion he shall forthwith notify purchaser in writing and purchaser may thereupon, at his option, declare this Agreement to be null and void and all deposit monies paid by Purchaser hereunder, shall be refunded without interest or deduction.

[23] The agreement further provides in para. 26 that the agreement constitutes the entire agreement and that "there is no representation, warranty, collateral agreement or condition affecting this agreement or the property or supported hereby other than as expressed herein in writing."

[24] The plaintiff's claim is that the fraud of Lynn Marie Armstrong and London Life Insurance Company is that:

(a) Knowing that the condominium corporation was contemplating action against the architect, engineers and builder of the condominium, they made no disclosure to the plaintiff at the time of the execution of the agreement or indeed before the closing of the transaction.

(b) That they were aware that the construction deficiencies and/or design flaws would require substantial repair, improvement and/or renovation which in due course would require special assessments, and that at the time of the execution of the agreement, and indeed prior to the time of closing, disclosure of such was not made to the plaintiff.

[25] As to the liability of Lynn Armstrong, it is quite clear that the last meeting of the directors that she attended was on August the 21st, 1991. It is quite clear from the minutes of the directors and members of the condominium corporation that to that date cooperation from the builder was expected. This is explained in the letters dated January 25, 1991, March 19, 1991, the meeting of May 23, 1991 and the letters of May 30, 1991 and August 6, 1991. In 1991 Trow was looking for information from the consulting engineer and the contractor as to the questions raised by Trow in their 1990 report. Matters did not come to a head until December of 1991 when, in a letter to the developer and the engineer, counsel for the condominium corporation demanded that appropriate action be taken before January 6, 1992 or "the Board of Directors will convene a meeting of Unit holders to seek instructions to commence litigation." While there is reference to legal advice in the minutes of the meeting of August 21st, 1991 there is nothing in those minutes, the correspondence nor in the evidence beyond what was in the minutes as to the possibility of "legal action".

[26] So far as Lynn Armstrong is concerned, she made no representation to the plaintiff. She did not contract with the plaintiff nor did she owe her any duty. There is no foundation for alleging fraudulent misrepresentation against Lynn Arms trong.

[27] Foundation of the claim against London Life is alleged by plaintiff's counsel to be representations of Norton Campbell on behalf of London Life.

[28] Norton Campbell was a vice-president for Human Resources. At the time of the trial he was retired and other than retirement benefits, he had no connection with London Life Insurance Company. As the vice-president of Human Resources, he had nothing to do with the real estate interests of London Life, but testified that he became involved in the disposition of houses of senior executives of London Life who were involved in geographic moves and thus, he was involved in the transaction at issue in this litigation. He advised that he relied on experts within the London Life and would not sign any documents without reference to these experts. When the Brock Armstrong residence became part of his responsibility, he referred the care of the property to one Ann Vardon, another employee who saw to the payment of all of the necessary outgoings and would inspect the premises weekly. Unfortunately, that person is now deceased. He knew of Isabel Campbell, the listing agent, and she presented the offer to purchase from the plaintiff to him. He was aware of the appraisals obtained by Brock Armstrong in connection with the buyout of this condominium by London Life. He signed the second listing agreement in January of 1992. The plaintiff waived conditions and signed the mortgage commitment. The matter proceeded apace until closing at which time Norton Campbell completed a declaration which was prepared by London Life's counsel and sworn by him which declared in the terms of p. 11 of the Agreement of Purchase and Sale.

[29] Norton Campbell testified that he had no information of any sort which he felt should be disclosed to a purchaser and candidly admitted that if all the information subsequently discovered had been available to him that he was sure that the London Life Insurance Company would have disclosed that to a purchaser.

[30] From the letter of December the 18th, 1991 written by counsel for the condominium corporation threatening legal action matters did deteriorate into litigation resulting in a settlement to the condominium corporation of a sum in excess of $600,000 arising out of matters that had their origin in the report of Trow Consulting Engineers of October 1990. Hindsight therefore colours what went before. The court appreciates this difficulty, but the claim must be assessed on the basis of the evidence at the time of the execution of the agreement of purchase and sale insofar as contemplated litigation is concerned and the date of the statutory declaration insofar as matters set forth in that declaration are pertinent. Of particular assistance with respect to this assessment was the evidence of Arthur James Smith-Windsor who was examined for discovery and whose testimony was read in on consent and the evidence and the report of Mr. A.B. Johns of Morrison, Hershfield Limited who reviewed documentation regarding the history of the discovery of deficiencies and specific items. Their opinion was that the major deficiencies in the building were not discovered until after the start of remedial construction in December of 1992; that the deficiencies with respect to the condominium unit, the subject of this litigation, which merited remedial work were discovered after June the 25th, 1992, the date of closing of the purchase and sale of the condominium by London Life to the plaintiff. Mr. Johns gave a technical flavour to the progression of events which the court felt worthy of consideration and helpful in the determination of the matters in issue.

[31] In the files of London Life (not those of Norton Campbell) there was discovered the notice of the annual general meeting of the condominium corporation held on April the 9th, 1992. There was no evidence as to when the minutes of that meeting were prepared and distributed.

[32] It was the evidence of Norton Campbell that Ann Vardon would have received that notice and that if she had thought that the notice was significant, it would have been discussed with him and they would have decided whether or not she would attend the meeting. She did not attend the meeting. He did not have the information that appears in the minutes of April 9th, 1992.

[33] Counsel for the plaintiff argued strenuously that the evidence of Norton Campbell and the documentation are indicative of fraudulent misrepresentation relying particularly on the representation with respect to contemplated legal action in paragraph 9 of the Agreement of Purchase and Sale. Norton Campbell was candid in agreeing with the questioning of counsel for the plaintiff in admitting that he did not direct his mind to the content of that paragraph.

[34] Counsel for the plaintiff relies heavily on words from the House of Lords in Derry v. Peek 1889, H.L.(E.) (1889). Counsel purported to equate the statements of Norton Campbell as being "made by him recklessly, or without care, whether it is true or false, that is without any reasonable ground for believing it to be true". As to that being the statement of the law, Bramwell L.J. at page 350 says as follows:

Well, I agree to all before the 'that is' and I agree to what comes after it if it is taken as equivalent to what goes before, viz., "recklessly or without care whether it is true or false," understanding "recklessly" as explained "without care whether it is true or false". For a man who makes a statement without care and regard for its truth or falsity commits a fraud. He is a rogue.

In a very recent case Vokey and Swanson v. Edwards et al released by Killeen J. on May 4th 1999, he says at p. 13 with respect to fraudulent misrepresentation:

Fraudulent misrepresentation would, if proved, survive the closing of this transaction on February 14, 1997 and would not be defeated by the caveat emptor principle or related disclaimer clauses in the agreement for sale: see, for example, the following statement in 29 C.E.D. (Ont. 3rd), Title 130, para 654:

Once the contract has been completed and has been executed, the maxim of caveat emptor applies save for exceptional cases, as where there has been fraud, a total failure of consideration or an error in substantialibus, such as the purchaser purchasing his or her own property. After completion a purchaser must protect himself or herself against a defect in the title, quantity, or quality by covenants in the conveyance.

A good general statement about the elements of fraud or fraudulent misrepresentation may be found in Perell & Engell, Remedies and the sale of Land, 2d ed. (Toronto: Butterworths, 1998), at pp. 92-93:

A person makes a fraudulent misrepresentation when he or she makes a false statement without belief in its truth and with the intent to deceive. Fraud involves intentional dishonesty, the intent being to deceive. Thus, to succeed in an action for deceit or for fraudulent misrepresentation, the plaintiff must show not only that the defendant spoke falsely and contrary to belief, but that the defendant had the intent to deceive, which is to say he or she had the aim of inducing the plaintiff to act mistakenly. There is an element of proximity associated with the intent to deceive; the plaintiff must show that the defendant's design was directed at the plaintiff or at a class of persons that includes the plaintiff.

[35] Bearing in mind the evidence that was before Norton Campbell at the time when he signed the agreement of purchase and sale, the plaintiff, on whom the onus falls, has failed to establish an intent to deceive on the part of Mr. Campbell. All of the information that he had from the appraisal to the various discussions with the real estate agent during the re-listing the observations or price from other sources, and the agreement of purchase and sale, would leave him in the frame of mind that there were no problems with respect to this transaction other than market forces. Therefore there was nothing about which he could be described as reckless or dishonestly willful.

[36] In Chapman v. Warren (1936), O.R. 145 the court said:

Ever since the decision in Derry v. Peek (1889), 14 APP. CAS. 337, the law has been settled that carelessness, however gross, is not fraud. Where the word "careless" is used in the cases the expression does not mean "without taking care" but "not caring". Very gross and culpable carelessness is not enough to constitute fraud ..."

[37] The tort of deceit has, by some writers, been referred to as a "intentional tort". As I have come to the conclusion that there was no intent to deceive, there can be no tort.

[38] The fact is that at the time the transaction between the plaintiff and London Life closed the representations, in the agreement of purchase and sale as to contemplated litigation are false. That is to say, the Board of Directors had authorized action against the builder and the builder's consulting engineer subject to the approval of the members.

[39] However, the representation in paragraph 9 is tempered, not as an outright warranty, but a representation "to the best of his knowledge, information and belief", and as to the statutory declaration by the words "I have not been notified" and "I am not aware".

[40] I have already referred to the fact that London Life had in its possession at the time of closing the notice of the meeting of April 9, 1992 which referred to a building report under the heading of old business, and the minutes of the meeting of April the 18th, 1991. The London Life also had in their possession two appraisals by qualified real estate appraisers, neither of which gave any indication of any difficulty with the building, its construction or otherwise and in fact valued the unit considerably higher than it subsequently sold. Both appraisals are indeed positive. Their solicitor on closing had a clear estoppel certificate.

[41] It is the allegation of the plaintiff that London Life had a positive duty to the plaintiff to make inquiries before completing either the agreement of purchase and sale or the statutory declaration, that they didn't make the inquiries and that therefore their misrepresentation was made negligently.

[42] The defence is that had the purchaser made inquiries she could have found the information that would have been available, that the defects referred to and complained about would not have been latent as being raised in the Trow report and that, therefore, the principle of caveat emptor applies to the plaintiff.

[43] It should be noted here that the plaintiff was a licenced real estate agent. While her efforts at the time of the acquisition of this property were directed to other pursuits, she did own two other properties. She had been licenced for some years and had done some condominium work. Her abilities are reflected in the correspondence which she sent to London Life which led to her offer being accepted subject to amendment and indeed in her letter to London Life after she decided to withhold her mortgage payments but to protect the life insurance portion of the mortgage payments in order that her liability would be protected by life insurance.

[44] The questions arise

(a) Was there a misrepresentation at all?

(b) If there was a misrepresentation, was it negligently made or innocently made?

(c) The results vis-à-vis the claim of the plaintiff.

[45] Brock Armstrong referred to the letter from the solicitors of the condominium corporation to the engineer and contractor as a "shot across the bow". In view of the months of delay on the part of the recipients of this letter there can be little doubt that at the time the agreement of purchase and sale was executed by the plaintiff and the London Life, that litigation was "contemplated".

[46] Such a clause was considered in John Levy v. Cameron and Johnstone (1992), 26 R.P.L. (2d) 130 (Ont. Gen. Div.). In that case Philp I ruled against liability and said at p. 147:

In my view, the use of the words 'to the best of my knowledge and belief' did not warrant the absolute truth of the statement that there were no contaminate waste materials, but qualified the statement by the use of those words. I find that the warranty and representation made by Mr. Levy was reasonably fair and truthful to the best of his knowledge and belief, and therefore not a breach that would justify the defendant to refuse to close the transaction or to rescind the contract. [47] The evidence of Norton Campbell was worthy of belief. He had all of the information which the London Life had and there are indeed facts which would indicate that so far as he was concerned, the representation was true. These facts are:

(a) London Life had two appraisals completed by qualified real estate appraisers which gave no indication of any difficulty with the unit or the building.

(b) The evidence was that Ann Vardon would have visited that building on an inspection of the condominium unit weekly and that it was her duty to report anything untoward. Campbell testified that there were no such report.

(c) No information came to London Life from the real estate agent that would have raised any concern on the part of a person signing the agreement of purchase and sale on behalf of London Life.

(d) There was nothing in the notice of the meeting of April, 1992 that should have raised concern, with respect to the status of the condominium and even the enclosure with the notice of the minutes of the previous annual meeting in April of 1991 would not, in all of the circumstances, have put Campbell on inquiry. The plaintiff argues that the minutes of April, 1991 indicate pending or contemplated litigation. They argue that this was the view of Leitch J. in her judgment dealing with the application for summary judgment and possession. With great respect to the observations of Leitch J., she did not have all of the evidence that was before the trial judge. One has to read the word "contemplated" ejusdem generis with "pending". The reference to taking action to recover the costs was framed in the connotation of contractor cooperation and in fact some of the work was actually done by the contractor. In my view, such words are contingent, to say the least. In my view litigation was not contemplated until December of 1991 when the letter was written to the contractor and engineer.

(e) The ignorance of London Life continued through until closing when, in accordance with the mortgage commitment to the plaintiff, London Life's solicitors received a clear estoppel certificate which mirrored the estoppel certificate given to the real estate agent shortly after the agreement of purchase and sale was executed.

[48] Clearly, from the evidence, in view of the nature of the wording of para. 11, there was no breach by the London Life with respect to that paragraph.

[49] Further argument is that there was some special relationship between London Life and the plaintiff which required the London Life to make inquiry beyond the information that they had. While in her evidence as a result of questions put to her by her counsel, the plaintiff indicated that she placed some reliance on London Life, the fact is that the documents indicate otherwise. I have come to the conclusion that she treated London Life as any other vendor save that London Life was prepared to grant her an unusual mortgage in order to complete the sale to her. She organized the agreement of purchase and sale with London Life and she completed the usual letter of commitment to London Life with respect to the mortgage. There is no evidence that she looked to the London Life for anything more than any other vendor, that is to say, either by herself or through her solicitor.

[50] The plaintiff, in my view, is in the position of the plaintiff in Boulderwood Development Co. v. Edwards et al, 30 C.C.L.T., 223 (N.S.S.C. 1984) were in the Court of Appeal at p. 244 said the following:

In the present appeal, MacDonald owed no duty to the purchasers to make any disclosures; however, having made a representation which later turns out to be false does he now fall within the doctrine of Hedley Byrne and become liable for the economic loss suffered by the purchasers? I think not. Firstly, I am not convinced that in the relationship of vendor and purchaser an innocent misrepresentation regarding the quality of land evokes the doctrine and this is particularly so when it is a misrepresentation concerning a latent defect of which neither party was aware at the time it was made. Secondly, I am of the opinion that Fraser-Reid v. Droumsekas, supra, is an accurate statement of the present law in Canada and that barring "fraud or fundamental difference between that which was bargained for and that obtained", the purchaser must protect himself either by express warranty or by independent examination. Thirdly, a review of the evidence leads me to conclude that there was no holding out by MacDonald that he possessed the skill and knowledge upon which Edwards could rely; and, in fact, in each instance he qualified his answers by stating that Edwards should look to his concrete man for advice on how the foundation should be constructed. Lastly, if a duty does exist, the I do not agree that such is the case in the present circumstances, then, in my opinion, that duty (reasonable man) was discharged by MacDonald by qualifying his statements as hereinbefore stated.

[51] The plaintiff's claim against London Life Insurance Company and Lynn Marie Armstrong must be dismissed and the counterclaim of the London Life Insurance Company allowed. The parties have agreed as to the quantum of the claim of the London Life Insurance Company and therefore there will be judgment for the London Life Insurance Company against Susan Alana Armstrong and Otto Herman Rudolph, the defendants by counterclaim in the amount of $241,117.03 together with interest to the date of judgment at the rate of 18% per annum or $93.07 per day.

[52] The claim of the plaintiff against the Middlesex Condominium Corporation No. 130 and Parkside Management Limited arises from the clear estoppel certificate that was issued on the 25th of February, 1992 to Isabel Campbell, the real estate agent, and the second delivered as a document on closing on June the 24th, 1992 which admittedly was issued in error inasmuch as Parkside Management Limited had been directed by the Condominium Corporation to amend the clearance certificate to refer to the deficiencies in construction. In fact the clause had been drafted by the solicitor for Condominium Corporation and sent to Parkside Management as its agent on April the 14th, 1992. It is obvious that this amended estoppel certificate was used by Parkside Management and at Exhibit 1, Tab 255 we see the comments of Parkside with respect to an inquiry from another source as to the contents of the amended estoppel certificate.

[53] On the basis of the court's assessment of the facts the plaintiff had no right to refuse to close even had she received the correct estoppel certificate. This estoppel certificate did not belie the representations made by London Life Insurance Company in the agreement of purchase and sale and in the statutory declaration. Indeed, the answers given by Parkside and the solicitors for the condominium corporation as found at Tabs 254 and 256 are not, in all of the circumstances, sufficient to raise a fundamental issue with respect to the habitability of the penthouse apartment.

[54] It is speculation as to what would have happened had her solicitor turned over to her the estoppel certificate which he received three days after the closing and which, he retained in his file. Again, it is speculation as to the position of the London Life had it received instructions from its solicitor (who was also the solicitor for the plaintiff) in the form delivered three days after the mortgage money was advanced and the transaction closed. Pursuant to the Condominium Act, s. 38(8) certain rights are given to a purchaser with respect to an estoppel certificate given in accordance with that section of the statute.

[55] That Parkside was negligent, there is no doubt. The evidence is clear that they were notified by the solicitors for the condominium corporation as to the exact words to be inserted in the estoppel certificate by letter dated April the 14th, 1992.

[56] As the estoppel certificate was in error, she is entitled to claim against Parkside Management and its principle, the condominium corporation, in accordance with s. 38(8) which "The certificate binds the corporation as against the person requesting the certificate in says respect of any default or otherwise shown in the certificate as of the day it is given."

[57] In Halifax County Condominium Corporation et al v. McDermaid et al, 24 R.P.R. 248, the Court (N.S.) concluded that the condominium corporation was estopped from claiming an amount from the condominium purchaser which was known to the condominium corporation as a liability notwithstanding the fact that the notice of assessment had not been prepared. Similar observations are made by the court in Lucas et al v. Duro and Shay, 39 R.P.R. 178 wherein the solicitors for the purchaser of a condominium unit were found liable for not having obtained, on the part of the purchaser, an estoppel certificate. While the facts are somewhat different, the observations with respect to liability of the condominium corporation on an estoppel certificate to a purchaser are clear and in accordance with the observation made by Glube C.J. in the Halifax County case supra.

[58] In this case there had been no assessment levied by the condominium corporation or even discussed insofar as amounts are concerned until the board meeting of November 26, 1992. It is the plaintiff's position that she would not have closed had she received the appropriate estoppel certificate. The correct certificate of estoppel would have had the following paragraph:

6. The corporation has no knowledge of any circumstances that may result in an increase in the common expenses for the said unit. "Except as follows: The Condominium Corporation in this case has conducted extensive testing of the common elements and has identified two deficiencies which may require repair and/or maintenance. The corporation believes these deficiencies to be construction and/or design flaws for which there may be recourse. Until resolution of that matter, the corporation must bear any potential costs, the final extent of which are not yet known. No determination has, yet been made respecting payment of costs through use of the reserve fund or by way of special assessment."

[59] With respect to the purchase of a unit in the subject buildings by another person, in April of 1992 solicitors had inquired of the condominium corporation through its agent, Parkside Management Limited, as to particulars of the deficiencies. The response dated April the 28th, 1992 refers to the two deficiencies as follows:

1. Shelf angles - brick supports - as per the architectural drawings shelf angles were to be placed in the areas of the bay windows. Trow study show that the shelf angles were not used, but has advised that the building should not suffer structurally.

2. Leaking - It was found through Trow studies, that the air/vapour barrier (above ceiling level) is not continuous from top to bottom as stipulated in the 1986 Construction Code requirements thus causing water to build up and leak. Trow recommends a spray foam insulation be used to provide an effective air/vapour barrier and it would also satisfy the requirements of the Construction Codes. The estimated cost is between 60 and 70,000 to be done over a three to five year period.

[60] Norton Campbell speculated that had all the information known at the time of closing and brought to the attention of London Life, in all likelihood they would not have forced the plaintiff to close the transaction. That is speculative at best but assuming that to be the situation, would she have closed. She says not but one has to look at all of the circumstances.

[61] First of all, she was very much interested in this penthouse condominium. She had attempted to rent it and obviously retained a running interest until such time as she effected an agreement of purchase and sale.

[62] The purchase price was advantageous as being a reduction of some $25,000 from the value paid by the London Life to the Brock Armstrongs, the down payment was minimal, and the mortgage was at an advantageous rate, below the then current market rate.

[63] Assuming that she assessed the information that would come from Parkside as to the possible assessment totalling $60,000 to $70,000, she would be able to calculate that such was to be spread over 64 units and that the cost to her would be $1,093.75 perhaps recoverable. She testified that the December 9, 1992 information meeting was more of a social meeting. That information meeting dealt with the special assessment of $207,360 which divided by the 64 units, yielded an assessment of $3,240. Her actions indicate that she accepted that assessment and paid the monthly payments of $35 until December, 1993.

[64] Counsel for the condominium corporation and Parkside suggested to the court that the problems of the purchaser in 1993 when the serious complaints commenced was one of financial difficulty and submitted as evidence of this, registration by the Corporation of the City of London of a notice of registration of tax arrears on the 22nd day of May, 1996, showing tax arrears of $16,663.69 which was alleged to indicate that perhaps no taxes had been paid to the city by the plaintiff on the condominium since the date of purchase. She did not leave the premises until August 31, 1997 and, as indicated earlier, had defended against the application of the London Life for summary judgment and possession. She listed the property with ReMax in September of 1993 and kept it listed until April of 1994 at $289,000. She notes in the letter to her solicitors that "only two or three people ever came through it and only one showed any interest". That listing agreement indicates that the condominium unit is "exceptional quality and upgrades throughout" and appears to have been signed by the plaintiff. She obtained from Knowles Lambert an appraisal. They appear to be certified fee appraisers and the appraisal indicates that in fact it had been listed in 1994 through the London/St. Thomas Real Estate Board with an asking price of $299,000. This appraisal does point out that the litigation had placed a "stigma" on the building and had diminished interest in the units.

[65] The unit was appraised at around $199,000 about the end of 1997 and 1998 for the London Life in accordance with its power of sale proceedings and the appraisals indicate that the interior was never repaired and showed signs of water damage. In addition, there was a downward trend of prices for high price condominiums.

[66] On an assessment of all of the evidence, the court has concluded on the balance of probabilities the plaintiff would have closed regardless of the content of a proper estoppel certificate and therefore her claim against the condominium corporation and Parkside is also dismissed.

[67] Notwithstanding the dismissal of the plaintiff's claim, I must assess the damages claimed by the plaintiff. The detail of these expenses and damages are set forth in Ex. 5.

[68] I would have allowed the legal fees to purchase the unit in the amount of $3,489.91 together with the deposit paid of $29,649.92. In addition, I would have allowed to her the condominium fees paid by her during the months when she was paying these fees and the total would be $5,790.

[69] As to items #5 and #6, mortgage payments paid to the London Life amounted to $1,908.03 each and every month together with a loan insurance payment of $3310.50 each month, the total therefore being $2,218.53. The evidence indicates that she paid these for 15 months for a total of $33,277.95.

[70] As to item #7 she would be entitled to recover what she paid on condominium fees arising out of the first assessment of $3,240, the amount paid $2,440. The evidence indicated that she did not pay the second assessment but had she done so she would have been credited with the sum of $1,570 which was the cost of repairs paid directly by her and therefore her claim would be allowed in that amount, that is to say the sum of $1,570.

[71] Item #8 claims (a), (b), (c) and (d) would be allowed totalling $1,338.22, but not item (e), that is accommodation as she did not incur that expense. The total of her claim which would be allowed would be therefore the sum of $77,556. As the lien charges claimed in para. 9 were not paid, they would not be allowed to her.

[72] However, she occupied the premises from June of 1992 until she left in August of 1997 or some 62 months. From her claim therefore would be deducted the benefits of the occupancy of the condominium unit for that period. To value that allowance, I would consider the mortgage payment and the insurance plus the condominium fees plus the municipal taxes as this was what the plaintiff was prepared to pay for occupancy of the premises in accordance with the agreement of purchase and sale. She would also be required to make the Hydro payments which she did save for $940 and of course any claim for these Hydro payments would not be allowed to her as a damage claim. Accordingly, the value of the occupancy as anticipated would have been in the vicinity of $2,800 plus utilities. Taking into account the inconvenience during the periods of reconstruction and renovation, I would have valued the benefit to her of occupancy in the sum of $2,000 per month which multiplied by the 62 months of occupancy results in a benefit to her of $120,000.

[73] It would appear that any claims which the condominium corporation may have had against the plaintiff were settled on the sale of the condominium unit by London Life and presumably any interest which the plaintiff might have received in the settlement of the litigation against the developer and the engineer in connection with the construction of the building would also have appeared in the adjustments on the sale by the London Life.

[74] The result is that all of the plaintiff's claims will be dismissed as will the cross-claims of the other parties save the London Life Insurance Company.

[75] In the circumstances of this case I think I should make no finding with respect to costs without receiving submissions. Accordingly, if the parties will make an arrangement with the trial coordinator I shall attempt to meet the convenience of counsel.

Re Royal Insurance Company of Canada and Middlesex Condominium Corporation No. 173 et al.

37 O.R. (3d) 139

Docket No. C26575 Court of Appeal for Ontario McKinlay, Carthy and Laskin JJ.A. January 23, 1998

APPEAL from an order dismissing an application to partition a condominium into two new condominium corporations.

David M. Miller and Barry R. Scott, for appellant. Peter Sengbusch, for respondents, Ronald Bossert and Judy Slessor. Geoffrey Dillon, in person.

MCKINLAY J.A. (dissenting): -- The appellant, Royal Insurance Company of Canada ("Royal"), appeals from the judgment of the Honourable Mr. Justice McGarry dated January 9, 1997, in which he dismissed Royal's application for an order temporarily terminating the governance of the property of Middlesex Condominium Corporation No. 173 ("MCC 173") by the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.26 (the "Act"), and partitioning the property into two new condominium corporations. The respondents Ronald Bossert and Judy Garland Slessor were represented by counsel on the appeal, and the respondent Geoffrey William Dillon appeared in person.

MCC 173 was created by the registration of a declaration and description on June 12, 1990. It contains a total of 293 units, 255 of which are designated for residential use and 38 of which are designated for commercial use.

At the time that the declaration and description was filed, Royal held a first and second mortgage on the lands and premises referred to in the description. The respondent, 552838 Ontario Limited, the owner of the lands at the time of the creation of MCC 173, subsequently defaulted on its mortgage obligations. Royal is now the mortgagee in possession of all the commercial units and 204 of the 255 residential units. The other 51 residential units are owned by independent owners.

Aside from a general downturn in the market for both commercial and residential condominium units, this project has encountered serious difficulties as a result of problems specific to this property. As a result of these problems, the commercial space is almost entirely vacant and the residents have encountered difficulty in selling their units. The most significant of these problems are:

(a) The buildings are poured concrete structures built in the mid-1970s and have reached a state where extensive repairs are required to the parking garage, to the roof and skylights, to the exterior and to the mechanical systems.

(b) The fact that the outdated layout of the commercial areas and units is fixed by MCC 173, combined with the minority position of the commercial units as 38 out of 293, makes the investment of the funds required to revitalize the commercial areas less than feasible at the present time. In addition, a disproportionate amount of the physical repairs required must be done within the commercial areas and thus forms an unreasonable burden on the residential units.

(c) The commercial space has been laid out and partitioned to suit tenants from time to time. Many of these spaces are very small and of little utility. As part of the renovations required to the commercial area, the walls, partitions and office fronts will have to be re-configured. These are all demising walls and common elements governed by the Act. The approvals which would be required by the Act would make it very difficult to carry out such renovations. Even if approval could be obtained, periodic renovations of commercial malls are common and any developer prepared to take over the space and finance the needed changes would be concerned that the same approval would not be available the next time round.

In short, it is clear that the project was not well conceived from the outset, given the difficulty, now apparent, in obtaining necessary approvals under the Act to operate the commercial units in a commercially feasible manner.

In order to deal with this matter in a manner which would benefit all, Royal made a proposal to the unit owners. The proposal required the partitioning of the commercial and the residential complexes and the creation of two new condominium corporations. This proposal was the subject of the application before McGarry J. and of this appeal.

The proposal was discussed with the unit owners at meetings held on June 28, 1995, and May 8, 1996. During the May 8, 1996 meeting, a resolution supporting Royal's restructuring proposal was passed by a vote of 259 unit owners in favour, five unit owners being opposed and four unit owners abstaining.

It is Royal's position that the proposal would, if put into place, benefit the residential unit owners in the following ways:

(a) There would be a legal and practical framework within which the commercial areas could once again be made a viable component of the project, hopefully leading to the occupation of those areas by service and retail businesses whose proximity would benefit the residential unit owners.

(b) The residential condominium would have the exclusive use of the recreational rooms, health club and pool. As matters presently stand, the residential unit owners are required to share the use of these areas with the commercial unit owners, their employees and their invited guests. Given that very few of the commercial units are presently occupied, this does not, at present, create any inconvenience to the residential unit owners. Problems will likely develop as a higher percentage of the commercial units become occupied.

(c) At present, there are only 282 parking spaces provided for the 293 residential and commercial units. Therefore, it has been impossible to provide even one parking spot for each of the residential and commercial units. Under Royal's proposal, the residential unit owners would be provided with exclusive use of both levels of underground parking. Parking facilities on the Colborne Lands would be made available to the commercial unit owners. Each residential unit owner would be guaranteed the use of a parking space designated as exclusive to his or her unit.

All soft costs for the implementation of the proposal would be borne by Royal.

Decision of the judge hearing the application

McGarry J. dismissed the application before him on the basis argued by the respondent, that is, that s. 46 was not the appropriate section of the Act under which to proceed in this case, and that approval of the unit owners should have been sought under s. 38 of the Act. The relevant portions of ss. 38 and 46 read:

38(1) The corporation may by a vote of owners who own 80 per cent of the units make any substantial addition, alteration or improvement to or renovation of the common elements or may make any substantial change in the assets of the corporation, and the corporation may by a vote of the owners make any other addition, alteration or improvement to or renovation of the common elements or may make any other change in the assets of the corporation.

(4) If any substantial addition, alteration or improvement to or renovation of the common elements is made, or if any substantial change in the assets of the corporation is made, the corporation must, on demand of any owner who dissented, made within ten days after the date of the vote referred to in subsection (1), purchase the owner's unit and common interest.

(5) Where the corporation and the owner who dissented do not agree as to the purchase price, the owner who dissented may elect to have the fair market value of the owner's unit and common interest determined by arbitration under the Arbitrations Act by serving a notice to that effect on the corporation.

46(1) A corporation, any owner, or any person having an encumbrance against a unit and common interest, may apply to the Ontario Court (General Division) for an order terminating the government of the property by this Act.

(2) The court may order that the government of the property by this Act be terminated if the court is of the opinion that the termination would be just and equitable, and, in determining whether the termination would be just and equitable, the court shall have regard to,

(a) the scheme and intent of this Act; (b) the probability of unfairness to one or more owners if termination is not ordered; and

(c) the probability of confusion and uncertainty in the affairs of the corporation or the owners if termination is not ordered.

(3) Where an order of termination is made under subsection (2), the court may include in the order any provisions that the court considers appropriate in the circumstances.

Should s. 38 or s. 46 of the Act be applied in this case?

In finding that it was necessary for approval of the unit owners to be sought under s. 38 of the Act, the reason given by the judge hearing the application was that "the re-organization by the applicant would effect a very, substantial change in the assets of the corporation". With respect, I do not see that the facts set out in this application warrant that conclusion. The change envisaged is a change to the whole organizational structure of the condominium corporation for the benefit of both commercial and residential owners. The assets involved are common elements and individual units, both of which are assets of unit owners, and not assets of the corporation (see s. 7(1) of the Act).

Repairs, even major ones, are the business of the Board of the condominium corporation. It is clear that substantial repairs are necessary in this case, but repairs are not referred to in s. 38, and the necessity of repairs would not engage the provisions of s. 38. However, substantial alterations of the common elements are also involved in the proposal and, thus, s. 38 would be engaged if the condominium corporation wished to effect these alterations.

The question before us is whether s. 46 can be resorted to in a situation where the provisions of s. 38 apply to the specific facts involved. In my view, it can be. Section 38 is directed to specific fact situations, and to actions which the corporation, as a corporation, wishes to embark upon. Section 46 is general in nature, and is clearly intended to be applicable in a large variety of different fact situations. It may be invoked by the corporation, or by any owner, or any person having an encumbrance against a unit and common interest. The results of applying the provisions of s. 38 or s. 46 are very different. Where s. 38 is applied, any unit owner who does not agree with the making of the substantial alterations of renovations is entitled to have his unit purchased by the corporation. Where an application is made to the court under s. 46, the governing of the property by the Act is terminated. However, the court, in making a termination order may also include in the order any provisions that the court considers appropriate in the circumstances.

Section 46 involves the consideration of broad principles of fairness in dealing with all persons with interests in the governance of the condominium involved. It can be applied to facts which, in narrower circumstances, could involve the application of s. 38. However, the facts in this case go far beyond the fact situations set out in s. 38. They go to the basic viability of the whole complex.

I have no doubt that the three requirements set out in s. 46(2) of the Act are satisfied, and that the court has authority to make the termination order sought, and I would make such an order. The same result could have been accomplished by the application of s. 45 of the Act, since the owners of 80 per cent of the units have approved a termination. Pursuant to s. 45(3), the result of a termination is that the unit owners become tenants in common of the land and interests appurtenant thereto, including the common elements (see the definitions of "common elements" and "property" in s. 1 of the Act). The reason in this case for invoking s. 46 in addition to having obtained the necessary 80 per cent approval under s. 45 is that, in order to accomplish the objectives of the Royal proposal, a further order pursuant to s. 46(3) is required. It is this request which raises conceptual and jurisdictional difficulties.

Order pursuant to s. 46(3) of the Act

Once the condominium corporation is terminated and the owners become tenants in common of the land and common elements, in order to complete the Royal proposal and effect the establishment of two separate condominium corporations -- one commercial and one residential -- it is necessary to sever the tenancy in common. This cannot be done by agreement in this case, because of the refusal of the respondents in this appeal to agree to the proposal. Royal, therefore, asks that the court make an order pursuant to s. 3(1) of the Partition Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.4, for the partition of the real property into two parcels, and for an order that Royal proceed with the establishment of the two separate condominium corporations. Section 3(1) reads:

3(1) Any person interested in land in Ontario, or the guardian of a minor entitled to the immediate possession of an estate therein, may bring an action or make an application for the partition of such land or for the sale thereof under the directions of the court if such sale is considered by the court to be more advantageous to the parties interested.

Since the normal partition of land, and the type of partition for which the Partition Act was originally enacted, is a partition of real estate on the ground, the concept of a horizontal partition above the ground seems conceptually strange -- but no more strange than the condominium concept itself. I see no reason why the provisions of the Partition Act cannot be applied in a case such as this. Section 6(1) of the Condominium Act states that "Units and common interests are real property for all purposes." Section 3(1) of the Partition Act provides for an order of partition of land by the court on application of a person interested in the land. I am satisfied that the provisions of s. 46(3) are sufficiently broad to provide jurisdiction for making of the order under the Partition Act for the severance of the commercial units from the residential units.

The most difficult question in this case is whether s. 46(3) is sufficiently broad to permit a prospective order approving the registration of declarations under the Act, including powers of attorney in favour of Royal to execute the declarations on behalf of all owners. The problem arises as a result of the refusal of the appellants in this case to execute the declaration as required by s. 3(1) of the Condominium Act.

Because of the fairly recent development of the condominium concept, no body of law has developed around the problems which will inevitably become increasingly frequent and diversified as facts warranting termination arise. With considerable foresight, the legislation has provided the court with a very broad discretion under s. 46(3) to act as it considers appropriate in the wide variety of fact situations which could arise on termination. The order requested in this case is clearly in the interest of all owners, and it would be unfortunate for all if a very small number of dissenters could frustrate the carrying out of a beneficial proposal endorsed by almost all of the unit owners.

It should also be noted that the objective of the respondents' dissent is to require the purchase of their units. If s. 38 were applicable in their case, the corporation would be required to purchase the dissenters' units. But, as stated above, it is my view that s. 38 does not apply here. The Act does not provide a similar remedy on a termination under s. 46. When the condominium corporation is an ongoing one, the purchase remedy is a very appropriate one. It acts as a check on grandiose plans by the corporation for changes in the common elements. If dissenters opt to have their units purchased, the whole plan can be re-assessed in the light of the cost involved. On a termination, however, everyone suffers, and there is no corporation left to purchase the units of dissenters. If the provisions of s. 46(3) are not very broadly interpreted, owners, after a termination, will be in the position of owning a piece of real property in the air plus an interest in common in the land and common elements which would be virtually unsaleable. Without 100 per cent agreement of the owners, or the assistance of the court, remedial action would be almost impossible.

Disposition

I would allow the appeal, set aside the judgment of McGarry J., and make an order in terms of the draft order filed as Schedule C to the appellant's appeal factum. The appellant is entitled to costs of the appeal.

LASKIN J.A. (CARTHY J.A. concurring): --

Overview

I have read the reasons of my colleague McKinlay J.A. Regrettably, I am unable to agree with her conclusion or her proposed order.

I agree with McKinlay J.A. that the motion judge erred in holding that the appellant Royal Insurance Company of Canada was required to seek the approval of the unit owners under s. 38 of the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.26. I also agree that Royal is entitled to a termination order under s. 46(2) of the Condominium Act. Where I disagree with my colleague is on the scope of s. 46(3) of the Act. In my opinion, s. 46(3) does not permit the court to partition the property into two new and separate condominium corporations nor to force the objecting respondents to become unit owners in one of these new condominiums. I also disagree with Royal's alternative submission that it can accomplish its objective under s. 3(1) of the Partition Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.4, once a termination order is made.

Discussion

McKinlay J.A. has summarized the factual background. Royal seeks to terminate the existing condominium corporation, Middlesex Condominium Corporation No. 173 ("MCC 173"), and create two new condominium corporations, one residential and the other commercial. It seeks to do so to free up and develop the commercial space, now vacant. Most of the independent unit owners have consented to Royal's proposal. The owners of three units, however, have objected and Royal refuses to buy them out at fair market value. This impasse led to this litigation.

The respondent objectors allege that Royal misled the unit owners to convince the majority to go along with its proposal. Royal has denied these allegations. The validity of these allegations would be material if the court had to decide whether to exercise its discretion to grant the relief sought by Royal. In my view, however, the court has no discretion to exercise because neither s. 46(3) of the Condominium Act nor s. 3(1) of the Partition Act authorizes the order requested by the appellant.

The motion judge did not address s. 46 or s. 3(1) because, in his view, the condominium corporation had to comply with s. 38 of the Condominium Act. Section 38 provides a procedure for making changes to the common elements or assets of a condominium corporation and gives dissenting unit owners the right to have their unit and common interest purchased at fair market value. Section 38 contemplates an ongoing condominium corporation, not its termination. It does not apply to the relief sought by Royal.

The section of the Condominium Act relevant to Royal's application is s. 46. It states:

46(1) A corporation, any owner, or any person having an encumbrance against a unit and common interest, may apply to the Ontario Court (General Division) for an order terminating the government of the property by this Act.

(2) The court may order that the government of the property by this Act be terminated if the court is of the opinion that the termination would be just and equitable, and, in determining whether the termination would be just and equitable, the court shall have regard to,

(a) the scheme and intent of this Act;

(b) the probability of unfairness to one or more owners if termination is not ordered; and

(c) the probability of confusion and uncertainty in the affairs of the corporation or the owners if termination is not ordered.

(3) Where an order of termination is made under subsection (2), the court may include in the order any provisions that the court considers appropriate in the circumstances.

The relief sought by Royal requires three steps. Step 1 is an order terminating the government of the property by the Act. Step 2 is an order partitioning the property into two new and separate condominium corporations, one residential and one commercial. Step 3 is an order giving Royal power of attorney to sign the declaration for the new residential condominium corporation on behalf of the objectors so that the declaration can be registered. Step 1 can be ordered under s. 46(2) of the Condominium Act. Royal submits that steps 2 and 3 can be ordered either under s. 46(3) of the Condominium Act, invoking in aid s. 3(1) of the Partition Act, or under the Partition Act alone, once a termination order is made. Even then, the partition must be approved by the City of London under s. 50(20) of the Planning Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. P.13.

The respondent objectors acknowledge that Royal has satisfied the three conditions in s. 46(2) of the Condominium Act and is therefore entitled to a termination order. But Royal does not seek merely to terminate the existing condominium corporation. It also seeks to establish two new condominiums and to force the objectors to become unit owners in one of them. It contends that it can do so either by applying under s. 3(1) of the Partition Act or by using the Partition Act in conjunction with s. 46(3) of the Condominium Act. I do not think that Royal improves its position by going outside the Condominium Act and resorting to the Partition Act alone. The relief Royal asks for is an order establishing two new condominium corporations. That relief, if it lies anywhere, should lie in the Condominium Act. But nothing in that Act, or indeed in the Partition Act, expressly authorizes the court to order steps 2 and 3. I seriously doubt that either statute is broad enough to order step 2 and I am even more firmly of the view that they are not broad enough to order step 3.

Although s. 46(3) of the Condominium Act gives the court power to include in a termination order any provisions it considers appropriate, the section should be confined to its purpose. Section 46(3) is one of a series of provisions dealing with termination. Its purpose is to give the court wide latitude to include any provision that will make a termination order more effective. But Royal wishes to use s. 46(3) for a different purpose, to create new condominium corporations. I do not think that s. 46(3) can be used in that way.

If a termination order is made under s. 46(2) of the Act, the owners become tenants in common of the property. Step 2 calls for the court to use s. 3(1) of the Partition Act alone or in conjunction with s. 46(3) of the Condominium Act. Section 3(1) states: 3(1) Any person interested in land in Ontario, or the guardian of a minor entitled to the immediate possession of an estate therein, may bring an action or make an application for the partition of such land or for the sale thereof under the directions of the court if such sale is considered by the court to be more advantageous to the parties interested.

The court would have to use the Partition Act to sever the tenancy in common, divide the property into two parcels and permit Royal to establish two new and separate condominium corporations, all under s. 3(1) of that Act or under the umbrella of the remedial power in s. 46(3) of the Condominium Act. If the legislative drafters had intended the court to have such wide-ranging remedial power to affect the rights of condominium owners, it seems to me that they would have said so expressly. Moreover, the partition order sought by Royal runs up against s. 7 of the Condominium Act. Section 7(1) and (6) provide:

7(1) The owners are tenants in common of the common elements.

(6) Except as provided by this Act, the common elements shall not be partitioned or divided.

The termination sections of the Condominium Act contain no provision for partition of the common elements.

Assuming, however, that step 2 -- partition of the property and creation of two new condominium corporations -- can be ordered under s. 46(3) of the Condominium Act or under s. 3(1) of the Partition Act, step 3 calls for an even more drastic use of these provisions. Under step 3, the court is being asked to give Royal a power of attorney to sign the declaration for the objectors. A power of attorney is needed because s. 3 of the Condominium Act prohibits a declaration from being registered until it is signed by all the unit owners. Because the objecting unit owners will not consent to Royal's proposal and therefore will not sign the declaration for the proposed new residential condominium, Royal requires a power of attorney to implement its proposal.

To force the objectors to become unit owners of a new condominium corporation that they do not wish to be part of, in my view, goes beyond the court's power either under s. 46(3) of the Condominium Act or s. 3(1) of the Partition Act. The court is being asked not just to sever the objectors' interests in the existing condominium corporation but to require the objectors to join an entirely new entity against their will. This new entity would diminish the ownership interest of each objector. Under the existing condominium corporation, each objector has an ownership interest in both the residential and commercial common elements. Under Royal's proposal, each objector would lose his or her ownership interest in the commercial common elements. I do not think that the legislation allows the court to impose this proposal on the objectors. Indeed, I would think it odd that dissenting unit owners would have a right, as they do under s. 38, to be bought out if substantial changes are made to an existing condominium corporation, and yet have no such right when the existing corporation is replaced by two new corporations. This is simply another way of saying that, in my opinion, the legislation does not authorize the court to make the order requested by Royal.

I recognize the force of McKinlay J.A.'s observation that the order requested will likely benefit not just Royal but, as well, the independent unit owners, most of whom have endorsed Royal's proposal. However desirable the proposal may be for the majority of unit owners, the Act does not authorize it in the face of dissenting unit owners.

I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Re Middlesex Condominium Corporation No. 87 and 600 Talbot Street London Limited et al.*

37 O.R. (3d) 22

Docket No. C16901 Court of Appeal for Ontario, Finlayson, Osborne and Rosenberg JJ.A. February 6, 1998

Nick W. Fursman, for appellant. Robert Spence, for respondents.

The judgment of the court was delivered by

ROSENBERG J.A.:-- This is one of two appeals heard by this court that raise issues concerning remedies for allegedly improper disclosure to purchasers of condominium units. In this case and in Wellington Condominium Corp. No. 61 v. Marilyn Drive Holdings Ltd. [37 O.R. (3d) 1] the dispute concerns ownership of a superintendent's suite. The reasons in the two appeals are being released contemporaneously. For the reasons that follow, I would allow the appeal and require the corporate respondents to convey the suite to the condominium corporation.

The appellant is a condominium corporation created on December 17, 1986 as a result of the registration by the respondent, 600 Talbot Street London Limited, the developer and declarant of a declaration and description under the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.26. The appellant was created to control, manage and administer the common elements and the assets of the condominium located at 600 Talbot Street, in the City of London. The property consists of a ten-storey, 104-unit apartment building. The building superintendent resides in Unit 108. This unit is owned by the respondent 509543 Ontario Limited, a corporation associated with the declarant. The respondent, Elena Meta Blumas, is the wife of the major shareholder in the declarant and she also owns a unit in the condominium. As I understand it, Mrs. Blumas was included as a defendant in the original action because of a dispute over six parking spaces that were assigned for her exclusive use. The appellant has not pursued that issue in this appeal.

The Agreement of Purchase and Sale

This condominium was built over a period of three years between 1985 and 1987. Efforts to sell the units appear to have begun in 1985. At trial, promotional literature given to purchasers was introduced into evidence. A number of items are listed under the heading "Building Features" including "24 Hour on-site staff". The material also includes plans for the various floors. On the first floor, in the area surrounding the lobby, the plan shows a number of the common elements including the swimming pool, sauna, common lounge, communal storage and office. The material shows 108 units. The suite adjacent to the office is Unit 108 and is marked "sold". The purchasers were provided with an agreement of purchase and sale consisting of 65 pages. Copies of "Proposed Condominium Documents" were included as schedules to the agreement. By signing the agreement the purchaser acknowledged having received these documents. At least two of the important documents were not, in fact, provided to the purchaser at that time. Schedule "A" is described as a "Proposed Description to be provided by Farncomb & Kirkpatrick, Ontario Land Surveyors, when ready". No such description is included, apparently not being "ready" when most of the purchasers entered into their agreements. Schedule "C" is described as the "unit definition", but it too is not included. Many of the other documents are clearly not in final form and contain blank spaces in various places.

Schedule "B" is the "Proposed Declaration" and contains the following recital: "WHEREAS the Declarant has constructed a building upon the said lands containing one hundred and seven (107) dwelling units . . .". Schedule "F" is the "Proposed Disclosure Statement". As required by s. 52(6)(b) of the Condominium Act the disclosure statement contains a general description of the proposed property as follows: The property is located at 600 Talbot Street, in the City of London, in the County of Middlesex. The condominium will be a ten (10) storey building, containing one hundred and seven (107) residential units comprised of sixteen (16) one bedroom units, eighty-three (83) two bedroom units, and eight (8) three bedroom units, which includes a two bedroom dwelling unit set aside for use by a residential superintendent, which is located on part of the common elements. Each unit will have one exclusive-use parking space assigned to it in the Declaration. There also will be forty-three (43) additional parking units of which two (2) shall be available for the Declarant, its staff and agents, and the remaining forty-one (41) parking units available as visitors parking spaces.

Thus, although the promotional literature shows 108 units, the description refers to 107 units and to a two-bedroom unit located on the common elements for use by the resident superintendent. The only reasonable inference is that when the disclosure statement was drawn up the 108th unit was designated as a common element. Unit 108 is the obvious location for a superintendent's suite, being adjacent to the office and near the front lobby entrance. A superintendent has been living in Unit 108 since September 1986.

Section 52(6)(e) of the Act requires that the disclosure statement contain a budget statement for the one-year period immediately following registration of the declaration and description. The budget statement is attached as Schedule "G" to the agreement of purchase and sale and under the heading "Services" contains a line for "Superintendent [$]15,000". There is no allowance for the rental or carrying charges relating to the superintendent's suite. This, of course, is consistent with the general description which describes the superintendent's suite as a common element.

The provisions described above were included in all of the agreements of purchase and sale entered into prior to registration.

Events after Registration

As indicated, registration took place on December 17, 1986 and the appellant was created on that date. Final closing with respect to the various units took place following registration. One of the documents delivered to the purchasers was an estoppel certificate. The example of the certificate filed at trial is dated December 23, 1986. Although this certificate was given in the name of the condominium corporation it was signed by Mr. Edward Blumas, the principal of the declarant. The certificate declared that the disclosure statement and the budget statement "are in all material respects substantially identical" to the copy of the documents delivered to the purchasers when they entered into their agreements of purchase and sale. The certificate also stated that the corporation had no knowledge of any circumstances that might result in an increase in the common expense.

A letter delivered from the solicitors for the declarant to the solicitors for one of the unit purchasers dated December 17, 1986 was also introduced into evidence. That letter confirms that there is no material change from the proposed declaration attached to the original agreement of purchase and sale.

The trial judge found that the purchasers were not provided with a new disclosure statement or an amended disclosure statement containing a different general description of the property. The closing documents did include the declaration and a budget. The declaration now referred to 104 dwelling units. This change is apparently due to the fact that eight of the units were combined into four double-sized units and the declarant no longer included Unit 108 as a common element. A note to the budget statement now included the following:

SUPERINTENDENT

The superintendent is the employee of the manager or his assigns. A lease between the declarant and Advance Property Management Consultants Inc. for the period January 1, 1987 through December 31, 1988 has been executed which will maintain living quarters for the Superintendent.

The first meeting of the Board of Directors took place on January 13, 1987 and nominees of the declarant were elected as officers. In addition to the routine business that takes place at the first board meeting prior to turnover of the board to the unit owners, the minutes record the following under the heading "Budget":

The Chairman laid before the meeting the budget of the Corporation for the first year of operation. The Chairman on a point of clarification noted that the budgeted expense of $15,000 for the Superintendent, residing in Unit 108, included the provision of accommodation to the same, such accommodation being provided by 600 Talbot Street London Limited making the Unit available for rental at a rate of $850.00 per month.

This "point of clarification" appears to suggest that of the $15,000 budgeted for the superintendent, $850 per month, or over $10,000 annually was to go to the declarant as rent for the superintendent's suite. This would seem to leave very little in the budget to pay the superintendent's salary.

Following the turnover of the Board to the unit owners, the question of the superintendent's suite was raised at several of the meetings. For example, the minutes for the March 26, 1987 meeting record that a point was raised as to "the allocation of rents versus cash payment to the superintendent. The Board will request that [the property manager] reduce rent allocation." In the minutes for the board meeting of May 25, 1987 there is a note that:

Mr. Blumas [an associate of the declarant] indicated that a superintendent will be given a free unit and that payment will be made to [the property manager] from the Board.

Between June 1987 and November 1988 the Board and representatives of the declarant engaged in negotiations concerning the purchase by the appellant of Unit 108 for use by the superintendent. These negotiations fell through when Edward Blumas, the declarant's principal shareholder, stated that the units that he held would not contribute to the purchase of the unit for the superintendent through an increase in common expenses. Sometime in 1990, a new member of the Board was reviewing the various documents he had received when he purchased his unit. He noticed the discrepancy between what had been stated in the proposed disclosure and the position subsequently taken by the declarant concerning the superintendent's suite. In November 1991, the appellant brought this action for, inter alia, a declaration that Unit 108 forms part of the common elements, a mandatory order requiring the respondents to convey Unit 108 to the appellant, and damages pursuant to s. 52(5) of the Condominium Act. Several unit owners testified at trial. None of these witnesses testified that they relied upon the representation concerning the superintendent's suite in the proposed disclosure statement. As one owner put it, an apartment for the superintendent was not an issue. Most of the witnesses were primarily concerned with security and the fact that there would be 24-hour supervision on site.

THE REASONS OF THE TRIAL JUDGE

The trial was heard by Mr. Justice Flinn. He made a very strong finding of fact against the respondent declarant:

[It seems] to me that from the proposed disclosure statement there can be no doubt but that originally it was intended that the superintendent's apartments be on the common elements, not necessarily apartment 108 but perhaps that would make more sense than any other unit.

The developer had [subsequently] decided to skim off the unit originally thought to be part of the common elements.

(Emphasis added)

In his reasons, Flinn J. dealt only with the claim for damages under s. 52(5) of the Condominium Act. Section 52(5) provides as follows:

52(5) Where any statement or material required under this Act to be provided by a declarant or proposed declarant to a purchaser of a unit or proposed unit for residential purposes contains any material statement or information that is false, deceptive or misleading or fails to contain any material statement or information, the corporation or any unit owner who relied on such statement or material is entitled, as against the declarant or the proposed declarant to damages for any loss sustained as a result of such reliance.

(Emphasis added)

The trial judge found that the representation in the proposed disclosure statement concerning the superintendent's suite was false at the time that some of the purchasers entered into their agreements of purchase and sale. He was also satisfied that the statement was material. He expressed his reasons for that finding as follows:

Surely from the point of view of the condominium corporation the fact that a two-bedroom unit was represented to be part of the common elements and therefore property of the condominium corporation is material.

The only indication of value that we have is that found in the minutes where the representative of the owner purported to offer it for sale at $120,000. A representation with respect to something of that value is in my view material.

However, the trial judge dismissed the claim for damages on the basis that the appellant had failed to prove the element of reliance. The evidence from those owners who testified demonstrated that none of them gave any thought to this representation as being material. Further, it was clear from the declaration and the budget presented at closing that there were now 104 residential suites and that the residence for the superintendent was to be in rented premises. Flinn J. did not deal with the alternative relief sought by the appellant, namely, a declaration that Unit 108 was a part of the common elements and an order for conveyance of the unit to the appellant.

Mr. Justice Flinn made no order for costs. He gave these reasons for that order:

As to costs, the defendants say that costs should follow the event and as well there was an offer of settlement of Sept. 3/93 better than the result for the plaintiffs.

I have found that the proposed declaration was false. I have also had read into the evidence the discovery of Arthur Blumas, an officer of the developer. He was less than candid in giving that evidence, claiming that there was an amended statement and there was not, claiming a change of plan with respect to a live-in superintendent and there was not and finally squirming with respect to a defence and moving with the tide, making it somewhat difficult to present the claim. The defence should not be rewarded for that activity but rather chastised. There will be no order as to costs.

(Emphasis added) THE ISSUES

In its factum, the appellant conceded that the trial judge did not err in dismissing its claim based on s. 52 of the Condominium Act. Rather, it submitted that he erred in failing to deal with its claim for a declaration and conveyance of Unit 108 based upon the common law. The appellant relied upon this court's decisions in Frontenac Condominium Corp. No. 1 v. Joe Macciocchi & Sons Ltd. (1975), 11 O.R. (2d) 649, 67 D.L.R. (3d) 199 (C.A.), and York Condominium Corp. No. 167 v. Newrey Holdings Ltd. (1981), 32 O.R. (2d) 458, 122 D.L.R. (3d) 280.

The respondents cross-appeal from the trial judge's order with respect to costs.

As indicated, this appeal was heard with the appeal in Wellington Condominium Corp. No. 61 v. Marilyn Drive Holdings Ltd. The application and interpretation of s. 52 was an issue in that appeal. The court reserved its decision in both cases. Counsel were subsequently notified that the court wished to have submissions from counsel in this appeal as to the application of s. 52, notwithstanding the concession made by the appellant in its factum, and the impact of the recent decision of this court in Peel Condominium Corp. No. 417 v. Tedley Homes Ltd. (1997), 35 O.R. (3d) 257. We have received those submissions. Counsel for the appellant now relies upon s. 52 and seeks to overturn the trial judge's decision with respect to that section. Counsel for the respondents argues that this court should not entertain the argument based on s. 52. In view of my conclusion concerning the availability of the common law remedies I need not deal with the s. 52 issues in this appeal.

ANALYSIS

The appellant's submissions that it is entitled to a remedy at common law rely upon the decisions of this court in Frontenac Condominium Corp. No. 1 and Newrey Holdings Ltd. The respondents point out that those cases were based on the predecessor legislation that did not include the specific remedies with respect to disclosure now contained in s. 52 of the Condominium Act. It is the submission of the respondents that since the appellant's real complaint concerns the alleged false or misleading disclosure mandated by s. 52, the remedy, if any, must be found exclusively within s. 52. I will deal with those submissions after briefly reviewing these two cases.

Frontenac Condominium Corp. No. 1

In Frontenac Condominium Corp. No. 1 a dispute arose over the ownership of the superintendent's suite. When this case arose, in the early 1970s, the Condominium Act, 1967, S.O. 1967, c. 12, did not impose disclosure requirements on developers: see Abdool v. Somerset Place Developments of Georgetown Ltd. (1992), 10 O.R. (3d) 120 at pp. 130-31, 96 D.L.R. (4th) 449 (C.A.). Thus, the court had to determine the parties' intentions with respect to the superintendent's suite from the testimony of the purchasers and the developer's representatives, the various pieces of promotional literature, the prospectus and other evidence.

There are three sets of reasons for judgment in Frontenac Condominium Corp. No. 1. Brooke J.A. held that the condominium corporation had established that it was the intention of the developer that the purchasers should believe that the suite was a common element or would belong to the condominium corporation and that the purchasers did in fact hold that belief. He referred to a number of items of evidence to support his finding. These included the fact that the superintendent resided in a unit designated by a sign on its door. The purchasers were never told of any additional cost to purchase a unit for the superintendent. The prospectus showed an expense for a superintendent's salary, but no expense for rental or accommodation for the superintendent.

Zuber J.A. approached the issue as one involving the meaning to be given to the term "common elements". The developer relied upon the statutory definition of "common elements" being "all the property except the units". Zuber J.A. held that the statutory definition was not intended to be exhaustive. Rather, some sensible meaning must be given to the term. He commented at p. 663 that "the meaning attributed to common element by the defendant and not communicated to the purchasers should not displace the meaning to be collected from the context and the circumstances of the contract of sale" (at p. 663).

Zuber J.A. also referred to an argument made by the declarant that is similar to a submission made in this case. He notes the following at p. 662:

It is said on the other hand, that the fact that this condominium was advertised as a 70-unit condominium, was sufficient to convey to prospective purchasers that the superintendent's suite was not included. To arrive at the total of 70, one must include Suite 104. The defendant's argument continues that since the description "seventy units" must therefore have included the superintendents' suite, it must also have been clear that Suite 104 was a unit and not a common element. This argument inflicts upon the purchaser the duty to tour the building and count the units to determine whether or not Suite 104 was within or without the total. In my respectful view the simple statement of this proposition is sufficient demonstration of its untenability.

The respondents made a similar argument here. They point out in their factum that despite the description in the proposed disclosure statement, the declaration clearly showed that there were 104 units which "makes it abundantly clear that Unit 108 is one of the residential units and not part of the common elements". For the reasons expressed by Zuber J.A., I find this submission singularly unattractive. Zuber J.A. was satisfied that, based on the evidence, the superintendent's suite was a common element. Accordingly, a majority of the court ordered that the superintendent's suite be conveyed to the corporation.

MacKinnon J.A. dissented in Frontenac. He held that it was open to the trial judge to find, as he did, that there was no misrepresentation or fraud and that the purchasers were bound by the written contract and the other written documents. He was not prepared to "complement" these documents by the alleged oral representation by the developer's sales representative that the superintendent's suite was part of the common elements. He placed considerable emphasis on the lack of evidence of any statement by or on behalf of the declarant to contradict the paper title. The only oral representation relied upon by the corporation was a statement by a sales representative that she understood that, eventually, the superintendent's suite would become one of the common elements. He wrote, at p. 658, that there would have to be "some firm evidence of an undertaking or statement by or on behalf of the defendant, that Unit 104 was part of the common elements, in order for a court to hold (assuming no other obstacle) that the written contract and other documents, registered and otherwise, were complemented by this oral term, so as to form one comprehensive contract". In this appeal, of course, there is evidence of a firm undertaking in the proposed disclosure statement that was included with the agreement of purchase and sale and affirmed in the estoppel certificate and the letter from the declarant's solicitor.

The respondents argue that it is difficult to distil a principle from the various reasons for judgment in Frontenac. No doubt, the court was struggling with a new form of property ownership for Ontario. Established rules relating to real property law were apparently inadequate, at least with respect to issues concerning the common elements. In my view, the principle underlying the majority judgments can be found in the reasons of Brooke J.A. at p. 652:

I think it fair to say that the brochure [published by the developer] expresses in simple terms what the average person understands by condominium, that is to say, joint ownership, that each of the apartment or suite owners would own his own suite and have exclusive use of it and together they would jointly own the rest of the building and property or common elements. That no one including the developer, would be in a position to put his economic interests against the interest of the group so far as joint ownership, management or enjoyment of the property was concerned, save through a mortgage or similar interest.

(Emphasis added)

To vindicate the economic interests of the group, the court ordered the developer to deal with the superintendent's suite in accordance with the reasonable understanding or assumption the developer had promoted in the individual purchasers. The remedy adopted was to order the developer to convey the unit to the corporation.

Newrey Holdings Ltd. et al.

The second case relied upon by the appellant is Newrey Holdings. There were several issues in Newrey Holdings Ltd., including ownership of the superintendent's suite. Applying Frontenac Condominium Corp. No. 1, the trial judge held that the paper title showing ownership of the suite to be in the developer could only be overcome by evidence of a common intention on the part of the purchasers and the developer that the suite was to be part of the common elements or otherwise belong to the condominium corporation. He could not find such a common intention. Wilson J.A., writing for the court, held that notwithstanding the deference due the factual findings of a trial judge, the Court of Appeal was in as good a position as the trial judge to draw the appropriate inferences as to the common intention of the parties vis-à-vis the superintendent's suite. From her review of the evidence, Wilson J.A. was of the view that the evidence was sufficiently strong to overcome the registered title and she ordered a conveyance of the suite to the corporation. The evidence presented in that case was similar to the evidence in Frontenac in that the purchasers assumed that the superintendent's suite was part of the common elements.

Wilson J.A. relied upon several items of evidence to upset the finding of fact by the trial judge. The building was of such a size as to require a full-time live-in superintendent. The projected annual operating budget showed no item of expense for rental of a superintendent's suite but did show an item of expense for his salary. The declaration contained a note under the heading "Restricted Access" stating that without the consent of the Board, no owner shall have any right of access to "those parts of the common elements used from time to time as a dwelling for any building superintendent". Several of these features are also found in this appeal.

Wilson J.A. expressed some difficulty in eliciting a rule from the two judgments of the majority in Frontenac. As I read her reasons, however, she took, as the holding from the reasons for judgment in Frontenac, that even though no oral representation had been made concerning the superintendent's suite, the assumption by the purchasers that the suite would be a common element was justified and based upon the written material provided by the declarant. She explained the dissent by MacKinnon J.A. on the basis that absent a representation from the declarant, it was entitled to rely upon its registered title.

Newrey Holdings was thus a stronger case for the condominium corporation than Frontenac since there was a representation of sorts, in the declaration, to restricted access to certain of the common elements including the dwelling for the building superintendent. Accordingly, the declarant was required to convey the superintendent's suite to the corporation in accordance with the assumption that it had induced in the purchasers.

The principle underlying the holding in Newrey Holdings is similar to the principle expressed by Brooke J.A. in Frontenac. Wilson J.A. commented at p. 466 that special problems arise "out of the peculiar characteristics of ownership in a condominium project". Therefore, she questioned "the extent to which the ordinary law of contract and real property apply to sales of property about to be brought within the purview of the Condominium Act". She rejected the position advanced by the developer that it was entitled to rely on the registered title and that everything it had not contracted to sell at any given point of time prior to registration continued to belong to it absolutely. Wilson J.A. described the position of the developer once he had started to sell the units as follows, at p. 467:

I think he has . . . placed himself in a fiduciary relationship to the unit purchasers not only with respect to their units but also with respect to the interests appurtenant thereto. He therefore holds the property in trust for the unit purchasers, present and prospective, and for the condominium corporation which will come into being upon registration of the declaration. I believe he is under a duty to protect the interests of all unit owners present and prospective, and cannot put his own interests in conflict with theirs even although he himself continues to be an owner as long as any units remain unsold.

To summarize, Frontenac and Newrey Holdings stand for the proposition that with respect to the common elements, the declarant is bound not to prefer its interests over those of the group of unit owners. Where the reasonable interpretation of the evidence is that, notwithstanding the registered title, the declarant intended a reasonable purchaser to believe or to justifiably assume that the superintendent's suite was a common element or an asset of the corporation, the declarant will be required to convey the unit to the corporation. If this constituted a departure from established contract and real property law, it was a departure required by the exigencies of condominium ownership.

In my view, unless the enactment of s. 52 of the Condominium Act has overtaken the decisions in Frontenac and Newrey Holdings the appellant must succeed. At the time the agreements of purchase and sale were entered into, the declarant clearly stated that the superintendent's suite was one of the common elements. The declarant obviously intended the purchasers to rely upon the initial disclosure statement. There would seem to be no reasonable alternative inference to be drawn from the documentary evidence and the finding of fact by the trial judge that the declarant never delivered an amended disclosure statement. If the declarant wished to resile from that representation, its remedy was to provide an amendment to the disclosure. It never did so. To the contrary, in the estoppel certificate provided to purchasers before final closing, the corporation, which was still under the control of the declarant, represented that the disclosure and budget statements "are in all material respects substantially identical". Any reasonable purchaser reading the agreement of purchase and sale and the attached schedules, all of which were drafted by the declarant, would assume that the superintendent's suite was part of the common elements.

The respondents point to the finding by the trial judge that no owner testified at trial that they relied upon the representation concerning the superintendent's suite. They point out that the agreements of purchase and sale, including the schedules, were lengthy documents and that none of the purchasers testified that they had even noticed the reference to the superintendent's suite until well after the final closing. In my view, the fact that no unit owner came forward at trial to say that, had they known the declarant had changed its intention prior to closing they would have rescinded the agreement, is beside the point. Neither Newrey Holdings nor Frontenac impose such a condition on the condominium corporation's right to relief. To protect both the purchaser and the declarant the test surely must be an objective one. If the declarant caused the purchasers to assume that the superintendent's suite was a common element, and if a reasonable purchaser would make such an assumption, a matter of interpreting the disclosure documents, this is sufficient to overcome the registered title. The finding by the trial judge that the declarant "decided to skim off" the superintendent's suite prior to registration clearly engages the principle underlying the Frontenac and Newrey Holdings cases that a declarant cannot put its economic interests against those of the group.

Thus, unless the enactment of s. 52 demands a contrary result, I would require the respondents to convey Unit 108 to the appellant. I now turn to that issue.

The effect of s. 52 of the Condominium Act

The respondents rightly point out that Frontenac Condominium Corp. and Newrey Holdings Ltd. were decided before the statutory regime for disclosure as now contained in s. 52 of the Act was put in place. The respondents argue that if there has been a violation of the disclosure requirements mandated by s. 52, the purchaser or the condominium corporation is limited to the remedies provided in s. 52. In effect, the respondents argue that the pre-section 52 cases should no longer be followed. They submit that the legal principles underlying those decisions are somewhat obscure and that the subsequent enactment of s. 52 was in part intended to cure that uncertainty.

I agree with the respondents to this extent. The legislature obviously intended to provide greater protection to the consumer by imposing upon the declarant an obligation to make a minimum level of disclosure in clear and simple terms. In Abdool v. Somerset Place Developments of Georgetown Ltd., supra, at p. 131 Robins J.A. described that purpose in these terms:

Although s. 24b [of the predecessor legislation] was intended to ensure that a purchaser was fully informed of the nature of condominium ownership before executing an agreement of purchase and sale, it seems that in practice the complexity of the condominium documents and the high-pressure sales techniques used by some developers often frustrated this objective. To remedy this situation, the study group recommended, inter alia, that purchasers be provided with a summary statement highlighting important aspects of the documents and be given a ten-day cooling off period, during which they could cancel the agreement, to review the documents.

(Emphasis added)

The contents of the summary statement referred to by Robins J.A. are provided for in s. 52(6) and are described in that subsection as the disclosure statement. Pursuant to s. 52(6)(b) the declaration "shall" contain and "fully and accurately" disclose, inter alia:

(b) a general description of the property or proposed property including the types and number of buildings, units and recreational and other amenities together with any conditions that apply to the provision of amenities;

In resolving several of the issues in Abdool, Robins J.A. emphasized the importance of clarity and simplicity. Purchasers should be able to understand in general terms what they are obtaining by entering into the agreement, without having to wade through the vast amount of material that declarants wish to or are required to provide to complete a legally binding agreement. In that regard, Robins J.A. referred at p. 146 to the statement by the Minister on October 17, 1978 when the new legislation including s. 52 was introduced:

This is an attempt to make a disclosure statement meaningful in the sense that there is no point dumping a Xerox copy on them [the purchasers] at that stage and say here's what you are getting . . . Here we're talking about the disclosure statement which says to them in practical lay terms "This is what you're getting". It's more akin to advertising or the holding out as to what they're getting.

(Underlining added) Thus, an aspect of the disclosure requirement is to assist in resolving disputes between the declarant and the owners and the corporation about which assets and common elements are intended to be included in the purchase price. Prior to inclusion of disclosure requirements in the Condominium Act those issues had to be resolved by resort to a review of the oral and written representations made by the declarant and its agents.

Section 52(2) also gives the consumer an additional and simple remedy in the form of rescission of the agreement prior to final closing. Section 52(5) provides a statutory remedy for damages resulting from improper disclosure. However, I see nothing in s. 52 to persuade me that the legislature, in an effort to provide greater protection to the consumer, intended to abrogate existing common-law rights. Put another way, I see no reason why the declarant should not be required to comply with the material representations it has made, merely because those representations have been reduced to writing in the statutorily mandated disclosure statement. In each case it will be a question of fact as to whether the superintendent's suite was intended to be part of the common elements. In Peel Condominium Corp. No. 417 v. Tedley Homes Ltd., at p. 263, Robins J.A. held as follows:

It is also important to recognize that the Act does not require that guest and superintendent suites be part of the common elements of a condominium. Such suites are not part of the common elements unless there is factual evidence that this was intended to be the case.

(Emphasis added)

In support of this statement, Robins J.A. referred to Frontenac Condominium Corp. and to Newrey Holdings Ltd. without suggesting that he thought those decisions had been overtaken by s. 52. I am satisfied that these decisions have survived the enactment of s. 52 and that the remedies in that section are available in addition to the common law remedy.

I find further support for this view in the decision of Griffiths J. in York Condominium Corp. No. 420 v. Deerhaven Properties Ltd. (1982), 40 O.R. (2d) 106, 33 C.P.C. 65 (H.C.J.). This was another case where the condominium corporation claimed it was entitled to the superintendent's suite. In that case, the declarant argued that the corporation had no status to sue because of the wording of s. 14(2) of the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 84. Section 14(2) provides that the corporation may sue on its own behalf with respect to the common elements "notwithstanding that the corporation was not a party to the contract in respect of which the action is brought". This contrasted with the predecessor legislation that gave the corporation a broad right to bring "any action with respect to the common elements": Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 77, s. 9(18). The declarant argued at p. 108 that since the action was not based on breach of contract but rather a "cause of action for recovery of title to and possession of the superintendent's suite" the corporation had no status.

Griffiths J. held, at p. 109, that s. 14(2) "as remedial legislation should not be rigidly or narrowly construed to the extent it confers on the condominium a right to sue" and that, reasonably interpreted, the subsection conferred on the corporation "an unlimited right to sue with respect to common elements, and further extending that right by providing that an action in contract may be maintained by the corporation even though it was not a party to the contract". He held that the obvious intention of the legislature was not to restrict the broad power to sue previously enjoyed by the corporation under the predecessor legislation but to extend those powers. I would adopt the same approach in this case. Section 52 has provided the corporation with an additional remedy for false statements in the statutorily mandated material. It has not, however, restricted the corporation's broad right to maintain an action under s. 14(2) for the common law remedy sought here.

The respondents make one further argument. They point out that there is a superintendent's office that could be converted into a dwelling unit. In my view, this is no answer to the appellant's claim. The trial judge found that one of the 108 original units was to be a superintendent's suite and that the declarant then skimmed off the unit originally intended for that purpose. If the trial judge had thought that the availability of the office was compliance with the representation made in the disclosure statement he would not have made the findings that he did. In view of the findings of fact by the trial judge I would not accede to this argument by the respondents.

The appropriate remedy

The appellant did not seek an amendment to the declaration pursuant to s. 3(8) of the Act and it would not appear that it has given the notice required by that provision. It would therefore not be appropriate to amend the declaration to provide that Unit 108 is one of the common elements. The remedy, in my view, is to simply order the respondents to convey the unit and its appurtenant parking space to the appellant to be held as an asset of the corporation in accordance with s. 13 of the Act.

DISPOSITION

Accordingly, I would allow the appeal, set aside the judgment below, and in its place order the respondents 600 Talbot Street London Limited and 509543 Ontario Limited to convey Unit 108 together with its appurtenant parking space to the appellant, free of all encumbrances, to be an asset of the appellant. The appellant is entitled to its costs of the appeal and of the proceedings before Flinn J. In view of this disposition there is no need to deal with the cross-appeal which I would dismiss without costs. I would dismiss the appeal with respect to Mrs. Blumas without costs.

Appeal allowed.

Wellington Condominium Corporation No. 61 and Marilyn Drive Holdings Limited (Re)

37 O.R. (3d) 1

Docket No. C19870 Court of Appeal for Ontario Finlayson, Osborne and Rosenberg JJ.A. February 6, 1998

APPEAL from a judgment of Herold J. (1994), 20 O.R. (3d) 81, 41 R.P.R. (2d) 182 (Gen. Div.), dismissing an action by a condominium corporation for damages under s. 52(5) of the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.26.

Gary M. Caplan, for appellant. Jennifer A. Greenwood, for respondent.

The judgment of the court was delivered by

ROSENBERG J.A.: -- This is one of two appeals heard by this court that raise issues concerning remedies for allegedly improper disclosure to purchasers of condominium units. In this case, and in Middlesex Condominium Corp. No. 87 v. 600 Talbot Street London Ltd. [37 O.R. (3d) 22], the dispute concerns ownership of a superintendent's suite. The reasons in the two appeals are being released contemporaneously. The principal issue in this appeal is the interpretation of s. 52 of the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C. 26. For the reasons that follow I would allow the appellant's claim in part for damages under s. 52.

THE FACTS

The appellant is a condominium corporation created on January 21, 1991 as a result of the registration by 24 Marilyn Drive (Guelph) Limited, the developer and declarant, of a declaration and description under the Condominium Act. The appellant was created to control, manage and administer the common elements and the assets of the condominium located at 24 Marilyn Drive in the City of Guelph. The property consists of a 10-storey, 56-unit apartment building. The respondent is the successor to the developer/declarant.

On September 27, 1988, the declarant issued a disclosure statement as required by s. 52 of the Act. Section 52(6) requires that the disclosure statement include inter alia a general description of the property, including "units and recreational and other amenities", a brief description of the proposed declaration, by-laws and rules governing the use of common elements, and a budget statement for the one-year period immediately following the registration of the declaration and the description. Section 52(7) prescribes the contents of the budget statement. The statement must include inter alia the common expenses, "any current or expected fees or charges to be paid by unit owners or any of them for use of the common elements", and any "expenses that the declarant pays and that might reasonably be expected to become, at any subsequent time, a common expense".

The dispute in this case concerns whether a superintendent's suite, particularly Unit 201, is part of the common elements of the condominium and, if not, whether the appellant is entitled to damages for improper disclosure. Neither the draft declaration nor the disclosure statement, including the proposed budget, make special reference to Unit 201. Thus, the draft declaration identifies Unit 201 as having a proportionate interest in the common elements and common expenses. The budget statement does not mention any special assessment that might be necessary to acquire or rent Unit 201 from the declarant. The description of the property does not specifically refer to a superintendent's suite or to Unit 201 being part of the common elements.

The only mention of a superintendent is in the budget statement. Under the heading "Service Contracts", provision is made in the budget for the supply of a telephone in the "lobby office and for the superintendent". The following item appears under the heading "Staff":

Maintenance Man/Janitor $18,500

It is anticipated that one full time resident maintenance man/janitor will be hired for the condominium corporation. His duties will include the repair and maintenance of all mechanical systems in the building not covered by contract. He will also be responsible for the routine maintenance of other common area and finishings in the building.

(Emphasis added)

Article 11 of the draft declaration defines "common expenses" as the expenses of the performance of the objects and duties of the Corporation and includes those expenses set out in Schedule "E". Schedule "E" is headed "Common Expenses" and provides as follows:

All sums of money required by the Corporation for the acquisition or retention of real property for the use and enjoyment of the property, or for the acquisition, repair, maintenance or replacement of personal property for the use and enjoyment of the common elements.

(Emphasis added)

The proposed budget does not make any provision for rental of a suite for the resident superintendent nor is there any provision for the carrying costs of purchasing such a suite.

The condominium in question, 24 Marilyn Drive, was built for the declarant by Ray Ferraro. Mr. Ferraro had built several apartment complexes since 1979 and, in particular, he had also built 22 Marilyn Drive for this declarant. Although not a lawyer, Mr. Ferraro drafted the various condominium disclosure documents using precedents from other projects, especially from the 22 Marilyn Drive project. It was his understanding that the declarant intended to offer Unit 201 for sale to the appellant just as the developer had previously sold a unit to the condominium corporation at 22 Marilyn Drive for use as a superintendent's suite. If the appellant decided not to purchase Unit 201, the declarant planned to market the unit to the public.

Between the fall of 1988 and the summer of 1989 the declarant marketed and sold all of the units in the building, except for Unit 201. The declarant hired a full-time superintendent who lived in Unit 201 from February 1, 1989 until his resignation in November 1990. In November 1989, an informal association of resident purchasers was formed to represent their interests and deal with the declarant. An interim board of directors or executive was elected by this association. This executive, however, had no legal status and no funding. All unit purchasers had taken possession of their units by September 28, 1990. In December 1990, the declarant published an amended disclosure statement. Its contents did not vary or amend the provisions touching upon the superintendent or Unit 201.

On January 21, 1991, the declaration and description were registered, whereupon the appellant came into existence and the declarant became the registered owner of all units in the building, including Unit 201. The first general meeting of the condominium corporation took place on February 2, 1991. The three persons present for the meeting were the declarant's proxies and were elected to be the first directors. On February 5, 1991 and shortly thereafter, title closings took place, resulting in the unit owners receiving deeds to their respective units from the declarant. On title closing, each purchaser received an estoppel certificate which provided that the current budget was accurate, the appellant had no knowledge of any circumstances that may result in an increase in the common expenses and that "the [appellant] is not presently considering any substantial addition, alteration or improvement to or renovation of the common elements or any substantial change in the assets of the corporation". At this time, of course, the appellant was still controlled by the declarant through its nominees on the board of directors.

In resolving the issue of ownership of Unit 201, the trial judge emphasized the conduct of the members of the executive. On November 19, 1990, the executive met with the condominium manager who indicated that the declarant was prepared to sell Unit 201 for $125,000. The minutes of a further meeting of the executive in January 1991, show that there was a discussion about how the condominium corporation would accommodate a superintendent since Unit 201 was owned by the declarant. On April 8, 1991, the declarant wrote to the executive of the informal association asking if the Corporation (i.e., the appellant) would be interested in purchasing Unit 201. At this time, the executive still lacked formal legal status and, in fact, the declarant's own nominees were still in control of the appellant. The executive wrote back a week later indicating that the owners would be interested in acquiring the unit.

On May 7, 1991, the turnover meeting took place and the unit owners elected a board of directors from among their members, thus replacing the declarant's nominees. On May 16, 1991, the solicitor for the declarant wrote to the appellant asking if it wished to purchase Unit 201. The new board of directors wrote back indicating that the owners would be interested in acquiring the unit and asked for the terms the declarant would be willing to consider. On May 31, 1991, the declarant's solicitor replied indicating that the declarant was prepared to sell the unit for $125,000 cash. It would later transpire that the declarant was prepared to negotiate the price and to consider a vendor-take-back mortgage. After the resignation of the superintendent hired by the declarant, the appellant hired a resident in the building to take on the duties of superintendent. This resident occupied a unit owned by a relative, not Unit 201. His services were terminated in July 1991 and, thereafter, the appellant has relied upon the services of part-time superintendents and contract cleaners.

On July 15, 1991 this action was commenced and a certificate of pending litigation was registered against the title to Unit 201. In the statement of claim, the appellant sought a declaration that it was the owner of Unit 201 and damages for negligent misstatement and breach of statutory duty arising from the alleged false, deceptive and misleading contents of, and omissions contained in, material statements or information required by the declarant to be provided to a purchaser of a unit by the declarant, contrary to s. 52 of the Condominium Act.

At the trial, several unit purchasers testified about the superintendent's suite. In summary, the purchasers testified that they believed or understood that the condominium would have a full-time resident superintendent. This understanding was based on the disclosure statement, the fact that the superintendent hired by the declarant occupied Unit 201, that Unit 201 was listed at the front entrance as the superintendent's suite, and certain representations made by sales representatives. Several purchasers testified about what they would have done had they known that the declarant contemplated selling the unit to the condominium corporation with the resulting increase in common expenses. They testified that it was important that there not be any hidden costs or special assessments since they were on tight budgets. I will return to this evidence when reviewing the findings of fact made by the trial judge.

THE FINDINGS OF FACT BY THE TRIAL JUDGE

The action was dismissed with costs by Herold J. His reasons are now reported at (1994), 20 O.R. (3d) 81, 41 R.P.R. (2d) 182 (Gen. Div.). Herold J. made findings of fact that are important in the resolution of the issues raised in this appeal. They may be summarized as follows:

- (i) Most, if not all, of the purchasers entered into the transaction on the understanding that there would be a full-time on-site resident superintendent.
- (ii) Although the association executive had no legal status until the turnover, it was representative of the unit purchasers and responsive to them and consulted from time to time with solicitors to obtain legal advice. At least by the January 9, 1991 meeting, the executive was aware that ownership of Unit 201 was an issue.
- (iii) The declarant also intended that there be a permanent live-in superintendent.
- (iv) None of the purchasers who testified stated that they intended that Unit 201 or a similar unit would belong to the appellant, at no cost to them. Rather they simply did not direct their minds to that issue.
- (v) The declarant never had the intention that Unit 201 be part of the common elements without any cost to the appellant or the unit purchasers. Further, it was doubtful that the purchasers had this intention.

THE ISSUES

The appellant raised two issues before Herold J. It argued that there was a common intention between the declarant and the unit purchasers that Unit 201 would be an asset of the appellant at no cost to the purchasers. The appellant relied upon the decisions of this court in Frontenac Condominium Corp. No. 1 v. Joe Macciocchi & Sons Ltd. (1975), 11 O.R. (2d) 649, 67 D.L.R. (3d) 199, and York Condominium Corp. No. 167 v. Newrey Holdings Ltd. (1981), 32 O.R. (2d) 458, 122 D.L.R. (3d) 280. The appellant therefore sought the remedy granted in those cases requiring the respondent to convey title in Unit 201 to the appellant.

In the alternative, the appellant sought damages pursuant to s. 52(5) of the Condominium Act. As I understand it, the appellant seeks damages sufficient to allow it to purchase either Unit 201 or another unit for use by a resident superintendent.

For the reasons that follow, I would dismiss the claim based on the common law cause of action. I would only allow in part the appellant's claim for damages, limiting the award to the carrying costs for purchase of a unit for use by the superintendent for the first year following registration.

ANALYSIS The Legislative Scheme

Although the resolution of this appeal revolves primarily around the interpretation of s. 52 of the Condominium Act, certain other provisions of the Act are important and I intend to briefly review some aspects of the legislative scheme. Some of the issues in this appeal concern the nature of the appellant's status as a condominium corporation and the nature of the common elements.

Section 3 of the Act sets out the mandatory and permitted contents of the declaration. Pursuant to s. 7 of the Act, the unit owners are tenants in common of the common elements and an undivided interest in the common elements is appurtenant to each unit. Under s. 10, the registration of a declaration and description of the project creates a condominium corporation without share capital "whose members are the owners from time to time". Pursuant to s. 12, the objects of the corporation are to manage the property and any assets of the corporation. The corporation has a duty to control, manage and administer the common elements and the assets of the condominium corporation. Section 13 provides that the owners share the assets of the corporation in the same proportions as the proportions of their common interests in accordance with the Act, the declaration and the by-laws.

Section 14 gives the corporation its power to sue for damages and sue with respect to the common elements. It is in the following terms:

14(1) The corporation after giving written notice to all owners and mortgagees may, on its own behalf and on behalf of any owner, sue for and recover damages and costs in respect of any damage to common elements, the assets of the corporation or individual units . . .

(2) The corporation after giving written notice to all owners and mortgagees may sue on its own behalf and on behalf of any owner with respect to the common elements and any units, even if the corporation was not a party to the contract in respect of which the action is brought . . .

Section 52 is the section most directly at issue in this case. For this appeal, the important provisions of that section are the following:

52(1) An agreement of purchase and sale entered into after the 1st day of June, 1979 by a declarant or proposed declarant of a unit or proposed unit for residential purposes is not binding on the purchaser until the declarant or proposed declarant has delivered to the purchaser a copy of the current disclosure statement and all material amendments thereto.

(2) The purchaser, before receiving delivery of a deed to or transfer of the unit, may rescind the agreement of purchase and sale within ten days after receiving the disclosure statement or, where there has been a material amendment thereto, within ten days after receiving the material amendment.

(3) A person may rescind an agreement of purchase and sale under subsection (2) by giving written notice of the rescission to the declarant or proposed declarant or to the solicitor of the declarant or proposed declarant.

(5) Where any statement or material required under this Act to be provided by a declarant or proposed declarant to a purchaser of a unit or proposed unit for residential purposes contains any material statement or information that is false, deceptive or misleading or fails to contain any material statement or information, the corporation or any unit owner who relied on such statement or material is entitled, as against the declarant or the proposed declarant to damages for any loss sustained as a result of such reliance.

(6) The disclosure statement referred to in subsection (1) shall contain and fully and accurately disclose,

(b) a general description of the property or proposed property including the types and number of buildings, units and recreational and other amenities together with any conditions that apply to the provision of amenities;

(d) a brief narrative description of the significant features of the existing or proposed declaration, by-laws and rules governing the use of common elements and units, and of any contracts or leases that may be subject to termination or expiration under section 39;

(e) a budget statement for the one year period immediately following the registration of the declaration and the description . . .

(7) The budget statement mentioned in clause (6)(e) shall set out,

(a) the common expenses;

(b) the proposed amount of each expense;

(c) particulars of the type, frequency and level of the services to be provided; (d) the projected monthly common expense contribution for each type of unit;

(h) any current or expected fees or charges to be paid by unit owners or any of them for the use of the common elements or part thereof and other facilities related to the property;

(i) any services not included in the budget that the declarant or proposed declarant provides, or expenses that the declarant or proposed declarant pays and that might reasonably be expected to become, at any subsequent time, a common expense and the projected common expense contribution attributable to each of those services or expenses for each type of unit;

(8) Where the total amount incurred for the common expenses provided for in the budget statement exceeds the total of the proposed amounts set out in the statement, for the period covered by the budget statement mentioned in clause (6)(e) the declarant shall forthwith pay to the corporation the amount of the excess except in respect of increased expenses attributable to the termination of an agreement under section 39.

Common Intention

The appellant's submissions with respect to common intention rely in part upon the decisions of this court in Frontenac Condominium Corp. No. 1 and Newrey Holdings Ltd. In my reasons for judgment in Middlesex Condominium Corp. No. 87 v. 600 Talbot Street London Ltd. I have discussed those decisions and I need not repeat that discussion here.

In Middlesex Condominium Corp. No. 87 v. 600 Talbot Street London Ltd., I held that the common law cause of action and remedy established in Frontenac and Newrey Holdings has survived the subsequent enactment of s. 52 of the Act. However, that cause of action depends upon a finding that the declarant intended that the purchasers believe the superintendent's suite was to be a common element and that a reasonable purchaser would assume that the superintendent's suite was a common element. In this case, Herold J. found, as a matter of fact, that it was not the common intention or understanding of the parties that the superintendent's suite would be a common element. While it would have been open to a trier of fact to reach another conclusion, that finding is supported by the evidence. As Robins J.A. wrote in Peel Condominium Corp. No. 417 v. Tedley Homes Ltd. (1997), 35 O.R. (3d) 257 at p. 263 (C.A.), in each case it will be a question of fact as to whether the superintendent's suite is part of the common elements:

It is also important to recognize that the Act does not require that guest and superintendent suites be part of the common elements of a condominium. Such suites are not part of the common elements unless there is factual evidence that this was intended to be the case . . .

(Emphasis added)

The trial judge was not prepared to find such an intention and I see no basis for overturning that finding. If the appellant in this case was entitled to a remedy it would have to be found in s. 52 of the Condominium Act. I turn to that issue now.

Section 52 of the Condominium Act

The Trial Judge's Reasons

I have set out s. 52 of the Act above. The appellant relies upon s. 52(5) to provide a remedy and submits that the trial judge erred in his interpretation of that provision. Section 52(5) provides as follows:

(5) Where any statement or material required under this Act to be provided by a declarant or proposed declarant to a purchaser of a unit or proposed unit for residential purposes contains any material statement or information that is false, deceptive or misleading or fails to contain any material statement or information, the corporation or any unit owner who relied on such statement or material is entitled, as against the declarant or the proposed declarant to damages for any loss sustained as a result of such reliance.

(Emphasis added) The trial judge found that there had been a material omission from the disclosure statement. He held that the possibility the appellant could acquire an asset worth $125,000 was material and should have been disclosed.

The trial judge went on to consider whether the appellant had proved that "its members, the unit purchasers, relied on this omission in any way and whether as a result of this reliance they sustained damages in a proven amount or at all". The trial judge reviewed at length the evidence called by the appellant. Much of this evidence concerned the role of the executive of the informal association and their knowledge of the issue concerning the superintendent's suite prior to closing. The trial judge did not find that the executive could in any way bind the other unit purchasers or the corporation. He did find it significant, however, that although these purchasers were aware of the dispute they had not taken any steps to resolve the issue prior to closing their own units. The trial judge concluded that the appellant had not established the necessary element of reliance [p. 102]:

In all of the circumstances, I am simply unable to conclude or infer that the plaintiff or its members relied upon the fact that a superintendent's suite, whether suite 201 or otherwise, was to be a common element of the plaintiff or otherwise an asset owned by the plaintiff corporation free of charge.

Finally, the trial judge held that, in any event, the appellant had failed to prove either that it suffered any damages as a result of the material omission, or if it did, the amount of those damages.

The Section 52 Issues

The appellant's submissions raise three issues concerning the interpretation of s. 52(5) of the Act, namely:

- (1) What is the meaning of the term "material statement or information" in s. 52(5)?
- (2) Where the action is brought by the condominium corporation that was not a party to the agreements of purchase and sale, must it prove "reliance"?
- (3) What is the measure of damages for improper or inadequate disclosure?

Abdool v. Somerset Place Developments of Georgetown Ltd.

The leading decision on the interpretation of s. 52 of the Condominium Act is the decision of Robins J.A. in Abdool v. Somerset Place Developments of Georgetown Ltd. (1992), 10 O.R. (3d) 120, 96 D.L.R. (4th) 449 (C.A.). The issues in Abdool concerned the rescission remedy provided by s. 52(1) and (2). However, Robins J.A. also gave some consideration to s. 52(5) and the relationship between the damage remedy provided in that subsection and the rescission remedy. One of the issues in Abdool was whether a purchaser was entitled to rescind the agreement of purchase and sale after the ten-day cooling-off period provided for in

s. 52(2). It had been argued that once this period had expired, and provided it was not revived by delivery of a material amendment, the purchaser's sole remedy for alleged improper disclosure was damages under s. 52(5). Robins J.A. disagreed and held that if the disclosure statement does not comply with s. 52 in a material respect, it is not a disclosure statement within the meaning of s. 52(1) and the agreement of purchase and sale is not binding. It was within this context that Robins J.A. considered the damage remedy provided for in s. 52(5). In particular, at p. 135 he held that by giving unit owners a cause of action in damages without regard to whether they knew of the disclosure defects before closing, s. 52(5) "eliminates any question of merger on closing and provides purchasers with protection in addition to that provided by other subsections of s. 52".

Having held that an agreement of purchase and sale was not binding if the disclosure did not comply with s. 52, Robins J.A. went on to consider the type of defects that would render the agreement non-binding. In developing the appropriate test, he took into account the rights of both parties to the agreement. He noted, at p. 136, that while the purchaser is entitled to the information called for in the Act, after the ten-day cooling-off period the declarant is entitled to assume that it has a binding agreement and to order its affairs accordingly. In that context, to allow the purchaser to rescind is a drastic remedy and should require the purchaser to meet a relatively strict test. The purchaser was required to show that the disclosure statement was "defective in a material respect". He expanded on this test at pp. 138-39 as follows: If, as I have concluded, only material departures from these provisions warrant declaring an otherwise valid agreement non-binding, when is a defect to be considered material? To invoke a common dictionary meaning of "material", when is a defect so pertinent, germane or essential as to render a disclosure statement in contravention of the Act and entitle a purchaser to cancel a transaction?

I approach this question first by reference to the applicable burden of proof. In my opinion, when a purchaser who has had the opportunity afforded by the cooling off period to consider the disclosure statement and the accompanying documentation, and has decided to go through with the transaction, subsequently seeks to rescind from his or her otherwise binding agreement of purchase and sale on the basis of the deficiency of the disclosure statement, the onus is on the purchaser to show that the disclosure statement fails to satisfy the requirements of the Act to the degree that the agreement must be declared non-binding.

To discharge this onus and prove the materiality of the complaint, in my opinion, the purchaser is obliged to establish objectively that had the information that was not disclosed, or that was inaccurately or insufficiently disclosed, been properly disclosed in the disclosure statement at the time it was delivered to the purchaser, a reasonable purchaser would have regarded the information as sufficiently important to the decision to purchase that he or she would not likely have gone ahead with the transaction but would instead have rescinded the agreement before the expiration of the 10-day cooling off period.

Robins J.A. also dealt with the related question of what constitutes a material amendment so as to revive the right of rescission under s. 52(2). At pp. 149-50, he adopted a similar test, having regard to the fact that the remedy is the same, namely, rescission of the agreement:

In the interests of consistency, I would determine the materiality of a change or amendment to the originally-delivered disclosure statement by reference to a test similar to that which I formulated earlier to determine the materiality of an alleged defect in a disclosure statement. Would a reasonable purchaser regard the change or amendment as sufficiently important to his or her decision to purchase that, had the disclosure statement contained the new or amended information at the time it was delivered, the purchaser would not likely have gone ahead with the transaction but would have rescinded the agreement within the 10-day period? If the answer to this question is in the affirmative, the developer is obliged to deliver an amendment to the disclosure statement and the purchaser has 10 days from the date of delivery within which to rescind.

Amendments that substantially change a purchaser's anticipated use and enjoyment of the unit or the amenities associated therewith or that adversely affect the value of the unit, are, I would think, clearly material amendments that revive the rescission period. A reasonable purchaser could objectively assert that he or she would not have proceeded with the deal had this information been available at the time of the original disclosure statement. However, given the lifestyle aspects of condominium living, there may well be situations in which the individual circumstances of a particular purchaser may render an amendment which is not material to other purchasers, and which indeed may be acceptable to other purchasers in a given project, none the less material to this purchaser. The extent to which subjective considerations may reasonably be asserted in determining the materiality of the new or amended information is not before the court in these appeals and need not be considered. Nor is it necessary to consider the applicability of the principles of waiver or estoppel when a purchaser seeks to rescind on the basis of an undelivered material amendment of which the purchaser has had actual knowledge.

(Emphasis added)

As is apparent, Robins J.A. was dealing with materiality solely for the purposes of invoking the rescission remedy after the initial ten-day cooling-off period had expired, and thus, after the declarant could reasonably assume that it had a binding agreement. The issue presented by this appeal is whether that same test applies within the context of s. 52(5) in considering the phrase "material statement or information" in that subsection. For the reasons that follow, I would hold that it does not.

Material statement or information under s. 52(5) of the Condominium Act

In view of the different remedies and the different wording of the subsections I would adopt a different test under s. 52(5) than the test set out in Abdool. In Abdool, Robins J.A. was concerned with a type of defect that would render an apparently binding agreement unenforceable. It is entirely appropriate in that context that the test of materiality be commensurate with the nature of the remedy. Where, however, the plaintiff does not seek to set aside the agreement but seeks only damages for the loss occasioned by the defective disclosure, a less rigorous test is appropriate. Further, in Abdool, the court was concerned with statutory language referring to a "material amendment". The language of s. 52(5) is broader and refers to "any material statement or information" and provides a remedy not only for false, deceptive or misleading disclosure, but disclosure that "fails to contain" any material statement or information.

Another reason for adopting a different test lies in the fact that s. 52(5) gives a remedy to the condominium corporation as well as the unit owner. In my view, by providing that the corporation is entitled to damages, the legislature must have envisaged that there could be a loss to the owners as a group, as represented by the corporation. This loss, while significant to the owners as a whole, might not be sufficiently material that any individual owner would have considered rescission.

There is a related reason for giving s. 52(5) a different meaning where the condominium corporation is the plaintiff. The corporation was not a party to the original agreement of purchase and sale. Indeed, it did not exist at that time. In those circumstances, it is difficult to apply a test of materiality premised on rescission of that agreement.

My approach to the interpretation of s. 52(5) is nevertheless similar to the approach of Robins J.A. in Abdool. The alleged false, deceptive or misleading statement or information or omission must have the quality about it that is commensurate with the remedy. At pp. 136-37 Robins J.A. expressed the concern that agreements should not be rendered unenforceable by "technical deficiencies or immaterial omissions in a disclosure statement". He pointed out that contracting parties owe one another "a duty to act reasonably and in good faith and to perform contracts honestly made" and that the consumer protection objects of the legislation must be balanced with the commercial realities of the condominium industry. As he said: "Consumer protection legislation intended, as this Act is, to promote fair dealing between contracting parties, ought not to be applied in a manner which produces the opposite result by allowing a party to resile from an otherwise valid agreement on grounds that are unfair, unreasonable or capricious."

In Abdool, Robins J.A. referred to the burden of proof in applying the test for materiality. He wrote that the onus was on the purchaser to show that the disclosure statement was so defective that the agreement must be declared non-binding. Taking a similar approach, but in the context of s. 52(5), the onus is on the corporation to show that the degree of deficiency in the disclosure is such that it has occasioned a loss or expense to the unit owners as a whole that can be measured in damages. Not every defect or omission will have this effect so as to warrant a remedy. Mere technical departures from the requirements of s. 52 will not suffice. On the other hand, to properly balance the "consumer protection and commercial realities of the condominium industry", to quote Robins J.A. in Abdool, supra, at p. 145, the approach must be a broad and flexible one, not a rigid or stringent one. Otherwise, a legitimate claim for damages would be defeated because the corporation could not demonstrate that any of the purchasers would have resorted to the drastic remedy of rescission.

In this case, the appellant's principal argument for damages related to the declarant's statements about, and omissions concerning, the superintendent's suite. Where there is a dispute about an asset such as a superintendent's suite, it seems to me that the proper approach is for the court to determine whether a reasonable purchaser would think that the asset was part of the purchase price. [See Note 1 at end of document] Further, consistent with the consumer protection aspect of this legislation, and the fact that it is the declarant who drafts the disclosure statement, it is reasonable to interpret any ambiguity in the disclosure statement against the declarant.

While Herold J. did not expressly deal with this question, it seems to me that his findings concerning the common law remedy based upon common intention are consistent only with the conclusion that a reasonable purchaser would not have considered that a superintendent's suite was included in the purchase price or that the corporation was to have the suite at no cost. In any event, in view of his findings of fact I cannot find that a reasonable purchaser would think, based on the representations in the disclosure documents, that a superintendent's suite was to be an asset of the corporation without any cost to the purchasers.

Further, in my view, Herold J. erred in finding a material omission because the declarant did not disclose the possibility it would sell the unit to the corporation. He held as follows [at p. 95]:

In my view, the possibility that the condominium corporation could acquire from the developer an asset at its fair market value of approximately $125,000, and the costs associated with such an acquisition are material and the possibility at least that the corporation might incur such expenses are something that a reasonable purchaser would have wanted to see in the disclosure documents. That is, they are in my view material.

The finding that the declarant's failure to disclose the possibility that it would sell the suite for approximately $125,000 implies that the Condominium Act mandates such disclosure. In my view, this imposes far too onerous an obligation on the declarant and is not a duty imposed by the statute. As Robins J.A. pointed out in Tedley Homes Inc., supra, at p. 263, as presently drafted the Condominium Act provides that the declaration must contain the items specified in s. 3(1) and may contain the items set out in "the broadly permissive provisions of s. 3(3)". Pursuant to s. 3(3)(b) the declaration may contain provisions "respecting the occupation and use of the . . . common elements". However, there is no requirement that the declaration state whether or not a superintendent's suite is intended to be a common element and s. 52(6) does not require any such statement in the disclosure statement.

In Tedley Homes Inc., Robins J.A. stated that whether certain amenities should be included in the common elements is a matter of policy for the legislature, not the judiciary. Similarly, whether or not the declarant should be required to expressly state whether a superintendent's suite is part of the common elements and, if not, whether such a suite will be made available for purchase by the corporation must also be a matter for the legislature. In the absence of a statutory requirement of that nature I fail to see why, as was held by the trial judge in this case, the declarant should have disclosed the mere "possibility" that the corporation "might incur" the expense of purchasing a superintendent's suite at a cost of approximately $125,000, depending upon the wishes of the owners' board of directors.

However, the trial judge's findings do disclose a false, deceptive or misleading statement or information or omission of a material statement or information within the meaning of s. 52(5) with respect to the budget statement for the one-year period immediately following registration as required by s. 52(6)(e). The contents of that statement are mandated by s. 52(7). For convenience, I shall repeat cls. (d), (h) and (i) of s. 52(7):

52(7) The budget statement mentioned in clause (6)(e) shall set out,

(d) the projected monthly common expense contribution for each type of unit;

(h) any current or expected fees or charges to be paid by unit owners or any of them for the use of the common elements or part thereof and other facilities related to the property;

(i) any services not included in the budget that the declarant or proposed declarant provides, or expenses that the declarant or proposed declarant pays and that might reasonably be expected to become, at any subsequent time, a common expense and the projected common expense contribution attributable to each of those services or expenses for each type of unit . . .

Thus, these clauses refer to "expected" fees and expenses that the unit owners may incur. In view of the information in the budget statement provided to the purchasers that it was "anticipated that one full-time resident maintenance man/ janitor" would be hired, expenses for housing that person could reasonably be expected to become a common expense. Accordingly, the first-year costs to the purchasers of providing that accommodation should have been disclosed. The failure to make this disclosure could reasonably be expected to involve the purchasers in expenses that can be quantified in damages. I reach this conclusion primarily on the basis of the finding of fact by the trial judge that "there can be no doubt that both the developer and the unit purchasers always intended that the building would have a permanent live-in superintendent".

Accordingly, just as the declarant properly showed projected expenses relating to the salary and telephone for the superintendent, it should also have set out the expenses associated with providing accommodation for the "resident" or "permanent live-in" superintendent. This additional expense could be calculated on the basis of the costs associated either with renting a unit for the year following registration or the carrying charges for the year if Unit 201 or some other unit were purchased. Since I have found that the budget statement failed to contain a material statement or information, I turn to the question of reliance.

Reliance Where the Action for Damages is Brought by the Corporation

Although he found that there had been a material omission, the trial judge held that the appellant failed to prove reliance. The trial judge placed considerable emphasis upon the fact that none of the executive members who knew about the problem with Unit 201 elected to resolve the issue or attempted to rescind their agreements prior to closing. Accordingly, he found that the unit owners did not rely upon the material omission. In my view, the trial judge erred. His approach was more suitable to a case where an individual owner seeks rescission prior to closing or seeks damages after closing for the loss that he or she has personally suffered. It is not an approach that I find helpful where the action is brought by the corporation on behalf of the owners as a whole.

Section 52(5) includes both objective and subjective elements. Where a unit owner alleges that he or she has personally suffered damages as a result of the improper disclosure, it would seem that the owner must show actual reliance upon the improper disclosure. The issue of reliance where, as here, it is alleged that the damage has been sustained by the unit owners as a whole as represented by the corporation is more difficult. I cannot accept that the legislature intended that the corporation in an action under s. 52(5) must adduce evidence from each of the unit owners that they relied upon the omission. I also find it difficult to accept that the measure of damages would be different depending on the number of owners the corporation was able to show did rely upon the inadequate disclosure.

Such an interpretation would also be inconsistent with other parts of the legislative scheme. The primary responsibility of the corporation is to manage the assets. It also has a duty to control and administer the common elements and the assets and has the power to own and acquire real property for the use and enjoyment "of the property" (s. 13(1)). Most importantly, s. 14(2) of the Act provides that the corporation may sue on its own behalf with respect to the common elements "even if the corporation was not a party to the contract in respect of which the action is brought". These provisions manifest a legislative intention that the corporation be entitled to recover damages where the real injury is to the owners as a group rather than to any individual.

Further, in s. 52(5), the legislature has given the corporation the power to recover damages for false statements that were not made to it and upon which it therefore could not have relied. I cannot accept that the legislature nevertheless intended that the corporation prove it actually relied upon those statements. In my view, actual reliance need only be proved where the unit owner brings an action for damages.

A much more reasonable approach to reliance in the context of the condominium corporation would require the corporation merely to demonstrate that it cannot reasonably carry out its duty to control, manage and administer the common elements and the assets of the corporation (s. 12(2)) and to manage the property (s. 12(1)) without incurring the expense occasioned by the false, deceptive or misleading statement or information or the expense that should have been disclosed in the disclosure statement. Dealing particularly with the first-year budget statement, it is clear to me that the legislature has manifested an intention that purchasers know with a relatively high degree of certainty the expenses they are likely to incur within the first year. This intention is exhibited not only in the provisions of s. 52(7) set out above, but in the provisions of s. 52(8). That subsection requires, with an exception not relevant to this case, that the declarant "shall forthwith pay" the total amount incurred for the common expenses provided for in the budget statement that exceeds the total of the proposed amounts set out in the statement for the one-year period immediately following registration.

In my view, the appellant has demonstrated the requisite degree of reliance. On the evidence, all of the parties envisaged it reasonable for there to be a resident superintendent so that the corporation could properly manage the common elements, the assets of the corporation and the property. The trial judge seems to have been of the same view. As pointed out above, he found that "there can be no doubt that both the developer and the unit purchasers always intended that the building would have a permanent live-in superintendent". However, because of the inadequate disclosure by the declarant no provision was made in the budget for housing this superintendent. The remaining issue concerns the question of damages.

Damages

Although he found that there was no reliance and therefore the appellant was not entitled to succeed in its damage claim, the trial judge did go on to consider the issue of damages. The evidence adduced by the appellant was that a resident superintendent, in a comparable building, who was given rent-free accommodation, was paid approximately $18,000 to $19,500. There was other evidence from the respondent's witness that a superintendent's services in a smaller building could be obtained for $16,500, even though the superintendent had to rent his own unit in the building from a private owner. Finally, there was the evidence of the experience of the tenant/superintendent who was paid $1,500 per month and who lived in a suite provided by a relative. Based on this evidence, the trial judge concluded as follows [at p. 103]:

... I am unable to conclude that the plaintiff would be paying a live-in superintendent any more than the $18,500 provided for in the budget and it is entirely conceivable that if they were able to offer free accommodation that the appropriate salary would be substantially less. The plaintiff was not prepared to concede that if in fact the budgeted amount of $18,500 was too high the amount by which it exceeds the actual salary paid to a live-in superintendent with free rent should be credited against the costs of carrying the acquired unit in assessing what damages if any have been sustained but I am unable to agree with its position in this regard. As stated earlier, the plaintiff must prove its damages and I must conclude that neither the fact of, nor the amount of any such damages have been proven on the balance of probabilities.

Notwithstanding his error as to the nature of the material omission, in my view, the trial judge properly focused on the additional expense to the corporation as a result of the omission. The impediment to proof of damages, according to the trial judge, was that it was possible the appellant could find a superintendent who would work for less than the $18,500 projected in the budget statement, if free accommodation were provided. The difference might or might not be sufficient to carry the purchase of or rental of a unit, but it was for the appellant to prove that it had suffered damages.

Notwithstanding the deference due to findings of fact by the trial judge, in my view, the finding that the $18,500 estimate included by the declarant in the first-year operating budget would cover anything other than salary is not supported by the evidence. The evidence of the respondent's own witness, Mr. Ferraro, who prepared the budget, was that the $18,500 was for salary and did not include any allowance for rent. Ms. Rutch, the former condominium manager, testified that the salary paid to the superintendent at the somewhat larger sister building at 22 Marilyn Drive was $19,500 and that he lived rent-free. In my view, there is no basis for assuming that any portion of the $18,500 estimate in the budget would be sufficient to carry the purchase of or rental of a superintendent's unit for a year. The only evidence to the contrary concerned the salary apparently paid to the superintendent in a smaller building. That evidence was simply too vague and uncertain to undermine the weight of the evidence that was all the other way.

In my view, the appellant proved that it suffered damages within the meaning of s. 52(5) as a result of the improper disclosure. The quantification of those damages is somewhat problematic. So far as I can tell from the record, the parties did not expressly address the issue of the carrying costs or rent of a unit for the superintendent. However, the trial judge accepted that the market value of Unit 201 was approximately $125,000. Accordingly, I would order that the respondent pay damages to the appellant calculated as the one-year carrying charges on the purchase of a unit assuming the purchase price to be $125,000 and the date of purchase to be January 21, 1991. I expect that counsel will be able to agree on this amount. However, if counsel are unable to agree I would direct a reference to the Master at Toronto to calculate that amount.

DISPOSITION

Accordingly, I would allow the appeal, set aside the judgment at trial and grant judgment to the appellant for damages pursuant to s. 52(5) of the Condominium Act calculated in accordance with para. 58 [see preceding paragraph]. The appellant is entitled to pre-judgment interest on this amount from January 21, 1992 to the date of the trial judgment at the average rate over the relevant period as provided for in the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43. Finally, notwithstanding its relatively modest success on this appeal, in my view the appellant is entitled to its costs of the appeal and of the trial before Herold J.

Order accordingly.

Dinicola et al. v. Huang & Danczkay Properties

29 O.R. (3d) 161

Court File No. 51543/90 Ontario Court (General Division), Beaulieu J., May 16, 1996

Condominium Corp. No. 167 v. Newrey Holdings Ltd. (1981), 32 O.R. (2d) 458, 122 D.L.R. (3d) 280, 14 R.P.R. 62 (C.A.)

ACTION for breach of contract for the sale of units in a condominium project.

Harold W. Sterling and Robert W. Kerkmann, for plaintiffs. W. Ross Murray, Q.C., Rudy V. Buller and Wendy Earle, for defendants.

BEAULIEU J.: --

INTRODUCTION

In 1987, the plaintiffs entered into agreements (the "agreements") to purchase condominium units from the vendor, Quay West. Some of the plaintiffs also purchased parking units. The condominium units were to be located in three buildings to be constructed on Toronto's waterfront, just west of Harbourfront, at 2-50 Stadium Road (the "site"). In the end, Quay West did not construct any of the units and none of the agreements were completed. The plaintiffs bring this action for damages for breach of contract and breach of trust. There are 136 individually named plaintiffs (collectively referred to as the "plaintiffs") who, in total, executed 111 agreements. Some of the plaintiffs were co-purchasers of units and some plaintiffs purchased more than one unit. Four plaintiffs were added at trial by consent order. They had co-purchased units with existing plaintiffs and were brought in as necessary parties to the actions of those existing plaintiffs.

The defendant, Huang & Danczkay Properties ("Properties"), is a partnership which was established on January 1, 1989. The limited partners then included: Huang & Danczkay Limited, Huang & Danczkay International Inc., Mihi Holdings Limited and Machineel Investments Limited. All are controlled by Michael Huang and/or Bela Danczkay (Huang & Danczkay). On June 13, 1989, 164767 Canada Inc. ("164767") joined the partnership as another limited partner. This company is part of the "Claridge" group of companies. Properties, as well as the five corporate partners, admit that it is liable to the plaintiffs if Quay West is found liable in this action.

The site was purchased by Huang & Danczkay Limited from the Toronto Harbour Commission ("THC") by agreement dated May 30, 1986. The sale closed on June 9, 1988. Huang & Danczkay Limited directed THC to transfer title to Quay West. As a result, Quay West acquired legal title to the property and was the beneficial owner. Quay West was a limited partnership established on January 28, 1987. It had different limited and general partners from time to time although it was controlled by one or both of Michael Huang or Bela Danczkay.

The establishment of Properties was part of a larger joint venture between Huang & Danczkay and Claridge involving Terminal 3 at Pearson International Airport. In the fall of 1988, an agreement was reached between Huang & Danczkay and Claridge whereby Properties was formed. The partners controlled by Huang & Danczkay were to transfer into Properties various real estate holdings and 164767 was to contribute money. The site was one of the real estate holdings to be transferred to Properties. On March 1, 1989, legal title to the site was transferred to 808868 Ontario Limited as a bare trustee for the beneficial owner, Quay West. This transfer was part of the process of transferring the site from Quay West to Properties pursuant to the deal reached in the fall of 1988.

In June of 1989, beneficial ownership of the site was transferred from Quay West to Properties through a series of transactions. Quay West was dissolved on June 8, 1989.

OVERVIEW

At the outset, I wish to make a few comments concerning this trial. The trial extended over 48 days, approximately four months based on the availability of the court, counsel and witness. In my view, the trial could have been shorter but for the "litigation warfare" mindset prevalent throughout the proceedings. To illustrate, as the trial began, the defendant adamantly insisted on the plaintiffs having to prove each and every single agreement of purchase and sale despite admissions at the examinations for discovery and in the pleadings.

Another example concerned the issue of solicitor-client privilege. One of the defendant's lawyers, who acted on the municipal law matters including the appeals to the Ontario Municipal Board and the Divisional Court, was called as a witness at trial. Despite insistence on the examination for discovery that solicitor-client privilege existed, this privilege was waived while this lawyer was in the middle of direct examination after being challenged on certain non-discovered testimony.

A witness was also called by the defendant who had been recognized by them as having been too close to provide an expert's report. However, the defendant proceeded to give lengthy argument and seek a ruling that the witness could nonetheless give his opinion as a non-expert lay person.

There were 342 exhibits filed and 14 witnesses called. The plaintiffs provided 178 pages of original written submissions and 160 pages of reply. The defendants provided two volumes, some 245 pages, of written submissions. In addition, the plaintiffs provided a brief of authorities to the court, which contained a supplement as well, with 33 authorities. The defendants provided four volumes citing 57 authorities.

BACKGROUND FACTS

It is useful in a case of this magnitude to set out a chronology of events. The relevant events are as follows:

Chronology of Events History Prior to the Execution of Agreements

1983-1984 -- The City of Toronto (the "City") proposed to designate the Site, then owned by the Toronto Harbour Commission (the "THC"), for low density quasi-public uses up to a maximum of .25 times the area of the lot. THC objected and retained consultants to arrive at a plan that met the goals of THC, the Yacht Club and the City Planning Staff. The final recommendations adopted by City Council on July 16, 1984 recommended a density for the site of .25 times the area of the lot as of right; however, it provided that if City Council was satisfied with respect to certain matters, including water views from public streets and pedestrian access to the water's edge, then by-laws would be passed by City Council permitting a density of three times the area of the lot.

September, 1985 -- On September 9, 1985, By-law No. 672-85 was enacted which permitted a density of three times the area of the lot and a height of 45 metres. "Design Guidelines" were adopted for the site to be used to evaluate any subsequent applications submitted pursuant to s. 40 of the Planning Act.

October, 1985 -- THC issued a proposal call for the purchase of the Site subject to certain agreements with the City respecting East Breakwall Promenade, North Breakwall Promenade, walkways, and the requirement for Wind Study.

October, 1985-May, 1986 -- Huang & Danczkay put in a bid on the site ($16,160,000) and was selected as the highest bidder.

May, 1986 -- Huang & Danczkay and THC entered into an Agreement of Purchase and Sale for the Site. The closing date was set for April 1, 1988. The agreement contained the following conditions and covenants:

(a) Huang & Danczkay purchase the property subject to By-law No. 672-85 and the Design Guidelines;

(b) Huang & Danczkay agree to assume the obligations of the THC to the City with respect to the promenades and the dockwall;

(c) Huang & Danczkay cannot apply for a building permit until the THC has received a favourable report from an architectural advisor, who will review the proposed development at various stages throughout the design process and prepare reports on design issues; and

(d) the Agreement is conditional on there being, before the closing date, no materially adverse amendments, or recommendations to amend, By-law No. 672-85.

June, 1986-December, 1986 -- Jerome Markson Architects was hired by Huang & Danczkay, as well as a number of other consultants to produce a site plan for development and get it approved by the City. Mr. Markson and his team reviewed the appropriate by-law and design guidelines and began the process of meeting with City planning staff. There was enough support for Mr. Markson's design to put in a formal application for site plan approval.

December 29, 1986 -- Huang & Danczkay put in an application for site plan approval (also known as "development review" approval or "Section 40" approval). The application listed four possible variances including one asking that the enclosed balconies (7100 square metres) not be counted towards gross floor area. The design at this stage comprised 807 condominium units and 870 parking spaces. The design contained three public promenades. These are the promenades with respect to which Quay West had agreed to assume the obligations of the THC.

Although permission to exclude the enclosed balconies from gross floor area was not uncommon, Huang & Danczkay and Mr. Markson had a fall-back scheme to keep the same design but eliminate a number of storeys from two of the buildings. The four buildings would then accommodate between 720 and 730 condominium units.

January-February, 1987 -- After several meetings with City planning staff, major revisions to the site plan were requested. On February 20, 1987, the Department of Public Works released a report requesting revisions to the site plan with respect to servicing and access. Huang & Danczkay complied with these requests. At this time, an interpretation was requested from the Director, Plan Examination Division, that enclosed balconies not be considered as gross floor area. February 26, 1987 -- The City advised Huang & Danczkay by letter that the enclosed balconies would count as gross floor area.

March 16, 1987 -- At a meeting with the Director of Urban Design, Planning Department, a site plan dated March 2, 1987 was presented. This site plan had been revised already to respond to earlier comments. A number of other elements were recommended and Huang & Danczkay agreed to the suggested revisions.

April 7, 1987 -- Meeting with Mr. Varden, Department of Public Works, who had several comments with respect to the then-existing site plan. Huang & Danczkay agreed to comply with these comments.

Agreements of Purchase of Sale with Respect to Units in the Proposed Condominium

April 7, 1987 -- Huang & Danczkay commenced sales of the project. The documentation was based on the initial project, however, only 721 of the 807 units were offered for sale pending the resolution of the gross floor area issue. The sales office was opened in April, 1987 with sales occurring from April 18 until February, 1988. The majority of sales were made in April, May and June of 1987.

The intended purchaser was given a form of agreement of purchase and sale. The form constituted an offer to be executed by the purchaser and then executed by Quay West. A copy of the accepted offer was then mailed to the purchaser. The terms of the agreements varied with respect to certain particulars but generally were in the same form.

From Execution to Approval for Minor Variances

April, 1987 -- The Federal Government began a review of the Harbourfront area and asked Harbourfront to continue the voluntary suspension of development initiated by the City and the developers in January, 1987. There was no concern that the Site was going to be affected by the freeze as it was outside the Harbourfront area defined by the Federal Government.

May, 1987 -- Some design changes were recommended and were being incorporated by developers.

June 4, 1987 -- Application to Committee of Adjustment for four variances relating to the project. Variance number 2 was a request to increase gross floor area by 7,184 square metres representing the area of the enclosed balconies in the site plan application.

June 15 and 19, 1987 -- City Council rejected Alderman Martin's motion for an Interim Control by-law which would have included the west side of Site and, therefore, the Quay West Project.

July 16, 1987 -- Department of Public Works reported to the Commissioner of Planning and Development and indicated that there was basic satisfaction with the project and contemplated its approval subject to various conditions.

September 28, 1987 -- Senior City Planner released report on the variances. The Report opposed the variance seeking a 12.5% increase in gross floor area representing the area of the enclosed balconies in the Initial Project but supported other variances. September 28, 1987-November 2, 1987 -- Huang & Danczkay and City Planning Staff entered into negotiations for a revised proposal.

November 9, 1987 -- Huang & Danczkay put in a revised application for variances reducing the request for additional density from 12.5% to 4.5%.

November 17, 1987 -- On behalf of the Planning and Development Department, the Senior City Planner released a report supporting all of the variances requested by Huang & Danczkay including the 4.5% density increase.

November 30, 1987 -- City Council indicated its opposition to the variances being requested which would result in increased height and/or density at the Site.

December 1, 1987 -- Given City Council's position on the variances, Huang & Danczkay withdrew variance number 2 in their application which was the one relating to total floor area.

From Approval of Minor Variances to City Council Refusal of Site Plan Recommended for Approval by the Land Use Committee

December 8, 1987 -- Huang & Danczkay submitted revised plans based on the fall-back position reducing the number of units from 807 to 730.

December 9, 1987 -- Given the withdrawal of variance number 2 relating to gross floor area, the Committee of Adjustment approved all of Huang & Danczkay's requests for variances. The City representatives requested certain changes to the plans.

February 22, 1988 -- City Council passed By-law No. 209-88 which was an Interim Control By-law freezing development in the Harbourfront area.

February 29, 1988 -- The City of Toronto imposed three new requirements relating to the public walkways. During the months of March and April, 1988, lengthy negotiations took place between City staff, the THC and Quay West to reach an agreement incorporating the new requirements relating to the walkways. April 18, 1988 -- The City Solicitor recommended to City Council that the new form of agreement relating to walkways be approved by City Council. City Council adopted the report.

May 10, 1988 -- Confirmation from Department of Buildings and Inspections that the project conformed to zoning was received.

June 9, 1988 -- The land transaction between Quay West and the THC closed and numerous documents were registered.

June 17, 1988 -- City Council passed By-law No. 527-88 which is the Official Plan Amendment No. 463 relating to The Central Waterfront. In this by-law, specific policies are set out for the Site to permit buildings containing commercial, residential and recreational uses, with a density of up to three times the area of the lot.

June 30, 1988 -- A report from the Planning and Development Department recommended approval of the plans submitted for the Section 40 Agreement. The report set out the approval of other departments (e.g., Buildings and Inspections, Public Works, etc.).

July 27, 1988 -- The Executive Committee of Council approved and adopted Planning and Development Department's review report dated June 30, 1988.

September 16, 1988 -- The Department of Planning and Development released a report approving design modifications to the proposed dockwall.

September 23, 1988 -- City Council referred the matter to the Land Use Committee for the hearing.

October 5, 1988 -- Land Use Committee adopted recommendations of the Commissioner of Planning Development that the project be approved and the Section 40 Agreement be entered into. Alderman Martin's motions for deferral of the decision and for an extension of the Harbourfront Interim Control By-law to the Site were defeated.

October 17, 1988 -- City Council refused Quay West application.

From Refusal of October 17, 1988 to Freeze by Interim Control By-law

October 26-27, 1988 -- It was recommended by Huang & Danczkay's solicitors that City Council's refusal be appealed to the Ontario Municipal Board ("OMB") and the appeal was launched. An early hearing date was received for November 28 and 29, 1988.

October-November, 1988 -- Discussions took place with the Department of Buildings and Inspections with respect to the building permit.

November 28-30, 1988 -- At the commencement of the OMB hearing, the City requested an adjournment. The OMB heard Quay West's case and then granted the City an adjournment until December 19, 1988.

December 12, 1988 -- At a special meeting of City Council held without notice to Huang & Danczkay, the City of Toronto passed Interim Control By-law No.62-89, which amended existing Interim Control By-law No. 64-88 and others, to freeze development on the Site. From Passage of Interim Control By-law to Downzoning

December 19, 1988 -- The OMB hearing resumed and the City requested a further adjournment. It was also argued by the City that Interim Control By-law No. 62-89, passed on December 12, 1988, prevented the Board from continuing with the development approval process under Section 40 of the Planning Act. The Board rejected this argument and refused the further adjournment.

Huang and Danczkay's solicitors delivered a notice of appeal of By-law No. 62-89 to the OMB.

December 20, 1988 -- The OMB rendered its decision and stated the following:

The Board is thus left in the position of having:

1. Persuasive evidence of the appellant/applicant's own witnesses as to the propriety of this development on the subject site within Section 40 criteria and the City's Design Guidelines;
2. The report of the City's Commissioner of Planning, dated June 30, 1988, reviewed, accepted and recommended by the City's Executive Committee on July 27, 1988 and the City's Land Use Committee, made up of 11 of its 22 Councillors plus the Mayor, and reconfirmed September 9 and on October 5, 1988;
3. No contrary evidence or opinion as to the non-compliance with the requirements of Section 40, save only as to the "legal issue dealt with in the previous motion for adjournment and the reasons for its refusal".

Accordingly, the Board finds the proposal deserving of approval and hereby approves the plans and drawings as submitted by the applicant/appellants . . .

December 30, 1988 -- A motion for leave to appeal the OMB's refusal to grant the City a further adjournment on December 19, 1988 was filed on behalf of the City.

January, 1989 -- Discussions took place regarding the building permit. January 30, 1989 -- City of Toronto, Department of Buildings and Inspections indicated that the building permit would not be approved for the following reasons:

1. The passage of the Interim Control By-law on December 12, 1988.
2. The fact that the final approval of the development review application was still outstanding; and
3. That the Department had not yet completed its review of the revised plans received on January 19, 1989.

February 1, 1989 -- Huang and Danczkay's solicitors wrote seeking instructions to proceed with four routes of appeal:

1. an application to compel filing of the record re the Interim Control By-law at the OMB;
2. an appeal re the building permit;
3. an application to quash the Interim Control By-law; 4. an application to dismiss the City's application for leave to appeal the refusal to grant a further adjournment.

February 3, 1989 -- On behalf of Quay West, a Notice of Application was issued to compel the City of Toronto to forward their appeal of Interim Control By-law No. 62-89 to the OMB.

February 14, 1989 -- The City of Toronto requested the OMB to combine Quay West's appeal of the Interim Control By-law with the appeals of the General Interim Control By-law affecting the Harbourfront area.

February-March, 1989 -- Discussions re building permit.

March 6, 1989 -- Director of Architecture and Urban Design at the Planning and Development Department released a report supporting the inclusion of the Site in the Harbourfront Interim Control By-law.

March 7, 1989 -- Divisional Court heard the City's motion for leave to appeal the refusal to grant them an adjournment on December 19, 1988. Leave to appeal was granted.

March 28, 1989 -- Eight items of litigation activity were taking place or pending:

1. The OMB Section 40 referral of the site plan;
2. The City's leave to appeal the decision to refuse a further adjournment in December, 1988;
3. The appeal of the December 12, 1988 Interim Control By-law;
4. The application to force the City to issue a building permit;
5. The application to quash the Interim Control By-law;
6. The motion to the OMB for directions on the hearing of the Interim Control By-law appeals and whether the Site will get a separate hearing;
7. The hearing before the OMB on the merits of the Interim Control By-law; and

8. An application to the OMB to vary its cost award of December 22, 1988 (no costs awarded to Quay West).

April 10, 1989 -- Second report released by the Director of Architecture and Urban Design. He attached his own site plan which represented a major redesign of the project.

April 19 and 20, 1989 -- The City's appeal of the OMB December 19, 1988 decision was argued before Divisional Court as well as Huang & Danczkay's applications to quash Interim Control By-law No. 62-89 and force the City to issue a permit. The City's appeal and both applications were dismissed, leaving the freeze on development over the property in place. The Court was not satisfied that City Council had acted in bad faith or for an improper purpose in enacting the Interim Control By-law.

May 10, 1989 -- The City Planning and Development Department released a report on the Site which proposed principles for a draft new by-law. The Land Use Committee adopted the report. The report specifically indicated that its principles were illustrated by the site plan attached to the report of the Director of Architecture and Urban Design.

May 11, 1989 -- On behalf of Huang & Danczkay, a motion was brought for leave to appeal the decision of the Divisional Court dismissing their application to quash By-law No. 62-89 and refusal to require the City to issue a building permit.

June 2, 1989 -- Public notice was issued relating to the Land Use Committee meeting to be held on July 5, 1989 to consider a proposed official plan amendment and zoning by-law in respect of the Site. Both the proposed by-law and official plan amendment reduced the permissible density of the site to 2.15 times coverage and the maximum permissible height on the site was proposed to be reduced to 25 metres.

June 8, 1989 -- Huang & Danczkay sent a letter to all purchasers setting out the planning history and indicating that, although they were still trying, they were pessimistic that the project would be allowed to continue.

-- Report of the City Planning and Development Department discussing the draft by-laws necessary to implement the principles set out in the May 10, 1989 report.

July 4, 1989 -- Report from City Solicitor containing drafts of by-laws amending the official plan for the Site and down-zoning the property in accordance with the previous reports.

July 5, 1989 -- Land Use Committee meeting. At the end of the meeting, the Committee recommended City Council's adoption of the down-zoning by-law and Official Plan Amendment. In addition, the Committee directed its Chairman, Councillor Nowlan, to write to Huang & Danczkay advising them to respond to Councillor Nowlan as to their willingness to provide a guarantee that they would be willing to sell the condominiums to the original purchasers should the development be approved and that the purchasers be allowed to purchase their unit at the original price inflated to the current 1989 dollar value.

July 6, 1989 -- Huang & Danczkay's solicitors prepared a draft response to Councillor Nowlan's letter, however, Huang & Danczkay considered it to be too long and did not go in the right direction. July 7, 1989 -- Huang & Danczkay draft their own response to Councillor Nowlan's letter indicating that the request for information and guarantee is inappropriate.

-- City Council adopted the recommendations of the Land Use Committee and passed By-law No. 474-89 which down-zoned the Site to 2.15 times the area of the land, By-law 475-89 which removed the Site from the Interim Control By-law, and By-law No. 473-89 which adopted the Official Plan Amendment down-designating the property to 2.15 times coverage with a 26.5 metre height limit across the site.

-- Huang & Danczkay released a statement to the press which indicated that there was no alternative but to return the down payments to the purchasers with interest for the full period.

July 10, 1989 -- Huang & Danczkay returned the purchasers' deposits with interest and indicated that they were not able to proceed with the proposed project as planned.

July 28, 1989 -- The Department of Buildings and Inspections indicated that the Department would continue to process the building permit application.

September-October, 1989 -- Discussions re building permit.

October 13, 1989 -- The City Department of Buildings and Inspections indicated that the building permit application could not be processed further because of the new zoning by-law enacted on July 7, 1989.

October 26, 1989 -- Report from the City Solicitor to City Council informing them of the Province's view that 2.15 times coverage for the project lands was unacceptable and that only low-rise buildings should be allowed south of Queen's Quay West.

January 11, 1990 -- The decision of the OMB on Quay West's appeal of the Board's refusal on December 20, 1988 to award Quay West its costs was released. The Board stated:

This panel of the Board therefore finds that the actions taken by Council for the City of Toronto from the first refusal of the proposed site plan on September 19, 1988 to the date of the commencement of the hearing before the Board on November 29, 1988, were unreasonable . . .

The applicant, Quay West, is therefore awarded its costs against the City of Toronto for all of those costs which were thrown away, in dealing with the delays caused by the City from September 19, 1988, and preparing for the hearings before the Board, and for this present review, except for the costs of the three day hearing itself as determined by the first panel.

September 4, 1990 -- The Department of Buildings and Inspections refused building permit and closed its file.

September 18, 1991 -- The City Solicitor recommended to City Council that Council approve new draft zoning by-laws relating to the Site implementing the Provincial proposal.

The draft by-law and Official Plan amendment relating to the site were not enacted until May 3, 1993. The effect of the new by-laws, numbers 290-93 and 291-93, is that both the northerly and southerly pieces of the site have been conveyed to the City for parkland and Huang & Danczkay retains the middle piece. The new by-laws exempt enclosed balconies on the site from gross floor area.

Transfers by Quay West

The transfer of the beneficial ownership of the site from Quay West to Properties was accomplished in June of 1989 through a series of transactions. Certain partners of Quay West transferred liabilities and assets with respect to the site to the four companies which were partners of Properties and controlled by Michael Huang and/or Bela Danczkay. These transactions took place on June 8, 1989. Each of the four partners of Properties then transferred assets, including each partner's respective interest in the site and the agreements to Properties on June 9, 1989. Properties agreed to assume the obligations, commitments and liabilities of the partners relating to the site and the agreements. Although the documents do not state that the partners assumed obligations or commitments of Quay West relating to the performance of the agreements, the plaintiffs rely on admissions made by Huang & Danczkay.

All agreements entered into by the plaintiffs were with Quay West as vendor. Notices of the transfers of assets and liabilities or the dissolution of Quay West were not given to the plaintiffs by Quay West or by Properties when these events occurred.

Agreements of Purchase and Sale

The standard terms for each agreement to purchase units in Phase 1 were identical as were the standard terms for both Phases 2 and 3. In fact, the standard terms for all three Phases were substantially similar. The possession dates differed among the three Phases as they were to be completed sequentially beginning with Phase 1. The possession dates were as follows: For Phase 1, December 1, 1989; for Phase 2, March 1, 1990; and for Phase 3, July 3, 1990. For the purposes of the agreements, the Quay West project was comprised of three separate condominium projects.

ISSUES AND THE LAW

The plaintiffs advance three grounds for liability in this case. First, Huang & Danczkay failed to perform the agreements and cancelled them when they did not have termination rights. Second, Huang & Danczkay did not make reasonable efforts to get approval to construct individual units. Third, the transfers of the land without notice or consent was a breach of contract or a breach of trust.

In response, the defendant claims that the doctrine of frustration of contract applies. The defendant states that October 17, 1988 must be viewed as the "frustrating event" which was beyond the control of Huang & Danczkay. The events which followed were brought to completion in December 1988 when the interim control by-law was passed.

(1) Frustration of Contract

The issue of frustration of contract must be addressed first. It is the position of Huang & Danczkay that all of the agreements which were entered into with respect to the site were frustrated by acts taken by City Council who, it is argued by Huang & Danczkay, was motivated by its determination to block major development on the site and which acts prevented the construction of the proposed project. It is argued that the actions of the City blocked not only the proposed site plan but, also, effectively blocked any construction on the site of any building whatsoever. Huang & Danczkay emphasize that, to this day, the site remains a vacant lot.

The plaintiffs submit several reasons why the defence of frustration must fail. The plaintiffs' main argument is that the possibility of City Council refusing approval on October 17, 1988 and the subsequent downzoning was contemplated by the parties and provided for in the agreements. Being a foreseen possibility, it is argued that this cannot be a "frustrating event".

It is further argued by the plaintiffs that City Council's actions may have put Quay West in a position of not being able to complete all 720 agreements, however, this did not make it impossible for Quay West to complete most of the agreements. It is argued that the court must determine Quay West's contractual obligations to each plaintiff and then ask whether the acts of City Council rendered performance of the agreements impossible. Finally, it was argued that the events which occurred in this case preventing performance of the agreements were self-induced by the voluntary acts of Quay West.

When considering whether or not the agreements in this case were frustrated, it is important to keep in mind several particular dates and the events which occurred on those dates. On October 17, 1988, City Council refused to approve the site plan prepared by Mr. Markson. In December of 1988, the City of Toronto passed the interim control by-law which froze all development on the site. On July 7, 1989, City Council downzoned the site and effectively prohibited anything from being built on the site except in accordance with the new restrictions imposed by the by-laws passed on that date. Also on that date, after the decision of City Council, a press statement was released, which indicated that the company had no alternative but to return the down-payments. On July 10, 1989, Huang & Danczkay returned the deposits to the purchasers, with interest, and indicated that they were not able to proceed with the proposed project.

The defendant argues that a contract is frustrated when, after its formation, a change of circumstances renders it impossible to fulfil the contract, or transforms performance into a radically different obligation from that undertaken in the contract. Numerous cases were cited dealing with frustration of contract.

Although there had been some debate in England, the case of Capital Quality Homes Ltd. v. Colwyn Construction Ltd. (1975), 9 O.R. (2d) 617, 61 D.L.R. (3d) 385 (C.A.) ("Capital Quality Homes"), held that the doctrine of frustration applies in Ontario to contracts for the sale of land. In this case, the plaintiff agreed to buy 26 lots from the defendant. The contract provided 26 separate deeds of conveyance as the purchaser, the plaintiff, was buying the lots with the intention of erecting homes on them and then selling each by a separate conveyance. Both parties were aware of this intention. After the agreement was entered into, the Planning Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 349, was amended in a way which prevented the conveyance of 26 deeds without consent. The plaintiff claimed the return of the deposit. The Court of Appeal, affirming the trial judge, held that this was recoverable because the contract had been frustrated.

Evans J.A., delivering the judgment of the court, at p. 391 of the decision, quoted from the case of Davis Contractors Ltd. v. Fareham Urban District Council, [1956] A.C. 696 at pp. 728-29, [1956] 2 All E.R. 145 (H.L.):

So perhaps it would be simpler to say at the outset that frustration occurs whenever the law recognizes that without the default of either party a contractual obligation has become incapable of being performed because the circumstances in which performance is called for would render it a thing radically different from that which was undertaken by the contract. Non haec in foedera veni. It was not this that I promised to do.

The court went on to consider whether the doctrine of frustration of contract should be invoked in the particular circumstances. At p. 394, the following relevant portion appears:

There can be no frustration if the supervening event results from the voluntary act of one of the parties or if the possibility of such event arising during the term of the agreement was contemplated by the parties and provided for in the agreement. In the instant case the planning legislation which supervened was not contemplated by the parties, not provided for in the agreement and not brought about through a voluntary act of either party. The factor remaining to be considered is whether the effect of the planning legislation is of such a nature that the law would consider the fundamental character of the agreement to have been so altered as to no longer reflect the original basis of the agreement. In my opinion the legislation destroyed the very foundation of the agreement. The purchaser was purchasing 26 separate building lots upon which it proposed to build houses for resale involving a reconveyance in each instance. The purpose was known to the vendor. The lack of ability to do so creates a situation not within the contemplation of the parties when they entered into the agreement. I believe that all the factors necessary to constitute impossibility of performance have been established and that the doctrine of frustration can be invoked to terminate the agreement.

It was held that there had been a clear "frustration of the common venture". It was stated at p. 630 O.R., p. 398 D.L.R.:

If the factual situation is such that there is a clear "frustration of the common venture" then the contract, whether it is a contract for the sale of land or otherwise, is at an end and the parties are discharged from further performance . . .

In Focal Properties Ltd. v. George Wimpey Canada Ltd. (1975), 14 O.R. (2d) 295 (C.A.) (hereafter Focal Properties), the Court of Appeal was divided on the issue of frustration but did not deny that the doctrine could be applied to a contract for the sale of land. This case was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Canada, however, the doctrine of frustration of contract was not dealt with (see: [1978] 1 S.C.R. 2). In Focal Properties, by operation of the Planning Act, it was a statutory condition precedent to the completion of the sale that the proposed plans of subdivision be approved by the appropriate authority. The plaintiff/vendor was to obtain registration of the plan and the defendant/purchaser was to provide services for the land. The closing date of the transaction was five years from the date of the agreement, or some other date that was mutually acceptable.

The trial judge found that despite efforts by the vendor to obtain registration of the proposed plans of subdivision, it was unable to do so by the closing date. The parties were unable to agree on a new closing date and the vendor elected to treat the agreement at an end and then sought to return to the purchaser the deposit it had paid. The vendor brought an action for declarations that certain agreements were frustrated and terminated. In a counterclaim, the purchaser sought declarations that the agreements were in effect. On appeal, it was held that the trial judge correctly declared the agreement between the parties terminated, however, different grounds for the decision were given by Jessup and Houlden J.J.A. who comprised the majority. Jessup J.A. held that the sale agreement, by its terms, came to an end on the failure to obtain registration of the proposed plans of subdivision by the closing date. He also held that the trial judge had correctly concluded that the agreements were frustrated because they were impossible to perform within any foreseeable period of time. Houlden J.A. confined his reasons to finding that the contract had been frustrated. At p. 309, Houlden J.A. stated the following:

I know of only two situations where a party may be relieved of his covenant: (a) if the contract so provides (and this contract contained no such provision), or (b) if the performance of the contract has been frustrated. On the doctrine of frustration, Mr. Garrow referred us to the analysis in Atiyah, Introduction to the Law of Contract, 2nd ed. (1971). After reviewing a number of leading cases, Atiyah suggests that the decision . . . turns on the question (at p. 174): "Is it reasonable to place the risk of non-performance in the events which have happened on one party or the other, or neither?" If it is not reasonable to place the risk on either party, the contract is frustrated. If, however, it is reasonable to place the risk on a particular party, that party must perform, and if he fails to do so, he will be liable in damages.

Houlden J.A. concluded that the legislative enactment in question was an abnormal or extraordinary circumstance and was not reasonably foreseeable. At p. 310, Houlden J.A. referred to an excerpt from Davis Contractors Ltd. v. Fareham Urban District Council, supra, at pp. 720-21, where Lord Reid suggested the following test for frustration:

It appears to me that frustration depends, at least in most cases, not on adding any implied term, but on the true construction of the terms which are in the contract read in light of the nature of the contract and of the relevant surrounding circumstances when the contract was made.

Applying this test to the facts in Focal Properties, Houlden J.A. then determined that the contract, on its true construction, was not wide enough to apply to the new situation that had emerged. At p. 310, it was stated:

The parties contracted on the footing and in the anticipation that the consents would be obtained and the plans of subdivision would be registered. The happening of these events was fundamental to the performance of the contract. By reason of the refusal of the planning authorities to issue the consents, these events were prevented from happening during the whole of the period allowed by the contract for performance.

The Court of Appeal had another opportunity to review the law relating to frustration of contracts in Victoria Wood Development Corp. v. Ondrey (1978), 22 O.R. (2d) 1, 92 D.L.R. (3d) 229 (hereafter Victoria Wood). This case further expanded on the "common venture" concept which was evident in the Capital Quality Homes case.

In Victoria Wood, the Court of Appeal reiterated that frustration applies in Ontario to contracts for the sale of land, however, on the facts of the case, it was held that what happened did not amount to frustration. There were two actions. In the first action, Victoria Wood (the purchaser) sought a declaration that the agreement of purchase and sale had been frustrated and claimed a return of its deposit. In the second action, the vendors claimed specific performance and damages, or alternatively, damages for breach of contract.

The vendors were interested in selling 89 acres of land in the Town of Oakville. They knew the land was zoned for industrial use. Victoria Wood entered into a contract with the vendors which was signed on April 6, 1973. The closing date was set for October 31, 1973. The contract contained several clauses including a provision for consents to any zoning or rezoning application and consents to any plan of subdivision or any necessary related documents required to process and effect registration of such plan or plans.

On June 22, 1973, the Legislature enacted the Parkway Belt Planning and Development Act, 1973, S.O. 1973, c. 53, which was made retroactive to June 4, 1973. A regulation was made pursuant to the Act which effectively prohibited all use of the land except agricultural uses and accessory buildings on minimum lot areas of 50 acres. As was stated at p. 3 O.R., p. 231 D.L.R.: "The land thus was rendered useless for development for industrial, commercial or residential use."

Arnup J.A., delivering the judgment of the court, concluded that there was no "common venture" in this case. He referred to two tests. The first test was described as the test enunciated in Davis Contractors Ltd. v. Fareham Urban District Council, supra, which was adopted in several Ontario cases including Capital Quality Homes. At p. 13 O.R., p. 240 D.L.R., Arnup J.A. stated that this would involve answering questions such as the following:

Has the contractual obligation become impossible to perform because its performance would be radically different from that undertaken by the contract? (Lord Radcliffe). Has there occurred an intervening event or change of circumstances so fundamental as to be regarded by the law both as striking at the root of the agreement, and as entirely beyond what was contemplated by the parties? . . . Is the effect of the legislation of such a nature that the law would consider the fundamental character of the agreement to have been so altered as to no longer reflect the original basis of the agreement? (Evans, J.A., at p. 626 O.R., p. 394 D.L.R.)

Arnup J.A. then went on to say that in Victoria Wood, the questions set out above would have to be answered in the negative. Applying the law to the facts in that case, Arnup J.A. stated at p. 13 O.R., p. 241 D.L.R.:

I do not think mere knowledge of the vendor that land was being bought for development, or even for a particular kind of development, is sufficient to bring into operation the doctrine of frustration when an entirely unexpected governmental enactment makes the purchaser's purpose incapable of realization, or so difficult that great hardship is occasioned to it in carrying out that purpose. As I have stated earlier, there was no "common venture" here. As Viscount Simon, L.C., said in Davis Contractors Ltd., supra, at p. 715, "it by no means follows that disappointed expectations lead to frustrated contracts".

The second test Arnup J.A. referred to was described as equitable allocation of the risk. He commented that this subject formed the basis of the judgment of Houlden J.A. in Focal Properties. After discussing allocation of the risk, Arnup J.A. concluded at pp. 14-15 O.R., p. 242 D.L.R.:

In my view we must apply to a contract for sale of land the same principles respecting frustration of contracts as are applicable to any other contract. That exercise requires us to consider the terms of the contract and the factual background in which it was made, in order to see what the obligations under the contract were and whether the supervening event has so changed the nature of those obligations that to compel their performance, under the changed conditions, would be to order performance of something radically different from what the two parties agreed to under their contract. We cannot impose upon the parties an allocation of risk that is neither explicit in the contract nor implicit in its terms, when considered in light of the circumstances in which it was made. I prefer to decide this case on the basis of the first test I have discussed.

For the reasons set out above, Arnup J.A. concluded that the contract in issue was not frustrated.

Having regard to the above cases, there can be no frustration if the supervening event results from a voluntary act of one of the parties, or if the possibility of such event arising during the term of the agreement was contemplated by the parties and provided for in the agreement. In light of the facts and circumstances of this case, there is no frustration.

First, the possibility of the events which occurred were contemplated by Huang & Danczkay and provided for in the agreements. Clause 38 of the agreement provides as follows:

38(a). If the Development does not proceed in accordance with the Vendor's current plans as determined in the Vendor's sole discretion, the Vendor alone may at any time on or before June 30, 1988, terminate this Agreement by notice in writing to the Purchaser. If the Vendor so terminates the Agreement, the Deposit and the Further Deposits, if any, shall be returned and the Vendor shall not be liable for any costs or damages.

The agreements were drafted by the solicitors for Quay West. There are broad rights of termination contained in cl. 38(a). In the event that the development did not proceed in accordance with Huang & Danczkay's plans, cl. 38(a) of the agreements permitted Quay West to terminate the agreements with respect to all three phases without liability on or before June 30, 1988.

Huang was asked in direct examination at trial how the June 30, 1988 date was chosen. He replied that it was mainly based on the closing date of the sale agreement with the THC as there were conditions precedent to the sale of the land. As the agreement between THC and Huang & Danczkay was conditional on there being no materially adverse amendments to the existing by-law, it can be inferred that this clause contemplated the possibility of downzoning.

Further, under oath at an OMB hearing on November 29, 1988 (the transcript was filed as an exhibit at trial), Huang stated that he had a concern that the Land Use Committee or City Council might not approve the project in the proposed form but cl. 38 was put into the contracts to deal with that contingency. Huang's testimony at the OMB was as follows:

[Balfour] So in other words, you were relying upon the agreement you felt you had reached with City staff?

[Huang] That's correct. Now, my second part of my answer is: Just in case that does not go in now, that when you go to Land Use and Council there are some other opinions, we built into our contracts a clause whereby we say: If we cannot build the project in its present form, I have a right to terminate the agreement before June '88. I built this in the contract as a safeguard to answer your total concern, which was my concern too.

[Chairman] Where is that?

[Huang] On page 20.

[Chairman] Clause 38(a)

[Huang] Yes.

[Balfour] So in effect, if Council did not agree with planning staff, it would force you into a complete bail-out situation that you could rely on?

[Huang] Yes. I had -- I don't have it now -- I had until June '88 to get out of the bind, so to speak, if I feel that my proposal is not acceptable.

The above excerpt of testimony confirms that Huang & Danczkay had a concern when drafting the agreements that the Land Use Committee or City Council might have different opinions than did the planning staff with respect to the development. Huang & Danczkay constitute the directing mind of Quay West. Quay West protected itself by inserting cl. 38(a) which permitted Quay West to terminate the agreements should City Council not accept the proposed development. In the end, this event did occur, however, due to many delays in the process, Quay West was not fully aware of City Council's views until October 17, 1988 which was almost four months after the date in which cl. 38(a) could be used to terminate the agreements. Taking the above into consideration, the evidence indicates that Huang & Danczkay contemplated that the proposed development might not be approved by the Land Use Committee or by City Council and this was provided for in the agreement.

The June 30, 1988 date provided for in cl. 38(a) was never extended. In fact, by letter dated December 19, 1988 from Weir & Foulds to the City, it was indicated that cl. 38 was waived. That letter reads in part:

Under the purchase and sale agreements entered into between our client and the 730 proposed residents, our clients had, until the 30th day of June, 1988, the option of terminating the sale agreement if it was so determined that the proposed development was not proceeding according to expectations. Fully aware of Council's actions of June 17, 1988, whereon Council approved the Part I of the Official Amendment for the Central Waterfront which included the subject lands, our client waived the termination clause in all the sale agreements. The sale agreements are now final and binding.

The fact that cl. 38 was inserted into the agreement demonstrates that Huang & Danczkay turned their minds to the events which subsequently occurred in this case. The clause was not exercised by Huang & Danczkay on or before June 30, 1988. However, the events that subsequently occurred were contemplated and provided for in the agreements. It cannot be argued by Huang & Danczkay that what occurred was "entirely beyond what was contemplated by the parties".

This finding on its own is enough to conclude that there was no frustration of contract, however, I will consider whether or not the supervening event (the eventual downzoning of the property) resulted from the voluntary act of one of the parties (see Capital Quality Homes, supra, at p. 394).

The case of Maritime National Fish Ltd. v. Ocean Trawlers Ltd., [1935] A.C. 524, [1935] All E.R. Rep. 86 (P.C.) ("Maritime National Fish"), is important to consider in this regard. Maritime National Fish were charterers of a trawler owned by Ocean Trawlers. In addition to the Ocean Trawlers vessel, Maritime Fish also operated four other trawlers. Maritime Fish applied for licences for the five trawlers that they were operating. The Minister responded by deciding that licences were only to be granted to three of the five trawlers. The Minister requested that Maritime Fish advise as to which three of the five trawlers were to have licences. Maritime Fish gave the names of three trawlers other than the Ocean Trawlers vessel. As a result, no licence was granted to the Ocean Trawlers vessel.

As it was no longer lawful for Maritime Fish to employ the Ocean Trawlers vessel as a trawler, Maritime Fish gave notice to Ocean Trawlers that its vessel was available for re-delivery and claimed that Maritime Fish was no longer bound by the contract. Ocean Trawlers commenced an action and Maritime Fish then pleaded frustration stating that the contract became impossible to perform.

The court held that the doctrine of frustration could not be relied on because the result was due to the act of Maritime Fish. Lord Wright referred to frustration as being a matter caused by something for which neither party was responsible. At p. 531, Lord Wright stated:

In truth, it happened in consequence of their [Maritime Fish's] election. If it be assumed that the performance of the contract was dependent on a licence being granted, it was that election which prevented performance, and on that assumption it was the appellants' own default which frustrated the adventure: the appellants cannot rely on their own default to excuse them from liability under the contract.

It is important to consider the above case in light of Councillor Nowlan's letter. This, in my view, is a significant turning point which must be examined in detail. The downzoning by-law was considered at the July 5, 1989 meeting of the Land Use Committee. The Committee recommended passage of the downzoning by-law by a vote of four to two. The Land Use Committee recommendation was to be forwarded to a Special Council meeting on July 7, 1989. In the interim, Councillor Nowlan was directed by the Committee to write to Huang & Danczkay requesting a number of assurances. The letter dated July 5, 1989, reads in part:

(1) that Huang & Danczkay respond directly to Councillor Nowlan no later than noon on Friday, July 7, 1989, as to the willingness to provide a guarantee, in a form satisfactory to the City Solicitor, that the owner would be willing to sell the condominiums to the original purchasers should this development be approved, and that the purchasers be allowed to purchase their units at the original price inflated to current 1989 dollar value; and

(2) that Huang & Danczkay provide the City Clerk with a list of the purchasers of the condominium project at 2-50 Stadium Road.

Mr. McQuaid, solicitor for Huang & Danczkay, drafted a response to the letter which was entered as an exhibit at trial. In the letter, Mr. McQuaid indicated his understanding of Councillor Nowlan's letter. He stated in the letter:

Your letter suggests that Council proposes to introduce a condition that the zoning will be left in place on condition that the contracts be re-negotiated.

However, Mr. McQuaid's response to Councillor Nowlan's letter was rejected by Huang & Danczkay and was never sent to the Land Use Committee. Huang & Danczkay drafted their own response to Councillor Nowlan's letter. They rejected outright the requests made in the letter of Councillor Nowlan on the basis that they did not believe that the City should interfere with their own private business arrangements. The letter written by Huang & Danczkay to Councillor Nowlan is very important to consider and I will reproduce the entire letter:

This is in response to your letter of July 5, 1989, addressed to Huang & Danczkay Limited.

We regret that your Committee decided at its meeting on July 5, 1989, to recommend the adoption of the draft Zoning By-Law Amendment, down-zoning 2-50 Stadium Road.

We respectfully suggest that the matters under consideration by your committee, with respect to 2-50 Stadium Road, should be those concerning land use, planning, urban design and due process of law. In this context, your request for information and the guarantee regarding the private business arrangements with our condominium purchasers is inappropriate. It is inadvisable for a municipal council to use the threat of down-zoning as a lever to interfere with private business contracts between a developer and its purchasers. Such actions are clearly outside the scope of authority contemplated by the Planning Act and would set undesirable precedents.

The letter by Councillor Nowlan and the response by Huang & Danczkay were a definite turning point in the collapse of this transaction. It is unfortunate that, having put in so much positive energy and put up with countless requests, Huang & Danczkay lost patience rather than persevered. The letter that Huang & Danczkay wrote in response to Councillor Nowlan's letter is an indication that they should have reflected more instead of taking the hard stance that they did.

Rather than closing the door completely, the letter written by Councillor Nowlan demonstrates that the City proposed a course of action. Although it was by no means an assurance that the project would now be approved, the City was looking to protect the purchasers. Huang & Danczkay, apparently frustrated with the process, did not act reasonably in responding to the letter. Although it is not for the court to speculate with respect to what would have followed had the assurances been given by Huang & Danczkay, in failing to respond in a reasonable manner, Huang & Danczkay at this point effectively closed the door to any further negotiations.

Councillor Nowlan's letter and Huang & Danczkay's response were considered by City Council at its special meeting held on July 7, 1989. At this meeting, the downzoning by-law was passed. Huang & Danczkay took the position that they refused to further negotiate with the City. I observe that Huang & Danczkay were frustrated with the process when they received the letter from Councillor Nowlan seeking a number of assurances. However, physical and emotional frustration is not synonymous with frustration of contract. Applying the Maritime National Fish case to the present case, Huang & Danczkay cannot rely on their own refusal to negotiate to excuse themselves from the agreement.

For the reasons set out above, the circumstances of this case are not sufficient to satisfy the doctrine of frustration of contract.

(2) Termination Clauses in the Agreement

Having found that frustration does not apply in the present case, it is necessary to go on and consider whether or not Huang & Danczkay had any termination rights in the agreements.

Quay West terminated the agreements July 10, 1989 after the downzoning of the site. The termination letters, dated July 10, 1989 sent by Quay West to the plaintiffs do not refer to any termination clauses in the agreements. The letter reads as follows:

Further to our June 8, 1989 letter, we regret to advise you that the City of Toronto has now passed a downzoning by-law downzoning the site upon which the proposed Quay West condominiums were to be built. As a result, we have regretfully come to the conclusion that we are not able to proceed with the proposed Project which we planned, within which you and other purchasers hoped to purchase units. Accordingly, we must pursue the only practicable alternative open to us: we hereby notify you that we are terminating your agreement of purchase and sale.

Enclosed is a cheque payable to you representing the refund of the deposits paid by you, together with interest.

Clause 38

As stated above, cl. 38 refers to the right of Huang & Danczkay "in its sole discretion" to decide if the development does not proceed "in accordance with the Vendors' current plans" and "may at any time on or before June 30, 1988 terminate this Agreement by notice in writing". Huang & Danczkay did not exercise this unilateral right before June 30, 1988, and therefore, this clause is not applicable.

Clause 6(c)

Clause 6(c) of the agreement reads as follows:

6(c). If for any reason other than the wilful neglect of the Vendor, the Unit is not Substantially Completed by the Possession Date, the Vendor may extend such date from time to time for a period not exceeding 240 days in the aggregate. If the Possession Date is extended for such 240 day period and in the sole opinion of the Vendor, expressed in writing, it is unable to substantially complete the Unit prior to the extended Possession Date, then at the option of either party, this Agreement may be terminated by notice in writing to the other party delivered within 5 days of the Vendor's notice of its inability to substantially complete the unit referred to above, in which event the Deposit and Further Deposits, if any, shall be returned to the Purchaser and this Agreement shall be terminated with no liability arising to either party as a result of such termination. The Vendor shall not be liable to the Purchaser for any damages. Monies paid or payable for extras ordered by the Purchaser, whether or not installed in the Unit, shall not be returned. In such case, the Purchaser shall execute and complete such other documents affecting the title to the Unit as are necessary, in the opinion of the solicitors for the Vendor, to sell the Unit to a party other than the Purchaser.

The plaintiffs argue that Quay West could not have relied on cl. 6(c) to terminate the agreements on July 10, 1989 or any later date for three reasons. First, the purpose of cl. 6(c) was to permit termination should unavoidable delays be experienced within the construction stage of development and not prior to that. Second, Quay West did not extend the possession dates prior to its termination on July 10, 1989. Third, Quay West may well have been able to complete units if it had not acted unreasonably and it is immaterial that Quay West was not able to build the entire proposed project.

With respect to the first reason, the plaintiffs submit that the purpose of cl. 6(c) was to allow for termination in the event that unavoidable construction-related delays prevented Quay West from completing the units. If such a situation were to occur, then cl. 6(c) could be relied on to terminate the agreements.

The plaintiffs further submit that, if the parties had originally intended that Quay West could use cl. 6(c) to terminate the agreements in the event that Quay West could not get a building permit for its proposed project, or in the event of downzoning, then the insertion of cl. 38 would have been unnecessary.

With respect to the second reason, the plaintiffs state that, pursuant to cl. 6(c), an agreement can only be terminated after the possession date is extended. It is important to keep in mind the possession dates when considering this clause of the agreement: Phase 1, December 1, 1989; Phase 2, March 1, 1990; Phase 3, July 3, 1990. If Quay West, in fact, had extended the possession dates in accordance with cl. 6(c) for a period of not more than 240 days (about eight months), the extended possession dates would have been approximately as follows: for Phase 1, July 30, 1990; for Phase 2, October 30, 1990; for Phase 3, March 1, 1991. As the termination date of July 10, 1989 was prior to any of the possession dates, it is submitted that Quay West could not have extended the possession dates at that time, and therefore, was not entitled to rely on cl. 6(c) to terminate the agreement.

In any event, it is submitted that Quay West did not extend the possession dates prior to termination of the agreements on July 10, 1989 or at any time thereafter. Since the possession dates were not in fact extended, Quay West could not have used cl. 6(c) to terminate the agreements.

Lastly, the plaintiffs argue that Huang & Danczkay cannot rely on cl. 6(c) as that clause permits Quay West to terminate an agreement only if it is unable to complete the unit prior to the extended possession date. It is submitted that Quay West must be able to prove that it was "unable" to complete each unit despite making all reasonable efforts to do so. It is the position of the plaintiffs that Quay West could have negotiated a different or smaller project. By failing to meet and negotiate with the City, Quay West failed to take all reasonable steps to construct units.

Huang & Danczkay submitted that cl. 6(c) was available regardless of the particular circumstances. They assert that the phrase in cl. 6(c), "If for any reason other than the wilful neglect of the vendor", was broad enough to cover the situation that arose in this case.

In my view, the interpretation of this clause advanced by Huang & Danczkay is the proper one. The clause was drafted in very broad terms. It seems that as long as the delays were not due to "wilful neglect of the vendor", this clause could be relied upon if the unit was not substantially completed by the possession date.

Although I find that cl. 6(c) was available to Quay West, Quay West did not follow the procedure set out in that provision. Pursuant to cl. 6(c), the vendor is entitled to extend the possession date from time to time for a period not exceeding 240 days in the aggregate. There are certain conditions which must be followed if the vendor is seeking to rely on this subsection. If the possession date has been extended for a 240 day period and in the sole opinion of the vendor, expressed in writing, it is unable to complete the unit prior to the extended possession date, then at the option of either party, the agreement may be terminated by notice in writing to the other party delivered within five days of the vendor's notice of its inability to substantially complete the unit. If such procedure is followed, the purchaser's deposit is returned and the agreement is terminated with no liability arising to either party. The clause explicitly states that: "The Vendor shall not be liable to the Purchaser for any damages."

In this case, Huang & Danczkay cannot rely on cl. 6(c) for the simple reason that they did not follow the required procedure. An agreement could only be terminated after the possession date had been extended. As there was no extension, Huang & Danczkay could not rely on this clause to terminate the agreement.

Clause 30(i)

Clause 30(i) reads as follows:

30. Condition Relating to Registration

(i) If the Vendor is unable to achieve registration of the Creating Documents in accordance with the Act by March 31, 1993 (or by such later date as may be indicated by the Vendor to the Purchaser from time to time) and the Possession Closing has not yet occurred, then upon notice from the Vendor to the Purchaser, this Agreement shall be terminated, the Vendor and the Purchaser shall have no further liability or obligations hereunder, neither party shall be liable to the other for any costs or damages resulting from such termination and all monies paid by the Purchaser to the Vendor shall be repaid to the Purchaser.

The defendant argues that this clause could be used to terminate the Agreement and emphasize the portion which reads: "[i]f the vendor is unable to achieve registration". The plaintiffs, on the other hand, submit that this clause could not be used to terminate the agreement in light of s. 51 of the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.26. Specifically, s. 51(2) of the Condominium Act provides:

51(2) Despite any provision to the contrary contained therein, an agreement of purchase and sale of a proposed unit for residential purposes shall not be terminated by the proposed declarant only by reason of the failure to register the declaration and description within a period of time specified in the agreement, unless the purchaser consents to termination in writing.

Farley J. had the opportunity to comment upon s. 51(2) in the decision of Ally v. Harding Addison Properties Ltd. (1990), 1 O.R. (3d) 167, 14 R.P.R. (2d) 244 (Gen. Div.). At p. 178, it was stated:

The provision of s. 51(2) of the Act is clearly a restriction upon vendors, not upon purchasers. It appears clearly to be for the protection of purchasers, not a rescue provision for a vendor . . . This section of the Act appears to have been inserted to prevent any abuse by a vendor delaying so as to gain an advantage in a rising market.

Having regard to s. 51(2) of the Condominium Act, I find that Huang & Danczkay did not have termination rights in cl. 30(i) as a result of the non-registration of the documents. The purchasers did not consent to termination in writing and therefore, despite cl. 30(i), the agreements are not terminated by reason of the failure to register the documents.

Clause 26

Pursuant to cl. 26 of the agreements, the purchaser is deemed to acknowledge that the vendor may not complete the development and agrees that it has no claims against the vendor arising from any such non-completion. Clause 26 states as follows:

26. Consent Regarding Further Development

The Purchaser acknowledges and agrees that the Building is part of the first phase of a development which is presently expected to include further phases of development. The purchaser acknowledges that the Vendor may not complete the Development and agrees that it shall have no claims against the Vendor arising as a result of such non-completion. The Purchaser hereby irrevocably consents to the completion of further development and irrevocably waives:

(a) all rights otherwise available to object to any government, or governmental agency, or other agency having jurisdiction in connection with any aspect of future development and construction; and

(b) all claims, rights or actions against the Vendor and all other persons, firms and corporation in nuisance and otherwise whether in law or in equity arising out of the future development and construction.

The term "Development" is defined in the agreement as:

The land and the adjoining lands in which the Vendor has or acquires an interest in any construction and development of residential, parking, retail or other commercial premises thereon.

Huang & Danczkay submit that cl. 26 contains an express acknowledgment on the part of the purchaser that the vendor may not complete the project and the purchaser agrees not to make any claims against the vendor arising out of such non-completion. Thus, Huang & Danczkay submit that cl. 26, which appears in the agreements for all three phases, is a sufficient ground in and of itself to dismiss all claims.

The plaintiffs, on the other hand, contend that the purpose of cl. 26 is to inform the purchasers that their rights under the agreements pertain only to the particular phase in which their unit is located. The plaintiffs argue that the inclusion of this clause gives Quay West full freedom to construct less than the three proposed phases without concern for any claims that the purchasers might otherwise have. That is to say, if Quay West decided to construct only phase 1, a purchaser of a phase 1 unit could not get out of his or her agreement by arguing that the vendor misrepresented that size of the overall development.

Both parties argue that the wording of the condominium disclosure statements supports their respective positions. The relevant sections of the disclosure documents are set out at pp. 1, 2 and 7:

The Declarant proposes to construct a residential-commercial project (the "Project") upon the Condominium Property and the Adjacent Lands. It is currently proposed that the Project will consist of 3 residential condominiums (sometimes referred to as Building 1, 2 and 3 respectively) including the Condominium Property and various commercial-retail areas which will not form part of any of the 3 residential condominiums.

The purchaser should specifically note that the Condominium Property will only constitute part of the Project and that the purchaser's rights pursuant to an agreement of purchase and sale for a residential unit relate only to that portion of the Project included in the Condominium Property . . .

The Declarant currently proposes to construct Building 2 and Building 3 and to register these as condominiums. It is possible that Building 2 and/or Building 3 may not be completed. The Declarant is under no obligation to construct these Buildings or to register them as condominiums.

[Note: the Building numbers referred to are different for the three disclosure statements depending on which phase they pertain to.]

The plaintiffs emphasize that the disclosure statements advise the purchasers that their rights pertain only to the phase in which they purchased and Quay West is under no obligation to construct the other phases. Huang & Danczkay, however, assert that the clauses of the disclosure statement inform the purchasers that the project consists of all three phases.

I agree with the interpretation set forth by the plaintiffs. When cl. 26 of the agreement is examined in detail, along with the disclosure statements, it becomes clear that it cannot be interpreted to mean that a purchaser has no rights with respect to the completion of his or her own phase and unit. If cl. 26 had the meaning suggested by Huang & Danczkay, the termination provisions in the agreement would be unnecessary, as there would always be a way out of the agreement if the condominium was simply not completed. If this were the case, in effect, the agreements would constitute a "no liability" contract.

In their argument, Huang & Danczkay emphasized the portion of cl. 26 which reads as follows:

The Purchaser acknowledges that the Vendor may not complete the Development and agrees that it shall have no claims against the Vendor arising as a result of any such non-completion.

Huang & Danczkay state that this portion is unqualified and is applicable in the circumstances of this case. In my view, this is not correct. In interpreting this clause of the agreement, the language used must be examined with a view to making the most sense possible having regard to the intentions of the parties.

In my view, the purpose of cl. 26 is to inform purchasers of a condominium unit of a particular phase that the further phases of development may not, in fact, be completed. The purchaser is then advised in cl. 26 that there shall be no claims arising from non-completion of the further development. This clause does not exempt the vendors from liability in this case.

Clause 37

Clause 37 of each agreement states that: "[t]his Agreement is subject to compliance with the Planning Act, S.O. 1983, as amended". Huang & Danczkay contend that, as a result of this clause, the agreements did not become firm and binding unless and until there was compliance with the Planning Act (now R.S.O. 1990, c. P.13). Further, Huang & Danczkay submit that the statutory provisions requiring approvals constituted statutory conditions precedent to the completion of the agreements with the purchasers. As Quay West did not get Planning Act approval, Huang & Danczkay claim that the agreements did not become binding.

Clause 37 of the agreement is required by s. 50(21) of the Planning Act which states:

50(21) An agreement, conveyance, mortgage or charge made, or a power of appointment granted, assigned or exercised in contravention of this section or a predecessor thereof does not create or convey any interest in land, but this section does not affect an agreement entered into subject to the express condition contained therein that such agreement is to be effective only if the provisions of this section are complied with.

(Emphasis added)

Transfers of land cannot occur unless the transfer complies with s. 50. In the present case, without the insertion of an express condition such as cl. 37 in the agreements, no interest would be conveyed as the sale of a unit in a condominium involves the conveyance of parts of a whole lot. In Crossroads Apartments Ltd. v. Phillips (1974), 4 O.R. (2d) 72, 47 D.L.R. (3d) 172 (H.C.J.), Morden J. (as he then was) emphasized that, for a contract for sale of a condominium unit to comply with s. 29 of the Planning Act (now s. 50 of the Planning Act), the agreement should contain an express condition that it is to be effective only if the provisions of the Planning Act are to be complied with. It was stated at p. 82:

For a contract not to run afoul of it [s. 29 of the Planning Act] I would think that it should contain an express condition that the agreement is to be effective only if the provisions of the section are complied with (see Planning Act, s. 29(7)) . . .

In my view, cl. 37 was inserted in the agreement to protect the defendant from the effect of s. 50(21) of the Planning Act. Clause 37 was not intended and does not operate to terminate the agreements in the event that Quay West was unable to obtain site plan approval for the proposed project.

Conclusion re Termination Clauses

For the reasons set out above, the particular termination clauses in the agreement did not permit Quay West to terminate the agreements when it did. Quay West was in breach of contract when it did not comply with its obligations to build the condominium. There were several provisions in the agreement that set out the obligations of Quay West. Clause 24 is one of the clauses that compelled Quay West to complete construction of the condominium. It provides as follows:

24(a). The Vendor agrees that it will complete the construction of the Condominium substantially in accordance with the proposed description, plans and specifications to be filed with the City of Toronto and the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto.

In summary, none of the termination clauses in the agreement are applicable. Quay West agreed to complete the sale transactions in accordance with the terms of the agreements and, as they failed to fulfil their obligations, Quay West has breached the terms of the agreements.

(3) Reasonable Efforts

Having found that Quay West breached its obligations pursuant to the Agreement, it is not necessary to deal with the plaintiffs' secondary position that Huang & Danczkay failed to take all reasonable steps to complete the agreements and, in particular, to get the municipal approvals required to construct the project. However, as there was considerable argument with respect to this issue at trial, I will address this matter.

Clause 21 of the agreement requires Quay West to proceed with due diligence to complete the condominium and take all reasonable steps for the purpose of obtaining all consents required for the registration of the condominium.

The plaintiffs assert that Huang & Danczkay unreasonably refused to meet and negotiate with the City throughout the period from October 17, 1988 until July 10, 1989. For example, the plaintiffs submit that Quay West refused to attend a meeting requested by the Planning Department in November 1988. The plaintiffs maintain that there are instances of failure by Quay West to discuss design changes that would have gained municipal approval right up to the time of downzoning in July, 1989.

The actions of Huang & Danczkay were not consistent throughout this time period. The events which transpired from July 5, 1989 to July 10, 1989 are very significant and must be examined separately.

Huang & Danczkay faced many obstacles in the development of the proposed project over the period from October 17, 1988 to July 5, 1989. Both Mr. Markson and Mr. McQuaid testified that they did everything possible to get the proposed project built. Mr. Markson, his staff, and other consultants who worked on this project, were in constant contact with the City staff. It is apparent that reasonable compromises were made by Mr. Markson to satisfy the City's concerns both in the site plan application process and in the building permit application process. Huang & Danczkay instructed Mr. McQuaid to advance every legal proceeding possible to get the project approved and remained open to cosmetic or minor changes which might satisfy the City's concerns.

Mr. Gil Nefsky, Huang & Danczkay's Director of Planning, was also in close contact with the City and took all steps possible to get the project underway. Huang was also directly involved in overseeing the project.

I find that during the period from October 17, 1988 until July 5, 1989, Huang & Danczkay and their agents acted reasonably. Mr. Markson's office and other outside consultants continued to negotiate with the City's Department of Buildings and Inspections after October 17, 1988. Mr. McQuaid had many discussions with Mr. Shibley which could be characterized as "settlement discussions". The numerous delays were not attributable to unreasonable conduct on the part of Huang & Danczkay or its agents. I will refer to one example which I believe best illustrates this finding.

On April 19 and 20, 1989, the City's appeal of an OMB decision dated December 19, 1988 was argued before the Divisional Court as well as Huang & Danczkay's applications to quash Interim By-law No. 62-89 to force the City to issue a building permit. The City's appeal and both of Huang & Danczkay's applications were dismissed. The court was not satisfied that City Council acted in bad faith or for an improper purpose in enacting the Interim Control By-law. However, in an endorsement, the court stated as follows:

. . . the Board was presented with a situation in which the City was guilty of gross delay, while the developer had spent large sums of money and acted diligently to achieve a plan that met the City's design and planning criteria.

(Emphasis added)

The above quote is an accurate representation of what I found to be the case for the period from October 1988 until July 5, 1989. Huang & Danczkay were not responsible for any unreasonable delay during this period, but rather, did everything possible to move the project along.

I turn now to the period from July 5, 1989 until July 10, 1989, the date of the termination letters. I discussed this issue at some length in the portion of the judgment dealing with frustration of contract. However, for ease of reference, I will repeat some of my observations below.

When Huang & Danczkay received the letter from Councillor Nowlan, they rejected the response that was drafted by their solicitor Mr. McQuaid. Mr. McQuaid had been actively involved throughout the entire process. Nevertheless, Huang & Danczkay apparently believed that this letter was not going in the right direction. Instead of sending the letter drafted by Mr. McQuaid, Huang & Danczkay drafted their own response. In their terse response, Huang & Danczkay rejected Councillor Nowlan's request and took the position that Council should not be interfering with private business arrangements. The latter part of the letter is significant and I will therefore reproduce it below for a second time:

We respectfully suggest that the matters under consideration by your committee, with respect to 2-50 Stadium Road, should be those concerning land use, planning, urban design and due process of law. In this context, your request for information and the guarantee regarding the private business arrangements with our condominium purchasers is inappropriate. It is inadvisable for a municipal council to use the threat of down-zoning as a lever to interfere with private business contracts between a developer and its purchasers. Such actions are clearly outside the scope of authority contemplated by the Planning Act and would set undesirable precedents.

In light of the extensive negotiations that had taken place between Huang & Danczkay and the City until this point, it is puzzling why Huang & Danczkay would take this rigid position. The letter from Councillor Nowlan suggests an attempt on the part of the City to provide some protection to the purchasers. However, the response of Huang & Danczkay was that they were no longer willing to negotiate with the City.

As I stated earlier, the letter by Councillor Nowlan and the response by Huang & Danczkay is a critical turning point. Up until July 5, 1989, the evidence shows that Huang & Danczkay acted reasonably at every stage, responding to the concerns which were raised by various City personnel. It should be emphasized that in the planning approval process, Huang & Danczkay and their agents dealt with 11 different planners with the City.

Huang & Danczkay changed their position after they received the letter from Councillor Nowlan. They were no longer willing to negotiate with the City. In my view, in light of the fact that the City was seeking assurances with respect to the original purchasers, the response of Huang & Danczkay was unreasonable.

The plaintiffs suggested that Quay West was obligated to take all reasonable steps to obtain the consents necessary for one of the particular condominium phases. In my view, such a position is unrealistic. Quay West did not have the option to negotiate and build whatever number of units it could out of the original 730 units. Having regard to the fact that the units were pre-sold, it was reasonable for Quay West to focus on trying to build the entire proposed project. Further, there is no indication that a different project, possibly involving fewer phases or units, would have received approval. It is not for the court to speculate on whether such a proposal would have been approved. On the evidence before the court, Huang & Danczkay, the City and the purchasers all proceeded on the assumption that all three phases of the development formed the proposed project. On this basis, the position taken by Huang & Danczkay in proceeding with the plan for the entire project was reasonable.

The agreements provided that Quay West would take reasonable efforts to obtain the consents necessary for the particular condominium. I find that Quay West's efforts were reasonable from October 17, 1988 until July 5, 1989. However, from July 5, 1989 when the letter was received from Councillor Nowlan, until July 10, 1989, the date of the termination letters, Huang & Danczkay changed their position. Their rigid stance in their refusal to negotiate was unreasonable in the circumstances. In the result, had I not found that the defendant was liable on contracts without justification, I would have found that Huang & Danczkay failed to use reasonable efforts to obtain the municipal consents that were required for the proposed project.

(4) Transfer of Property

The plaintiffs take the position that the dissolution of Quay West and the transfers of property which occurred in June 1989 without notice to the plaintiffs constitute a breach of contract and breach of trust by Quay West and Huang & Danczkay. In considering breach of contract, the plaintiffs say that there are three factors to consider: (1) the transfer of property; (2) the assignment of contract without notice or consent; and (3) the dissolution of Quay West.

In addition to the contractual obligations, it is argued that Quay West also has trust obligations and that transfer of the site to Properties constituted a breach of trust. It is argued that the common law governing the assignment of contracts prevents the vendor, Quay West, from assigning its obligations under the contracts without notice to the plaintiffs and their consent.

(i) Breach of contract

The plaintiffs rely on the Ontario Court of Appeal decision in York Condominium Corp. No. 167 v. Newrey Holdings Ltd. (1981), 32 O.R. (2d) 458, 122 D.L.R. (3d) 280 (C.A.), for the proposition that, prior to the registration of the declaration, purchasers of a condominium unit become the equitable owners of their units and the interests appurtenant thereto. The owner-developer of a condominium project, upon entering into agreements of purchase and sale, becomes a trustee of the property and places itself in a fiduciary relationship to the purchasers.

The plaintiffs argue that Quay West was not entitled to deal with the land in such a way as to interfere with or defeat the equitable interests of the purchasers once the agreements were executed. In March of 1989, when Quay West transferred the property to a numbered company to hold the property in trust for Quay West, Quay West divested itself of the trust property it was obliged to hold for the purchasers. The plaintiffs submit the transfer of property by Quay West is a breach of the agreements which entitles the plaintiffs to damages.

The assignment of the contract by Quay West to Huang & Danczkay was done in two separate parts -- first, Quay West assigned the rights and then the liabilities were assumed. The plaintiffs submit that it is not possible to assume liabilities without notice. The plaintiffs further submit that the dissolution of Quay West was a breach of contract. By dissolving, Quay West disabled itself from performing the agreements and therefore, such action repudiated the agreements.

The plaintiffs refer to the cases of Tolhurst v. Associated Portland Cement Manufacturers (1900) Ltd., [1902] 2 K.B. 660 (C.A.), affirmed [1903] AC. 414, 72 L.J.K.B. 834 (H.L.); Lounsbury Co. v. Duthie, [1957] S.C.R. 590, 9 D.L.R. (2d) 225; and Air Transit Ltd. v. Innotech Aviation of Newfoundland Ltd. (1989), 78 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 24, 244 A.P.R. 24 (Nfld. T.D.), for the proposition that a party may not assign obligations or liabilities so as to relieve itself of contractual obligations. In Tolhurst, supra, it was stated by Collins M.R. at p. 668:

It is, I think, quite clear that neither at law nor in equity could the burden of a contract be shifted off the shoulders of a contractor on to those of another without the consent of the contractee. A debtor cannot relieve himself of his liability to his creditor by assigning the burden of the obligation to someone else; this can only be brought about by the consent of all three, and involves the release of the original debtor . . .

(Emphasis added)

The proposition set out above in Tolhurst, supra, does not apply to the present situation. In the present case, Properties (the defendant in this action) accepts complete responsibility for the liabilities and obligations of Quay West. They do not rely on the revised corporate structure to escape any responsibility to the plaintiffs under the agreements. As was set out in para. 99 of the amended statement of claim which was admitted by Huang & Danczkay:

Through a series of transactions . . . the partnership of Huang & Danczkay Properties acquired all of the assets of Quay West and became liable for all of the obligations and liabilities of Quay West.

The property which was conveyed was accompanied by an assumption of liability which provided that the obligations of the original entity would be assumed by the revised structure. In my view, the conveyances did not in themselves constitute a breach of contract. If I am wrong in my conclusion that there was no breach of contract, in this case, there are no damages resulting.

(ii) Breach of trust

To consider whether or not the transfer of the site by Quay West to Properties constituted a breach of trust, it is necessary to keep in mind the principles set out in York Condominium Corp. No. 167 v. Newrey Holdings Ltd., supra. In Newrey, numerous purchasers had entered agreements of purchase and sale. Prior to the registration of the condominium declaration and description, the developer sold parking units and retained the proceeds. The court held that the developer was a trustee of the property for the purchasers and the sales were a breach of trust. The developer had to account for the sale proceeds.

Wilson J.A., delivering the judgment of the court, set out the nature of the position of a developer who proposes to build a condominium at p. 467:

I do not think the position of the owner-developer remains unchanged after he starts to sell units. I think at that point he has committed the character of the project to that of condominium under the Act and declaration. I think he has placed himself in a fiduciary relationship to the unit purchasers not only with respect to their units but also with respect to the interests appurtenant thereto. He therefore holds the property in trust for the unit purchasers, present and prospective, and for the condominium corporation which will come into being upon registration of the declaration. I believe he is under a duty to protect the interests of all unit owners, present and prospective, and cannot put his own interests in conflict with theirs even although he himself continues to be an owner as long as any units remain unsold.

Once an owner-developer begins to sell units of a condominium, prior to the registration of the declaration, the owner-developer becomes a trustee of the property for the benefit of purchasers and owes fiduciary duties to the purchasers. The terms of the trust existing between the purchasers and the owner-developer are such that the trustee cannot deal with the property so as to defeat the purchasers' equitable interests in it. As set out in York Condominium Corp. No. 767 v. Newrey Holdings, supra, the purchasers acquire an equitable interest in their units and in the common elements. Both the plaintiffs and the defendant are in agreement with respect to the principles that emerge from York Condominium Corp. No. 167 v. Newrey Holdings, supra, however, they disagree as to its application to the facts of this case.

The plaintiffs claim that upon execution of the agreements, Quay West became a trustee for the purchasers with respect to the land on which the condominium unit and common interests were to be located. They submit Quay West was then not entitled to deal with the land in such a way as to interfere with or defeat the equitable interests of the purchasers. The plaintiffs submit that Quay West's transfer of the site was a breach of its trust obligations.

The defendant argues that Quay West did not, at any time, deal with the units or common elements in such a way as to interfere with or defeat the equitable interests of the purchasers. The site was always retained for the benefit of the plaintiffs since it was always the intention of Huang & Danczkay to build the project. Further, when the site was transferred, the defendant states that it was done with all of the encumbrances and liabilities attached. Therefore, the equitable interests of the plaintiffs in the property were transferred along with the property itself.

In arguing that a trust situation existed, the plaintiffs rely on the Alberta Court of Appeal decision in Terrace Corp. (Construction) v. Owners of Condominium Plan. No. 752-1207 (1983), 146 D.L.R. (3d) 324, 26 Alta. L.R. (2d) 147 (C.A.). In this case, the condominium corporation sued Terrace Corporation, the builder, and Erwin and Willi Zeiter, officers of Terrace who initially managed the corporation. The development included a parking structure in which the roof was also a parking facility.

Terrace took a 99-year lease of the roof from the condominium corporation. Terrace was the registered owner of all of the condominium units and it appointed the condominium corporation. The Zeiters executed the lease on behalf of both the lessor and the lessee. Terrace conceded that the Zeiters, when they entered into the lease on behalf of the condominium corporation, had a fiduciary duty to the persons who were purchasing condominium units under interim agreements.

Despite the fact that the lease was disclosed to individual purchasers, the Alberta Court of Appeal held that these circumstances constituted a breach of fiduciary duty which resulted in the lease agreement being voidable. Stevenson J.A. explained at p. 328:

On the face of it the lease of common property by the Zeiters, nominees and principals of Terrace, to Terrace was a breach of their fiduciary duty. They were managers of the property in which the condominium unit buyers had an equitable interest and leased that property to the very corporation which appointed them managers.

The Terrace case is distinguishable from the present case. At no time did Quay West deal with the units or common elements in such a way as to interfere with or defeat the equitable interests of the purchasers. The conveyances were not made free and clear of all encumbrances. Therefore, the equitable interests of the purchasers were transferred along with the property itself.

The transfer and eventual dissolution of Quay West were designed to streamline Huang & Danczkay's holdings into one corporate entity in order to facilitate the larger transaction with Claridge. The dissolution of Quay West must not be viewed in isolation. The dissolutions were part of a joint venture between Claridge and Huang & Danczkay involving some 20 properties including Terminal 3 at Pearson International Airport. I find that there was never any intention on the part of the defendant to defeat its obligations under the agreements. Huang & Danczkay acknowledged that they were bound by the agreements and the terms and conditions therein.

In the result, I find that a trust relationship existed in the present case. However, in the circumstances of this case, I find that Quay West did not deal with the property in such a way so as to defeat the purchasers' equitable interest. Therefore, there is no breach of trust.

If a breach of trust had been found in these circumstances, it would have been necessary to go on and consider the appropriate damages. Therefore, I will do so in any event.

The plaintiffs argue that once a breach of trust is found, there is no requirement to prove a nexus of causation between the breach of trust and the losses. The plaintiffs rely on Island Realty Investments Ltd. v. Douglas (1985), 19 E.T.R. 56 (B.C.S.C.). The plaintiff (investor) in that case invested money in mortgages. Rather than dealing directly with borrowers, it made these investments through the corporate defendant (Vidco) acting as a mortgage broker. Vidco would, from time to time, make a proposal to the plaintiff for an investment, and if the plaintiff considered the proposal to be a desirable one, it would entrust to Vidco the amount it intended to invest.

The plaintiff terminated the relationship by notice to Vidco. In spite of that, Vidco made a further proposal to the plaintiff for investment after receiving the notice of the termination. The plaintiff decided to participate in this investment. The investment did not produce the expected profit and the plaintiff suffered some loss. Stewart L.J.S.C. concluded that the fact that it was "highly probable" that the plaintiffs would have suffered the loss even if the breach of trust had not been committed was not relevant in a claim for breach of trust. As a result, the defendants were liable for the loss suffered by the plaintiff. Stewart L.J.S.C. stated at pp. 64-65:

If a loss follows a breach as in this case I cannot consider the proposition that the loss would have occurred in any event. It is not the same as proving damages following a breach of contract. His authority for this is an old case, a decision of Galt J. in Manitoba, Br. North Amer. Elevator Co. v. Bank of Br. North Amer. (1914), 6 W.W.R. 1444, 20 D.L.R. 944, [varied 9 W.W.R. 1368, 26 D.L.R. 587, 32 D.L.R. 181 (Man. C.A.)] where Galt J. had this to say at p. 1477 [6 W.W.R.]:

It is not open to a trustee, or to one acting knowingly in conjunction with him, where there has been a breach of trust and loss has followed, either to tender evidence that if he had strictly followed the directions of the trust an equal or greater loss would have taken place.

The case was appealed successfully, but the judgments of the Court of Appeal need not be reviewed as the judgment of the trial Judge was restored by the Privy Council, [1919] 2 W.W.R. 748, [1919] A.C. 658, 46 D.L.R. 326.

With respect to the inevitability of loss issue, in Plaza Fiberglass Manufacturing Ltd. v. Cardinal Insurance Co., [1990] 68 D.L.R. (4th) 586 ("Plaza Fiberglass"), it was found that there was a breach of fiduciary duty. The trial judge went on to consider the submission that, even if there was a breach of fiduciary duty, there was no loss. The trial judge referred to Ellis, Fiduciary Duties in Canada (1988), where the author dealt with the irrelevance of the inevitability of loss at p. 20-3 (now p. 20-4):

Perhaps most significant to the calculation of fiduciary damages is the concept of inevitability of loss. The Courts have long precluded the defaulting fiduciary from arguing that the loss would have occurred in any event: Island Realty Investments Ltd. v. Douglas (1985), 19 E.T.R. 56 (B.C.S.C.). In that case, the Court acknowledged the inevitability of loss, and, absent the equitable position reflected in precedents cited to it, would have dismissed the action.

It was concluded by the trial judge [p. 601 D.L.R.]:

Practically, this approach alleviates against a requirement that the complaining party tie the loss to the breach and, where the breach and a related loss occur, the defaulting party is estopped from arguing the inevitability of the loss.

It should be noted that in Plaza Fiberglass, defendant's counsel submitted that the appropriate test was that set out by Mr. Justice Dickson in Guerin v. R., [1984] 2 S.C.R. 335, 13 D.L.R. (4th) 321. The defendants in the present case also made reference to the Guerin case arguing that there must be a nexus in terms of causation between the breach of trust and the losses suffered by the plaintiff. In Guerin, Dickson J. held that the measure of damages is the actual loss which the acts or omissions have caused to the trust estate, the plaintiffs being entitled to be placed in the same position so far as possible as if there had been no breach of trust. In disagreeing that the test set out in Guerin was the appropriate test to apply, the trial judge stated the following [p. 601 D.L.R.]:

Dickson J. does not discuss the question where the loss was inevitable in any event. In my opinion, the quotation from Wilson J. in Guerin v. The Queen, supra, at p. 365 [D.L.R.] also does not assist the defendants. It does not deal with the question of the inevitability of the loss.

The decision in Plaza Fiberglass was appealed [reported at (1994), 18 O.R. (3d) 663, 115 D.L.R. (4th) 37]. Robins J.A., delivering the judgment of the court, found that the trial judge had erred in finding that there was any breach, fiduciary or otherwise. In light of the disposition of the fiduciary duty issue, it was not necessary to consider the inevitability issue, however, as the issue was argued at some length, the court thought it was appropriate to make some observations.

Robins J.A. did not agree that the inevitability of the loss could be dismissed as irrelevant. He stated at p. 673:

Assuming, for present purposes, that New Hampshire was in breach of a fiduciary duty, I am unable to agree that the inevitability of the loss can be dismissed as irrelevant. In my respectful opinion, the question of whether or not Plaza's loss was inevitable in the sense that it would have been sustained regardless of the breach is a pertinent factor to be taken into account in determining whether any loss was occasioned as a result of the breach.

Robins J.A. went on to address the issue concerning causation. In doing so, he referred to the Island Realty case. At p. 673, Robins J.A. continued:

I think it manifest that before liability will be imposed on a fiduciary there must be some causal connection between the breach of duty and the loss complained of: Maghun v. Richardson Securities of Canada Ltd. (1986), 58 O.R. (2d) 1 at p. 18, 34 D.L.R. (4th) 161 (C.A.). A distinction must be drawn between a situation in which a loss is rendered inevitable due to intervening circumstances and one in which there is no causal relation between the loss and the conduct of the fiduciary that gave rise to the breach. Where there is a breach and a related loss the complaining party may be estopped from arguing that subsequent events rendered the loss inevitable in that the loss would have been suffered in any event: see Island Realty Investments Ltd. v. Douglas (1985), 19 E.T.R. 56 (B.C.S.C.); and Ellis, Fiduciary Duties in Canada (1988), at pp. 20-22. However, where a loss is completely unconnected to a breach of duty, the loss cannot be attributed to the fiduciary. It cannot be the case that a fiduciary is responsible for all damages suffered by the complaining party regardless of their cause.

(Emphasis added) The Court of Appeal went on to conclude that, even if it was accepted that there was a fiduciary duty between Plaza and New Hampshire, no act or omission found against New Hampshire caused or contributed to the loss Plaza encountered.

Turning to the situation at hand, it becomes necessary to look at the facts of this case to determine whether there is a causal relation between the loss and the conduct of the fiduciary that gave rise to the breach. In the fall of 1988, a deal was reached whereby Huang & Danczkay Properties was to be formed. As explained earlier, the site was one of the properties which was to be transferred to Properties. This deal was part of a much larger joint venture between Huang & Danczkay and Claridge involving Terminal 3 at Pearson International Airport. On March 1, 1989, legal title to the site was transferred to a numbered company as bare trustee for Quay West which was the beneficial owner. By documents dated June 8, 1989, the assets and liabilities of Quay West and other properties were assigned to Huang & Danczkay Properties.

On July 10, 1989, Quay West returned the deposits with interest to the purchasers. This occurred after a number of events and culminated in the downzoning of the site. The evidence demonstrated that the agreement between Huang & Danczkay and Claridge had been in development for a long time. While the fact that the closing in June of 1989 coincided with events at the site may raise the impression that there was more to the transaction than meets the eye, there is insufficient direct evidence to establish a breach of trust on that basis.

It is true that Huang & Danczkay did not tell the plaintiffs that Quay West was no longer the other party to the contract and this may have been less than completely candid. Huang & Danczkay might have preferably told the plaintiffs, however, they nonetheless did continue to accept their obligations. Even if they initially denied their responsibility, it would not have changed the situation because they ultimately acknowledged their full responsibility and liability should Quay West eventually be found liable.

Even if there was a breach, in the circumstances of this case, the plaintiffs have failed to establish any causal connection between the breach and the loss claimed.

DAMAGES

The assessment of damages in this case is difficult. Chaplin v. Hicks, [1911] 2 K.B. 786, [1911-13] All E.R. Rep. 224 (C.A.), is the leading decision establishing the proposition that difficulty in proof of damages is not a bar to recovery. The court reasoned at pp. 792-94:

In the case of a breach of contract for the delivery of goods the damages are usually supplied by the fact of there being a market in which similar goods can be immediately bought, and the difference between the contract price and the price given for the substituted goods in the open market is the measure of damages; that rule has been always recognized. Sometimes, however, there is no market for the particular class of goods; but no one has ever suggested that, because there is no market, there are no damages. In such a case the jury must do the best they can, and it may be that the amount of their verdict will really be a matter of guesswork. But the fact that damages cannot be assessed with certainty does not relieve the wrongdoer of the necessity of paying damages for his breach of contract.

The Common Law Courts never enforced contracts specifically, as was done in equity; if a contract was broken, the common law held that an adequate solution was to be found in a pecuniary sum, that is, in the damages assessed by a jury. But there is no other universal principle as to the amount of damages than that it is the aim of the law to ensure that a person whose contract has been broken shall be placed as near as possible in the same position as if it had not. The assessment is sometimes a matter of great difficulty.

Fuller and Purdue in their article "The Reliance Interest in Contract Damages" (1936-37), 46 Yale L.J. 52, defined different types of damages. The plaintiffs in this action seek to recover what Fuller and Purdue characterized as damages for "loss of bargain". It was described in the following terms by Fuller and Purdue at p. 54 of their article:

We may seek to give the promisee the value of the expectancy which the promise created. We may in a suit for specific performance actually compel the defendant to render the promised performance to the plaintiff . . . [and] in a suit for damages, we may make the defendant pay the money value of this performance. Here our object is to put the plaintiff in as good a position as he would have occupied had the defendant performed his promise. The interest protected in this case we may call the expectation interest.

In assessing damages, I am guided by the following principles. The plaintiffs are to be placed in the same position as they would have been in had the contract been performed. The date from which the court should assess damages is the date which is the most appropriate for the circumstances of the particular case. As stated by McLachlin J. (as she then was) in Richter v. Simpson (1982), 24 R.P.R. 37 at p. 39, 37 B.C.L.R. 325 (S.C.):

The fundamental principle in assessing damages for breach of contract is that the plaintiff is to be placed in the same position he would have been had the contract been performed. A qualification on this principle is that he is not entitled to recover losses which he could have avoided by taking reasonable steps; that is, he is obligated to mitigate his loss. While damages are most often assessed as of the date of breach, this is not an absolute rule; the Court has power to fix such other date as may be appropriate in the circumstances: Johnson v. Agnew, [1980] A.C. 367, [1979] 1 All E.R. 883 (H.L.).

This is consistent with the view taken by the courts in Ontario. In Garbens v. Khayami (1994), 17 O.R. (3d) 162 at p. 164, 36 R.P.R. (2d) 244 (Gen. Div.), Wright J. clearly set out the principle of damages:

The first principle of damages is to put the innocent party in the position he or she would have been had the contract not been breached. In a contract of sale, this principle normally leads to assessment as at the date of the breach. However, in Johnson v. Agnew, [1979] 1 All E.R. 883 at p. 896, [1979] 2 W.L.R. 487 (H.L.), Lord Wilberforce added that this rule was not an absolute one: "If to follow it would give rise to injustice, the court has power to fix such other date as may be appropriate in the circumstances."

In Rice v. Rawluk (1992), 8 O.R. (3d) 696 (Gen. Div.), the purchasers refused to close, alleging that the vendor had refused to remove certain work orders. The court found for the vendor/defendant by counterclaim. In setting out the assessment of damages, O'Brien J., at p. 717, quoted from the case of Bitton v. Jakovljevic (1990), 75 O.R. (2d) 143, 13 R.P.R. (2d) 48 (H.C.J.): "Since the decision in Johnson v. Agnew, case law indicates that there is no consistent rule for the date of assessment of damages. Each case is decided on its own facts based on a fairness test."

The crucial question to determine is the date from which damages are to be assessed. The possible dates are:

1. July 10, 1989 -- date of termination letters
2. December 1, 1989 -- possession date for Phase I March 1, 1990 -- possession date for Phase II August 1, 1990 -- possession date for Phase III
3. Extended possession dates
4. Trial date Huang & Danczkay argued at trial that the appropriate date to assess damages was the extended possession date for each particular phase. Their reasoning was that, since the power to extend the possession dates pursuant to the agreements was exercisable at the sole discretion of the vendor, and taking into account the delays caused by the City of Toronto passing the interim control by-law at the 11th hour, the extended date would be a reasonable date.

This argument is flawed for a number of reasons. As stated earlier, the vendors did not, in fact, exercise their right to extend the possession dates in the agreements. The court should not assume, for the purposes of damage assessment, that Huang & Danczkay would have extended the possession dates. In addition, pursuant to the agreements, the date could have been extended anywhere from 1 to 240 days. It seems that the defendants are arguing that the court should assume that the possession dates would have been extended for the full 240 days. In the absence of an actual extension of the possession dates, there is simply no basis to conclude that damages should be assessed in this way. In my view, it would be pure speculation and completely arbitrary to assess damages at the extended possession dates.

The plaintiffs' position was that damages should be assessed at the date of the breach (July 10, 1989). Numerous cases were cited for the proposition that, where a vendor fails to complete an agreement of purchase and sale, the normal measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the market value of the property at the date of the breach. I also reject this argument. The reason is that the plaintiffs did not expect to receive their condominium units at that date.

I find that the most appropriate date to assess damages in this case is the date when the defendant was obliged to deliver possession of the units under the individual agreements. Assessing damages at the possession dates is the most reasonable date to use in this case as it takes into account when each plaintiff contemplated that they would have possession of the units. Therefore, in this case, the appropriate date for the assessment of damages is as follows: for Phase I, December 1, 1989; for Phase II, March 1, 1990; and for Phase III, August 1, 1990.

Turning now to the valuation, three expert witnesses provided appraisal evidence at trial. The plaintiffs called Mr. Gary McIlravey and Mr. Mullins who did not undertake an appraisal but was called for the purpose of commenting upon the other expert witnesses.

Mr. Gary McIlravey is a marketing consultant, mainly for private sector developers and builders, but also for the public sector. His primary area of expertise is market research relating to the Toronto condominium market. His firm, N. Barry Lyon Consultants Ltd., publishes a quarterly report that contains data relating to sales of pre-sale condominiums in Toronto.

For the purposes of damage assessment, Mr. McIlravey estimated the market value of the Quay West units at July 1989. Mr. McIlravey proceeded on the basis that he was valuing the units as if they were pre-sale units. In other words, he was estimating the market price on the assumption the Quay West units were being sold that had not yet been constructed, or fully constructed, but were being made available for sale by developers prior to completion.

Mr. McIlravey used data to evaluate price differentials for four scenarios. The price differentials represent the difference between the agreement price and some other market price established differently for each of the four scenarios. I will briefly outline the calculations involved in the four scenarios:

Scenario 1 -- Difference between agreement price and pre-sale market values of Quay West units on the assumption that they were built and remarketed

With respect to Mr. McIlravey's first scenario, each price differential represents the difference between the agreement price for the particular unit and the estimated market price of the unit assuming that the Quay West project was being sold as a new pre-sales project in July of 1989.

The plaintiffs submit that the "price differentials" for Scenario 1 (market value of Quay West units as at July, 1989) represent the damages suffered by the plaintiffs.

Scenario 2 -- Difference between agreement price and the price a plaintiff would have to pay for a comparable existing pre-sale unit in July, 1989 Each price differential in Scenario 2 represents the difference between the agreement price the plaintiff would have paid if that plaintiff had gone into the market in July 1989 and purchased an existing pre-sale condominium unit. The price differentials are lower in Scenario 2 as Scenario 1 assumes that the plaintiffs are compensated as at July, 1989 for a pre-sale condominium unit of the same size at the Quay West waterfront location. Scenario 2 assumes that the plaintiffs purchased pre-sale units in Toronto, not on the waterfront.

Scenario 3 -- Difference between agreement price and the price a plaintiff would have had to pay for a waterfront re-sale in July 1989

Each price differential for Scenario 3 represents the difference between the particular agreement price and the estimated price the plaintiff would have been paid if that plaintiff had gone into the market in July, 1989 and purchased an existing re-sale condominium unit. It should be noted that there were some re-sale units available on the waterfront.

Scenario 4 -- Difference between agreement price and the market price of the unit assuming the Quay West project was built and the unit was being sold as a re-sale unit in July 1989

Mr. McIlravey attempted to estimate the resale value of condominiums on the Quay West site assuming that they had been built and were capable for resale by July 1989. Each price differential for Scenario 4 represents the difference between the agreement price for the particular unit and the estimated market price of the unit assuming that the Quay West project was built and the unit was being sold as a resale unit in July 1989.

Both scenarios 1 and 2 address the price of pre-sale condominium units in July 1989. The difficulty with this approach is that it misconstrues the agreements which were entered into between the parties. Quay West agreed to build a condominium unit for delivery on the possession date. They did not agree to enter into a new pre-sale agreement in 1989. In order to be put into as good a position as they would be had the agreements been completed, the plaintiffs should receive the market value of a condominium unit on the possession date.

Mr. McIlravey's scenarios 3 and 4 dealt with re-sale. In my view, these approaches more accurately reflect the proper valuation, however, Mr. McIlravey assumes resale in July of 1989. As set out above, the parties did not contract to have a condominium unit in July 1989 and therefore a valuation based upon this methodology is problematic.

The defendant's appraisal expert was Mr. Pestl. Mr. Pestl has been a certified real estate appraiser since 1977. Mr. Pestl delivered a report to the court in which he provided market values for the individual condominium units at a variety of dates.

For his analysis, Mr. Pestl began with the actual price in the agreements for which the purchasers agreed to buy the units. Mr. Pestl compared these prices with purchase prices of other comparable units in the vicinity and concluded that the purchase prices in the agreements were reflective of their approximate market value. Mr. Pestl then estimated the market value of the units at various points in time through the application of a price index as follows: he considered the raw MLS statistical data, having regard to (1) the average sale prices of condominium units in Metropolitan Toronto, (2) the general residential sales statistics for central Toronto, as well as (3) the condominium unit sales statistics for the MLS C-1 and C-8 districts (areas located on the waterfront).

Based on this index, Mr. Pestl determined the value of the units at different times (contained in Exhibit A 324). By the possession dates, Mr. Pestl concluded that the value of the units would have exceeded their purchase price by $4,860,387. Mr. Pestl engaged in this same exercise to include the agreements to purchase parking spaces and set out the approximate market value of the units in question over various points in time at p. 46 of his report:

Phase I as at December 1, 1989 $2,568,353

Phase II as at March 1, 1990 1,636,816

Phase III as at July 3, 1990 1,361,125 _____ $5,566,294

In his evidence, Mr. Pestl adjusted these figures to take into account the discontinuance of the within action by various plaintiffs. The adjusted figures of the unit values including the parking spaces are as follows (contained in ex. 329):

Phase I as at December 1, 1989 $2,384,917

Phase II as at March 1, 1990 1,405,127

Phase III as at July 3, 1990 1,186,090 _____ $4,976,134

The plaintiffs took issue with the fact that Mr. Pestl did not deal with the pre-sale market. In my view, the argument that valuation should be based on the pre-sale approach is not in accordance with the principles of compensatory damages. It fails to take into account that the plaintiffs contracted for an actual condominium unit to be delivered on the possession date. The plaintiffs did not bargain for, and they did not expect, a brand new pre-sale contract with delivery at a later date. To base compensation on a pre-sale contract and not what the parties actually bargained for would amount to over-compensation.

The plaintiffs further say that it is essential to recognize that the agreements in this case contemplated a new condominium unit which was of special attraction value. In my view, Mr. Pestl's valuation takes into account the new feature of the condominiums as it considers the actual purchase price which each purchaser agreed to pay when the agreement was entered into. This is based on the particulars of each unit (i.e., the particular view, which floor of the building the unit was to be located on, etc.).

Based on Mr. Pestl's valuation method, damages are assessed as follows:

Phase I as at December 1, 1989 $2,384,917

Phase II as at March 1, 1990 1,405,127

Phase III as at July 3, 1990 1,186,090 _____ $4,976,134

CONCLUSION

The defendant is liable for breach of contract simply because it terminated the agreements without any lawful justification. The contracts created obligations to build. Although there were some termination clauses that would apply in certain circumstances, none of them were applicable to permit the developer to terminate the contracts at any stage. In the absence of any applicable termination clause, the defendant could not terminate the contracts as it did.

This is not an appropriate case to find that there was frustration of contract. The legal principles suggest two reasons why this defence must fail. First, the possibility of problems at the municipal level were contemplated by the parties at the time of contracting. The evidence demonstrates that this was one reason for the insertion of cl. 38 in the agreements. Quay West knew and intended that cl. 38 would be used to terminate the agreements by June 30, 1988 if they were unable to secure development review approval for the project. Second, Huang & Danczkay refused to further negotiate with the City following the letter by Councillor Nowlan. Huang & Danczkay cannot rely on their own default to excuse them from liability under the agreements.

With respect to damages, July of 1989 is not the appropriate date at which to assess the plaintiffs' damages. The appropriate date at which to assess damages is the possession date under the agreements. This adequately takes into account when the plaintiffs expected delivery of their condominium unit.

As to the appraisal of damages, the evidence of the defendant's expert witness, Mr. Pestl, is preferred over that of Mr. McIlravey. Mr. Pestl's report provided market values for the various units on a variety of dates. In addition, Mr. Pestl used the actual purchase price as a starting point and then developed a time trended value index as to the market values of waterfront condominiums over the relevant period.

Mr. McIlravey's approach was detailed and thorough, however, it was flawed in some respects. Most importantly, Mr. McIlravey's approach addressed the marketable price of pre-sale condominium units. The difficulty with this approach is that the plaintiffs did not bargain for, and they did not expect, a brand new pre-sale contract with delivery at a later date. Quay West agreed to build a condominium unit for delivery on the possession date. Valuation based upon pre-sale condominium asking prices is therefore inappropriate. The total damages are summarized below and are broken down on a unit-by-unit basis in Sch. A:

Phase I as at December 1, 1989 $2,384,917

Phase II as at March 1, 1990 1,405,127

Phase III as at July 3, 1990 1,186,090 _____ $4,976,134

Therefore, judgment will issue for the plaintiffs in accordance with the amounts set out in Sch. A. I may be spoken to with respect to prejudgment interest and, if costs cannot be agreed upon, I will entertain submissions with respect to the scale of costs for assessment.

Judgment accordingly.

Metropolitan Toronto Condominium Corporation No. 850, applicant, and Sylvia Oikle and Executive Suites Ltd., respondent

Court File No. 4084/94 Ontario Court of Justice - General Division Toronto, Ontario Lissaman J. Heard: October 3, 1994. Judgment: December 28, 1994.

Michael A. Spears, for the applicant. Jonathan H. Fine, for the respondent, Sylvia Oikle.

[para1] LISSAMAN J.:-- This application is yet another case dealing with the relationship between a Condominium Corporation and an individual unit owner with respect to their various rights and obligations.

[para2] The facts in the case at bar are not in dispute and they are as follows:

[para3] In April of 1991 the respondent, Sylvia Oikle ("Oikle"), purchased a unit in the condominium building known as (Suite 2107) 25 The Esplanade, Toronto. The applicant in this case is Metropolitan Toronto Condominium Corporation No. 850 ("MTCC 850") which was created to develop 25 The Esplanade. Oikle, the first named respondent, purchased her unit towards the end of April 1991 and lived in the unit until November 1992 when she moved out of the City of Toronto. Oikle, effective November 15, 1992, leased her condominium unit to Executive Suites Ltd. who is also a respondent in this case. Executive Suites Ltd. is not contesting this application other than giving support to Oikle. Clearly the respondent Executive Suites Ltd. will be bound by any relief given by this Court to the applicant.

[para4] It is common ground that the respondent, Executive Suites Ltd., runs a business leasing condominium units to persons who would otherwise stay in hotels and in fact their advertising emphasizes this feature. The applicant disapproves of the sub-leasing to Executive Suites Ltd. and in particular the way of operating which it says contravenes the Condominium Declaration that governs the occupancy of Oikle's unit. To be fair I must mention that at the time of writing these reasons I have not heard that there were any complaints by any other unit holders as to the leasing of Oikle's unit.

[para5] It is asserted that Executive Suites Ltd. rents the unit as often as possible. When a unit is occupied it is done so by a single family.

[para6] The relief sought by the applicant in this case is as follows:

1. a declaration that the respondent, Ms. Oikle, is in breach of section 31(1) of the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C-26;
2. a declaration that the respondent, Executive Suites Ltd. has breached Article IV(2)(a) of the Declaration;
3. a declaration that both respondents are in breach of Article IV(1)(a) of the Declaration and Article II of the Rule Respecting Commercial Use of Units;
4. an order requiring the respondents to comply with Article IV(1)(a) of the Declaration and Article II of the Rule Respecting Commercial Use of Units; and
5. an order requiring the respondents to pay the costs of the applicant calculated on a solicitor and client scale in accordance with Article VIII(5)(a) of the Declaration and Rule 20 of the Rules of MTCC No. 850.

THE ISSUE

[para7] The issue raised in this application concern the control of a condominium corporation over its unit holders. The issue can be expressed as follows:

Given the Declaration, By-laws and the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1990, c.26 can the requested orders be made which limit the manner in which a unit holder may manage his or her unit?

In order to determine this issue it is necessary to look at the relevant sections of the Condominium Act, and the relevant rules of the condominium corporation which are found in its Declaration and in its By-laws.

THE LAW

[para8] Condominium corporations are created to manage the assets of a condominium which is owned collectively by its unit holders. The condominium corporation incorporates a system whereby the majority rules and the unit holders may decide how they want their condominiums to run subject to any restrictions contained in the Condominium Declaration which are not contrary to the Condominium Act. It is trite law to say that once the rules have been established a unit owner is expected to abide by them and the Condominium Corporation is obliged to enforce them.

[para9] Section 3(3) of the Act reads as follows:

In addition to the matters in subsection (1), and in any other sections in this Act, a declaration may contain, ...

(b) provisions respecting the occupation and use of the units and common elements; (c) provisions restricting gifts, leases and sales of the units and common interests;

Section 12(3) and (5) of the Act provide as follows:

(3) The Corporation has a duty to effect compliance by the owners with this Act, the declaration, the by-laws and the rules.

(5) Each owner and each person having a registered mortgage against a unit and common interest has the right to the performance of any duty of the Corporation specified by this Act, the declaration, the by-laws and the rules. [emphasis added]

Section 31 provides as follows:

(1) Each owner is bound by and shall comply with the Act, the Declaration, the By-laws and Rules. (2) Each owner has a right to the compliance by the other owners with this Act, the Declaration, the By-laws and the Rules.

(3) The Corporation, and every person having an encumbrance against any unit and common interest, has a right to the compliance by the owners with this Act, the Declaration, the By-laws and the Rules.

[para10] The relevant rules governing the particular condominium unit, the subject of this Motion, are contained in the Condominium Declaration and this application is brought pursuant to section 49 of the Condominium Act which provides that a condominium corporation may seek an order from a Court to enforce the rules of the condominium as follows:

(1) Where a duty imposed by this Act, the declaration, the by-laws or the rules is not performed, the Corporation, any owner, the bureau, or any person having a registered mortgage against a unit and common interest, may apply to the Ontario Court (General Division) for an Order directing the performance of the duty.

(2) The Court may by Order direct performance of the duty and may include in the Order any provisions that the Court considers appropriate in the circumstances.

(4) The lessee of a unit is subject to the duties imposed by this Act, the declaration, the by-laws and the rules on an owner.

...

(6) Where the owner of a unit leases his unit, the owner shall notify the corporation that the unit is leased and shall provide to the corporation the lessee's name and the owner's address.

[para11] Having identified the applicable sections of the Condominium Act I must now consider the wording of the Condominium Declaration relating to the Oikle unit.

[para12] Article IV is as follows:

IV. UNITS

(1) Occupation and Use - The occupation and use of the Units shall be in accordance with the following restrictions and stipulations:

(a) Each unit shall be occupied and used only as a private, single family residential dwelling and for no other purpose; provided, however that the foregoing shall not prevent the Declarant from completing the Building and all improvements to the property, maintaining the Units as models for display and sale purposes in the said development only and otherwise maintaining construction offices, displays and signs until all Units have been sold by the Declarant.

(d) The owner of each Unit shall comply and shall require all residents and visitors to his Unit to comply with the Act, this Declaration and the by-laws and the Rules passed pursuant thereto.

(2) Requirements for Leasing

(a) Requirements for Leasing of Units - No owner shall lease his dwelling Unit unless he first obtains the written approval of the corporation to any proposed tenant and to the actual form of lease and he shall further cause the tenant to deliver to the corporation an agreement signed by the tenant, to the following effect:

"I _____, covenant and agree that I, members of my household and my guests from time to time, will, in using the Unit, rented by me, and the common elements, comply with the Condominium Act, the Declaration, By-laws and Rules of the Condominium Corporation, during the term of my tenancy."

The owner shall forthwith furnish the board with an executed copy of the lease in question and with his own forwarding address and telephone number from time to time and the name and telephone number of the tenant.

(b) Any owner leasing his Unit shall not be relieved thereby from any of his obligations with respect to the Unit pursuant to the Act, which shall be joint and several with his tenant. [emphasis added]

[para13] In the case at bar the applicability of Article IV(1)(a) must be examined. This Article purports to restrict the commercial use of the Oikle unit (or any of the units covered) and reads as follows:

Article I

Definitions

1. "Commercial Use" of a unit means, without limiting its generality:

- a. the carrying on of a business;
- b. the operation of a business office or professional office;
- c. hotel or boarding or lodging house use;

d. the disposition of an owner's or tenant's right to occupy a residential unit whereby the party or parties acquiring such interest or right is or are entitled to use or occupy the unit on a transient use basis or under any arrangement commonly known as time sharing;

2. "Transient Use" means more than one short term use or occupancy of a particular unit for a period of less than three (3) months in any particular period of twelve consecutive months.

Article II

1. Each condominium unit shall be for private residential occupation and use only and for no other purpose, and for greater certainty, but without limiting the generality of the foregoing, no commercial use shall be permitted in or with respect to any unit. [emphasis added]

VALIDITY OF THE RULES

[para14] Section 29 of the Condominium Act deals with this issue and is as follows:

In order for a rule to be valid it must have been enacted pursuant to section 29 of the Act. Section 29 states:

(1) The board may make rules respecting the use of common elements and units or any of them to promote the safety, security or welfare of the owners and of the property or for the purpose of preventing unreasonable interference with the use and enjoyment of the common elements and of other units.

(2) The rules shall be reasonable and consistent with this Act, the declaration and the by-laws,

(3) The rules shall be complied with and enforced in the same manner as the by-laws,

(4) Subject to subsection (5), any rule made under subsection (1) shall be effective thirty days after notice thereof has been given to each owner unless the board is in receipt of a requisition in writing made under section 19 requiring a meeting of owners to consider the rules,

(5) If a meeting of owners is required, the rule made under subsection (1) shall become effective only upon approval at such meeting of owners,

(6) The owners may at any time after a rule becomes effective amend or repeal a rule at a meeting of owners duly called for that purpose.

[emphasis added]

[para15] Counsel for the respondents referred to several decisions in which the Court found that the rule violated was invalid as being outside the board of directors' power. These cases are York Condominium Corp. No. 382 v. Dvorchik (1992), 24 R.P.R. (2d) 19 (Ont. Ct. (Gen. Div.)) (a rule that dogs weighing over 25 lbs. are prohibited was found to be invalid for being arbitrary and unreasonable), Waterloo North Condominium Corporation No. 31 v. Indico Ltd. and Jan Merkel (January 3, 1984), unreported, Mossip J. (a rule that only one pet was allowed was found to be invalid), and Metropolitan Toronto Condominium Corp. No. 650 v. Klein (1988), 49 R.P.R. 205 (Ont. Dist. Ct.) (a rule that only one car may be parked in the unit holder's parking spot was found to be invalid and parking two cars was permitted as long as neither car encroached on the common elements). All of these cases were decided on their facts given the language of section 29. None of them deal with a situation like this where a person is renting their unit to a corporation that is in the business of providing temporary accommodation to its clients.

POSITION OF APPLICANT

[para16] Putting the position of the applicant as succinctly as possible it is their position that the use being made of the Oikle unit contravenes the rules of the Condominium Corporation No. 850 that use being for residential occupation only.

[para17] The applicant alleges and such allegation is not challenged by the respondent Oikle that the respondent Executive Suites markets the Oikle unit in the Toronto Yellow Pages and in its advertising materials as "an alternative to conventional hotel accommodation". The advertising materials pertaining to the Oikle Unit alleges the following:

(a) the Unit is available for rent on a daily, weekly or monthly basis. Charges for occupation of the Unit, which are subject to provincial sales tax and Goods and Services Tax, are on a per diem rate with a discount for longer use. Rates for the Unit are described as "up to a 50 percent saving of conventional city hotel rates";

(b) payment for occupation of the Unit can be made by major credit card;

(c) reservations for the Unit can be made either directly through the head office of Executive Suites or through any travel agent;

(d) the Unit is fully furnished and equipped and includes a television, clock, radio, linen, towels, small kitchen appliances, pots, pans, utensils, cutlery, glasses and china;

(e) the Unit is equipped with a direct dial telephone. Local calls are complimentary and outstanding long-distance calls are charged at the end of the month to the occupant's credit card number on file at Executive Suites;

(f) housekeeping service is provided twice weekly by Executive Suites;

(g) check out time is at 10:00 a.m. as housekeepers have to clean and prepare the Unit for guest arrivals at 2:00 p.m.

(h) occupants can use the condominium corporation's amenities, facilities and common elements.

[para18] In the affidavit of Frederick Kozlo, on behalf of the applicant, it is alleged that during the month of January 1993 the respondent Executive Suites rented Unit 2107 on eleven separate occasions. Such allegation is not in any way challenged by the respondents. I am advised that on September 2, 1994 and September 5, 1994 Unit 2107 was continued to be rented on a short time basis. All leasing was without the applicant's permission.

[para19] The Rule Respecting Commercial Use of Units purportedly became effective on September 25, 1993, subsequent to Oikle's entering into a leasing arrangement with Executive Suites Ltd. Accordingly, even if the Rule is valid, it is submitted that Oikle's use of the Unit can continue as it is akin to a non-conforming use. York Condominium Corp. No. 122 v. Sibblis (1989), 72 O.R. (2d) 12 (Dist. Ct., Locke, J.).

[para20] In support of its position the applicant's Counsel has referred me to the following cases:

Re Matlavik Holdings Ltd. and Grimson (1979), 24 O.R. (2d) 92 at 92-93 (Div. Ct.)

Re Deerhurst Investment Ltd. and FPI Management Systems Ltd. (1984), 50 O.R. (2d) 687 at 690-691 (appeal to Divisional Court dismissed April 19, 1985)

Condominium Plan No.8810455 v. Spectral Capital Corporation (1990), 14 R.P.R. (2d) 305 at 307-308, 311-312 and 314 (Alta. Q.B.)

552838 Ontario Limited v. London Executive Suites, unreported decision of the Honourable Judge E.R. Brown, released November 19, 1992

York Condominium Corporation No. 216 v. Borsodi (1983), 42 O.R. (2d) 99 at 106-109. Ct.)

Carleton Condominium Corporation No. 279 v. Rochon (1987), 59 O.R. (2d) 545 at 552 (C.A.)

Metropolitan Condominium Corporation No. 776 v. Gifford (1989), 6 R.P.R. (2d) 217 at 224 (Ont. Dist. Ct.)

[para21] York Condominium Corp. No. 216 v. Borsodi (1983), 42 O.R. (2d) 99 (Co. Ct.) is a particularly helpful case. It states the proposition that just because unit holders do not complain, does not mean that the Declaration and By-laws should not be upheld by the Court. The case involved a building which had an "adults only" tower where no children under the age of 14 were permitted to live. Two other towers were designated as family towers. The other unit holders had not complained but the condominium corporation wished to enforce the rules. A relevant passage of the judgment of Allen J. at p. 106: In my view, the defendants' objection to the plaintiff's action is not strengthened by the absence of testimony to suggest that the defendants' child has in any way, by reason of conduct or behaviour, interfered with the rights of others. The child's very presence as a permanent resident in the defendants' unit places the defendants in a position of breach of the Declaration. And if the plaintiff did not seek to enforce the Declaration it too would be in breach of the Act.

[para22] At page 107 of the decision, Allen J. discussed the duty of the condominium corporation in this type of situations:

In my view, the plaintiff in this action is simply fulfilling the obligation cast upon it by the Act to enforce the Declaration for the benefit of the owners of all of the units in the Condominium. That is a desirable and legitimate purpose. [emphasis added]

[para23] The applicant also, in particular, relies on Mr. Justice Herold's decision in Metropolitan Toronto Condominium Corp. No. 776 v. Gifford (1989), 6 R.P.R. (2d) 217 (Ont. Dist. Ct.). This case supports the proposition that the Courts as part of policy should support the enforcement of the rules of a condominium. It is useful to quote Justice Herold's statement in the Gifford case which is as follows:

The major advantage of requiring compliance, on the other hand, appears to me to be that a message will be sent out by the board to the unit owners that the declaration and by-laws are in place for a good reason and they will be enforced, and a message will also be sent by the Court that where the board acts reasonably in carrying out its duty to enforce the by-laws and declaration the board will be supported by the Court.

A longer-term result of this position surely will be that people will only move into the building if they are prepared to live by the rules of the community which they are joining -- if they are not they are perfectly free to join another community whose rules and regulations may be more in keeping with their particular individual needs, wishes or preferences. [emphasis added]

POSITION OF RESPONDENT, OIKLE

[para24] Counsel for Oikle submitted that the provisions of the Declaration which purport to require the written approval of the condominium corporation to any proposed tenant and to the actual form of lease should be strictly construed as ultra-vires the condominium corporation. Counsel for Oikle submits that these provisions are an unreasonable restraint upon alienation and are not permitted under Section 3(3)(c) of the Act or otherwise. As well, there are no criteria set out for the purposes of approval of the tenant and the lease as required by the Declaration and therefore leaves open the possibility of arbitrary and capricious decision making.

[para25] Some of the factors a Court will consider in exercising its discretion under Section 49 of the Condominium Act are:

- (1) The nature of the total development.
- (2) What are the reasonable expectations of the other occupants of the development?
- (3) How seriously do other occupants take this particular issue as opposed to other issues?
- (4) Does the conduct of the unit owner in question interfere with others?

(5) Have there been any complaints by other unit owners?

(6) What is the relationship between or amongst the various interested parties?

(7) What is the actual wording of the covenant which is being enforced -- are similar pets allowed, for example, while dogs are disallowed?

(8) What are the advantages of requiring compliance compared to the advantages of permitting non-compliance? Metropolitan Toronto Condominium Corp. No. 776 v. Gifford (1989), 6 R.P.R. (2d) 217 (Ont. Dist. Ct.)

[para26] Counsel for Oikle submits that rules restricting the Unit's user to private residential use only do not bind Oikle as the only relevant restriction at the time of her purchasing the unit, the subject of this application, was that it be occupied and used only as a private, single family residential dwelling. Oikle submits that the amended rule referred to restricting user cannot affect her because it did not exist at the time of her purchase. It is very significant to me that the amended rule was clearly in existence at the time of the renewal of the Executive Suites lease.

[para27] The respondent, Oikle, relies on the following authorities to support her position:

Metropolitan Toronto Condominium Corp. No. 650 v. Klein (1988), 49 R.P.R. 205 (Ont. Dist. Ct. Conant J.)

[para28] A major part of the respondent Oikle's argument in this case is that by requiring a unit holder to seek approval prior to renting or leasing their premises the condominium corporation has unduly restricted the unit holders' rights of alienation. In support of this argument counsel referred to Re Peel Condominium Corporation No. 11 and Caroe (1974), 4 O.R. (2d) 543 (H.C.) and Winnipeg Condominium Corp. No. 1 v. Stechley, [1978] 6 W.W.R. 491 (Man. Q.B.). In both these cases the condominium rules required the owner of the unit to live in the unit. The owners were prohibited from renting or leasing the unit at all. This is not the case here. A unit holder is allowed to rent the unit but only in a limited way for not more than three times a year. In my view requiring the approval prior to renting or leasing a unit does not unduly restrict the owners rights of alienation.

FINDINGS

[para29] In my view the core question in this application is whether or not the Condominium Corporation's Declaration and the rules made thereunder prevent the respondent from leasing out her Unit in the manner she has been doing for many months. I find the rules were within the powers of MTCC 850 and are enforceable. Condominium Rules are enforceable by a Court pursuant to s. 49 of the Condominium Act. The powers given to a Court are discretionary and Condominium rules should not be enforced if they are capricious and arbitrary. Counsel for Oikle submits that, as no one complained about the leasing to the respondent, Executive Suites Ltd., enforcing the rules would be arbitrary and discriminatory to her. The financial burden on the respondent, Oikle, is also put to me as a factor I should consider in exercising discretion under s. 49. I find no merit whatsoever in this argument.

[para30] It is my view, and I so find, that the use by Executive Suites Ltd. is completely contrary to the use contemplated by the Condominium Declaration and by its unit holders. The argument about the amending of the Condominium Rules is of no merit as the amended rule was in existence at the time of the renewal of the Executive Suites lease. To allow the type of rentals the subject of the applicant's complaint to continue would be to open the gateway for the building known as 25 The Esplanade to be used by many of its unit holders in the same manner, so the whole flavour of the building would change. People who purchased units at 25, The Esplanade clearly thought they were buying units that would be owner occupied or long term lessee occupied rather than buying in a building where many of the residences would be rented and occupancies short term in nature. The cases submitted to me are helpful but not in any way definitive as this case must stand or fall on its particular facts.

[para31] In light of my findings as expressed, the applicant is entitled to the following relief:

1. a declaration that the respondent, Ms. Oikle, is in breach of section 31(1) of the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C-26;
2. a declaration that the respondent, Executive Suites Ltd. has breached Article IV(2)(a) of the Declaration;
3. a declaration that both respondents are in breach of Article IV(1)(a) of the Declaration and Article II of the Rule Respecting Commercial Use of Units;
4. an order requiring the respondents to comply with Article IV(1)(a) of the Declaration and Article II of the Rule Respecting Commercial Use of Units.

[para32] The respondent, Oikle, is also ordered to pay the applicant's costs on a solicitor and client scale grounds. If the parties cannot agree as to the quantum of such costs, I may be spoken to.

35 O.R. (3d) 257 Docket No. C16122 Court of Appeal for Ontario, Robins, Abella and Rosenberg JJ.A. September 4, 1997

APPEAL and CROSS-APPEAL from a judgment of B. Wright J. (1993), 32 R.P.R. (2d) 211 (Gen. Div.), rescinding an agreement to purchase units in a condominium project.

Theodore B. Rotenberg, for appellant. Mark H. Arnold, for respondent.

The judgment of the court was delivered by

ROBINS J.A.: -- This is an appeal and cross-appeal from a judgment of Blenus Wright J. rescinding an agreement under which the respondent condominium corporation agreed to purchase certain guest and superintendent suites that were intended to form a part of the common elements in a condominium project built by the corporate appellant. The dispute revolves around the question of whether the condominium corporation is entitled to these suites without payment or is obliged to purchase them in accordance with the terms of its agreement with the appellant.

The Facts The respondent is a condominium corporation created on October 31, 1990 as a result of the registration by the corporate appellant ("the developer" or "the declarant") of a declaration and description under the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.26 (the "Act"). The individual appellants are principals of or otherwise associated with the developer and were the first directors of the condominium corporation. The condominium is a residential project consisting of two high-rise buildings located on Rathburn Road West, in the City of Mississauga containing a total of some 400 suites. Each building has a superintendent's suite and two guest suites. Title to these suites has been held by the developer at all times.

The disclosure statement or the amended disclosure statement was delivered by the declarant to each and every purchaser of a condominium unit in the project. These statements specified, as did the draft declaration provided to the purchasers and, subsequently, the registered declaration, that the condominium corporation was to be under a "duty and obligation" to purchase a superintendent's unit and two guest units in each of the buildings pursuant to the terms of an agreement which is referred to as the "conveyance and purchase agreement". A draft copy of the conveyance and purchase agreement was attached to the disclosure statement. The total purchase price for these units was to be $480,000. Payment was to be made by way of blended monthly instalments of principal and interest, calculated half-yearly at the rate of 10 per cent per annum, amortized over a term of 20 years. The corporation was entitled to prepay the monies owing under the agreement at any time on 21 days' notice. Until the purchase price was fully paid, title to the units was to remain with the declarant. The corporation was to have a revocable licence to use the premises until it received title and, in the event of default, the declarant was to be entitled to terminate the agreement and regain possession. All common expenses and other payments relating to the six units were to be paid by the corporation.

The disclosure statement made no reference to any allocation of the percentage interest each of these six units had in the common elements or the percentage each was to contribute to common expenses. The declaration as registered allocated a zero percentage for each of the units for these purposes.

A proposed first year budget statement was attached to the disclosure statement. The expenditures required to satisfy the payments called for under the terms of the corporation's agreement to purchase the guest and superintendent suites were expressly provided for therein.

The disclosure statement made it clear to the purchasers that their purchase price did not include the superintendent and guest units. While these units were to be used as common elements of the condominium buildings, unlike the recreational facilities and other amenities that were to be provided by the developer, they were to be purchased by the condominium corporation on the terms specified in the disclosure statement and declaration. The declaration defines "guest units" and restricts their use to "guests of owners of Dwelling Units for temporary residential purposes" and subjects them to "such rules and regulations as the board of the Corporation may, from time to time, enact".

In the case of one of the buildings, the first building, the initial disclosure statement made no mention of these suites. However, the concept underlying the development was later changed by, among other things, removing a commercial component from the development and, contrary to the original scheme, making both buildings a part of the same project. These were material changes and, by reason of s. 52 of the Act, required the delivery of an amended disclosure statement. One was in fact provided to each of the purchasers. In the case of the first building, the terms of the amended disclosure statement were identical to those applicable to the second building which, from the outset, made it plain that the superintendent and guest suites were not included in the purchase price and were to be purchased by the corporation. Although entitled to do so, no purchaser chose to rescind his or her purchase on receipt of the amended disclosure statement. The differences in the factual background of the two buildings are of no consequence to the issues in this appeal. I see no reason to draw any distinction between the two buildings and shall treat both the same.

The individual appellants, as I have indicated, were the first directors of the corporation acting as proxies for the developer. As such, they enacted the by-laws, rules and regulations of the corporation and did the things normally expected of first directors of a condominium corporation. The complaint against them is that before turning over the board to independent directors elected by the purchasers, they enacted a by-law authorizing the execution of the conveyance and purchase agreement, the terms of which had been set by the developer, and completed the agreement on the corporation's behalf. In doing so, they did not formally disclose their conflict of interest and, it is contended, acted in breach of their fiduciary duty to the condominium corporation.

After a board of directors elected by the purchasers assumed office, payments were made in accordance with the conveyance and purchase agreement. There was no complaint about this agreement or the zero allocation referable to the suites in issue for almost two years. The corporation then raised a number of questions relating to the ownership of the suites. It took the position that they were common elements in the buildings and, as such, should, like other common elements, have been provided to the condominium corporation "free of charge". This led to the application that has resulted in this appeal.

The Application

The condominium corporation commenced these proceedings on January 25, 1993 seeking: (a) a declaration that the conveyance and purchase agreement dated November 23, 1990 resulted in a total failure of consideration, was an unconscionable transaction and is therefore null and void;

(b) a declaration that the six units form part of the common elements of the condominium buildings;

(c) appropriate amendments to the declaration to eliminate any reference to the six units as independent units and to delete the condominium's obligation to purchase the units;

(d) an order rescinding the conveyance and purchase agreement; and

(e) an order for repayment of all money paid by the corporation pursuant to the conveyance and purchase agreement.

The matter came on before Wright J. who, for reasons now reported at (1993), 32 R.P.R. (2d) 211, concluded that the conveyance and purchase agreement should be rescinded. He did not grant the declaration sought by the corporation to the effect that the six units formed part of the common elements of the buildings and were therefore the corporation's property. The judge was of the opinion that, because a zero percentage of the common interests and common expenses had been allocated to the units, the declaration was void in this respect and should be amended so as "to allocate the proper percentages of contribution to common expenses for all units including the six units in dispute". As collateral relief, he ordered the corporate appellant to pay the common expenses applicable to the six units and to repay the payments made by the corporation with a set-off in favour of the appellant for the corporation's use of the units.

Thus, as matters stand, the appellant developer owns the superintendent and guest suites and is entitled to deal with them free of any agreement with the condominium corporation. On the other hand, the condominium corporation has no right to purchase or use the suites even though it was contemplated that they would form part of the common elements of the project pursuant to the terms of the conveyance and purchase agreement. This result is apparently unsatisfactory to both parties. Hence, we have an appeal in which the developer seeks a declaration that the conveyance and purchase agreement is in full force and effect; and a cross-appeal in which the condominium corporation seeks a declaration that the six suites are common elements in the buildings owned by it free and clear of any claim by the developer.

The Issues

The issues in this appeal may be conveniently dealt with under two general headings: (1) the rescission issue; and (2) the zero percentage issue.

(1) The rescission issue

The motions judge rescinded the conveyance and purchase agreement on two grounds. First, he was of the view that the individual appellants, as first directors of the condominium corporation, were in breach of s. 17(1) of the Act in failing to disclose their interest in the conveyance and purchase agreement and in voting to conclude the transaction. Second, he was of the view that "[e]ven if non-compliance with s. 17(1) was not sufficient to nullify the agreement", the onerous terms and unilateral nature of the agreement rendered it unconscionable. In deciding whether there is any proper basis for rescinding the agreement, it is important to bear in mind the terms under which the owners of the condominium units in this project purchased their respective units. Clearly, each of them agreed by way of their purchase documents that the superintendent and guest suites were not included in their purchase price. The disclosure statement and declaration made it abundantly clear that these suites were to be purchased by the condominium corporation and used as common elements in accordance with the terms of the conveyance and purchase agreement. None of the purchasers has suggested that the corporation was to obtain the suites free of charge or that any representation was made with respect to their ownership contrary to the provisions of the purchase documents.

It is also important to recognize that the Act does not require that guest and superintendent suites be part of the common elements of a condominium. Such suites are not part of the common elements unless there is factual evidence that this was intended to be the case: see North York Condominium Corp. No. 5 v. Van Horne Clipper Properties Ltd. (1987), 60 O.R. (2d) 468 (H.C.J.); Frontenac Condominium Corp. No. 1 v. Macciocchi & Sons Ltd. (1975), 11 O.R. (2d) 649, 69 D.L.R. (3d) 199 (C.A.); and York Condominium Corp. No. 167 v. Newrey Holdings Ltd. (1981), 32 O.R. (2d) 458, 122 D.L.R. (3d) 280 (C.A.). Whether developers should be entitled to exclude from the common elements facilities of this nature or, indeed, other amenities ordinarily expected to be included in the common elements so as to have them purchased or otherwise dealt with after the unit purchases have been completed is a matter of policy for legislative and not judicial determination. As the Act presently stands, a declaration must contain the specific items set out in s. 3(1), and may contain the items set out in the broadly permissive provisions of s. 3(3). Under s. 3(3)(d), a declaration may contain "a specification of duties of the corporation consistent with its objects".

As the cases to which I have just made reference demonstrate, there is no question that a condominium corporation's purchase of suites that are not included in the declaration as part of the common elements in order to constitute them a part of the common elements for guest and superintendent purposes is a purchase consistent with the objects of a condominium corporation. The question raised here is whether the corporation can be required by means of a provision in the declaration to purchase such units or whether, as the corporation argues, the declaration to this effect is ultra vires. The motions judge did not give effect to this argument. He nullified the agreement on the grounds to which I have referred and not on the basis that the impugned provision of the declaration was in violation of the Act. I am inclined to the same view. Section 3(3) does not preclude this practice and, it seems to me, is broad enough to permit the inclusion of a provision of this nature. The imposition of a duty on a condominium corporation by way of the declaration in relation to the common elements of the condominium, in my opinion, falls within the category of duties consistent with the objects of the corporation that may be specified in the declaration. Furthermore, in the circumstances of this case, where it can be taken that unit owners have relied on the representations contained in the declaration, I think, for the reasons to which I shall come, it would be unreasonable if not unfair to void the declaration on this basis.

This brings me more specifically to the two grounds upon which the conveyance and purchase agreement was rescinded in the court below. Neither of these grounds, in my respectful opinion, constitutes a valid basis for rescinding the agreement to purchase and sell the six suites in question.

As I see the matter, the fact that the first directors did not formally disclose their obvious interest in the conveyance and purchase agreement and enacted a by-law authorizing them to execute the agreement is of no consequence. These directors did no more than organize the affairs of the condominium in the manner anticipated by the declaration and agreed to by the purchasers of the individual units. The purchasers were themselves to constitute the entire membership of the corporation and, under s. 7 of the Act, were to own the suites as tenants in common. Whether the steps necessary to complete the contemplated purchase transaction were taken by the initial directors or by the subsequently elected directors is immaterial. This is not the type of "disclosure of interest" situation to which s. 17(1) of the Act is directed. Nor is there any question of a breach of a fiduciary duty here. The acts of the first directors cannot be seen as being contrary to or inconsistent with the interests of the unit owners. In my opinion, s. 17(1) ought not to be invoked to nullify a transaction where, as here, everyone concerned was cognizant of the interests involved and specifically agreed to the transaction. The motions judge treated the conveyance and purchase agreement as being "unilateral in nature" in that the elected directors had "no input into the agreement". The fact, however, is that the elected directors and their co-owners, as purchasers, were aware of and agreed both to the corporation's acquisition of the six suites and to the terms under which they were to be acquired. From the viewpoint of the purchasers of individual units, the availability of guest suites for visiting relatives and friends may well have been an important factor in the decision of some of them to purchase units in this development. They were told by the declaration and disclosure statement that this amenity (and the superintendent suites) would be included in the common elements pursuant to the conveyance and purchase agreement, and were entitled to rely upon this representation.

It would not have been open to the developer before closing to resile from its agreement to sell these suites to the corporation without providing the purchasers with an amended disclosure statement and affording them the right to terminate their agreements. By the same token, I would not think it open to the elected directors after closing to effectively amend the declaration by refusing to complete a transaction that had been accepted by all of the owners, including the directors themselves. In my opinion, it would be improper for them to eliminate facilities or amenities that it was understood and expected would form part of the common elements of the condominium at this stage and in this manner. The agreement to purchase the six suites cannot be considered "unilateral" in these circumstances or treated as having been "foisted" on the corporations or its directors or the unit owners. To the contrary, as I have said, in completing the agreement the first directors were acting in compliance with a contract the terms of which had been approved by the unit owners who themselves constituted the total membership of the corporation and who were to be the owners of the suites.

I turn now to the alternative basis upon which the conveyance and purchase agreement was rescinded. The learned motions judge, as indicated earlier, was of the view that "[e]ven if non-compliance with s. 17(1) was not sufficient to nullify the agreement" the agreement was unconscionable and should be set aside on this ground. He found the agreement to be unconscionable on the basis that its terms were "onerous", and that it was unilateral in nature in that the corporation had "no input into the purchase price or its financing". He pointed only to those terms providing that title to the six units was not to pass to the corporation until all payments had been made at the end of the 20-year period provided for in the agreement; in the interim, he said, the corporation was "saddled" with paying all common expenses and other payments, including realty taxes, on the six units. With respect to the matter of the corporation's input into the agreement, he was of the view, as he was with respect to the s. 17(1) argument with which I have already dealt, that it was for the elected directors to decide whether the agreement should be accepted by the corporation. No deception, misrepresentation or non-disclosure is suggested in this case.

On the facts here, it cannot be concluded that the purchase price of the six suites was unfair or unreasonable either at the time the individual purchase agreements were signed or at the time the conveyance and purchase agreement was executed. There is no evidence to this effect. Nor is there any evidence indicating that the unit owners had somehow or other been victimized by the introduction of a term in the declaration applicable to the ownership of their units or the common elements that no sensible, well-advised purchaser would have accepted. Quite to the contrary, the fact that the suites were to be purchased by the condominium corporation and the terms of the purchase was made manifest in the purchase documents. A cursory analysis of the amounts involved shows that the owners are, on an average, effectively responsible for about $1,200 per unit of the total cost of the six suites together with their proportionate share of the carrying charges. The outstanding balance is payable on 21 days' notice leaving the corporation free to discharge the obligation or refinance the loan should it be thought prudent to do so. The additional costs attributable to this purchase and the resulting increase in the common expenses are made evident in the draft budget statement. One can reasonably expect that these costs would have been factored into the owners' decisions to purchase their units.

The corporation's obligation to pay taxes, insurance and other expenses relating to the suites cannot be considered unfair. In reality this obligation is no different than the obligation the corporation would have incurred had title been transferred and a mortgage given back to the vendor. The conveyance and purchase agreement is a type of instalment purchase agreement or long form agreement of purchase and sale. While title does not pass until full payment is made, the corporation is plainly a purchaser in possession and, as such, is the owner of the property in equity subject to the vendor's lien for the unpaid balance of the purchase price: see Lysaght v. Edwards (1876), 2 Ch. D. 499, 34 L.T. 787. Notwithstanding the stringent terms relating to default about which the respondent complains, given the substance of this transaction, the developer would not be permitted to terminate the agreement or otherwise interfere with the corporation's acknowledged right to quiet possession on any summary or peremptory basis. The corporation would be entitled, as indeed the declarant concedes, to all of the rights normally accorded an equitable owner under a purchase and sale transaction of this nature, including the right to relief against forfeiture.

In sum, none of the usual indicia of unconscionability are to be found on the facts of this case: see, generally, Waddams, Law of Contract, 3rd ed. (Aurora, Ont.: Canada Law Book, 1993), ch. 14; Chitty on Contracts, 27th ed., ed. A.G. Guest (Sweet & Maxwell, 1994), ch. 9, s. 4. Accordingly, there is no basis upon which to set aside the conveyance and purchase agreement on this ground.

(2) The zero allocation issue

The declaration registered by the declarant allocated a zero percentage interest to each of the six units with respect to their proportions of the common interests and their contributions to the common expenses. The motions judge was of the opinion that this allocation violated the Act in that "[an] owner of a unit has a common interest in the common elements and cannot escape the obligation as an owner of a unit to pay the appropriate percentage of the common expenses". To remedy the situation, he ordered that the declaration be amended so as "to allocate the proper percentages of contribution to common expenses for all units including the six units in dispute" pursuant to s. 3(5) and (8) of the Act. He also ordered the developer to pay the common expenses applicable to the units and to repay the payments it had received from the corporation with a set-off for the corporation's use of the units.

In deciding the matter as he did, the judge placed the parties in the position they would have been in had the six units been retained by the developer and not sold to the condominium corporation. This was not the result the condominium corporation intended to achieve in bringing this application. It sought an order declaring that the six units are common elements of the condominium and constitute property of the corporation to which it has good and marketable title, free and clear of any claim of the developer. The argument it advances in its cross-appeal in support of this contention, briefly stated, runs along the following lines.

The Act establishes a scheme of ownership of common interests whereby a common interest is appurtenant to an owner's unit. Under s. 7(5), the ownership of a unit is not to be "separated from the ownership of the common interest, and any instrument that purports to separate the ownership of a unit from common interest is void". The declaration, it is argued, is an "instrument" having this effect. Since no ownership of the common interests attaches to the suites in question, the declaration is in breach of s. 7(5). The suites, therefore, cannot be "units" within the meaning of the Act. Moreover, since "owner" is defined to mean "the owner of the freehold estate or estates in a unit and common interest", the developer cannot be the "owner" of the suites. Rights to the common elements can accrue only to "owners" who, under s. 7(1) and (4), are tenants in common of the common elements and entitled to make reasonable use of the common elements. Since the developer here has no interest in the common elements, it does not qualify as an "owner" and has no right to the use of the common elements. This "landlocked" space, the argument proceeds, fits within the definition of "common elements" and no other definition. "All of the property except the units" constitute the "common elements", as that term is defined. Not being "units", the argument concludes, the six suites must be part of the common elements of the condominium, and the motions judge should have so declared.

I am respectfully unable to accept this argument. While I do not question that the Act is framed so as to prevent the separation of ownership between a unit and its appurtenant common interest, its provisions must be applied in the light of the factual circumstances of a given case: see Carleton Condominium Corp. No. 106 v. Mastercraft Development Corp. (1985), 49 O.R. (2d) 638, 15 D.L.R. (4th) 733 (C.A.). In this case, it is important to appreciate the reasons underlying the zero allocation and the practical consequences of the allocation.

When the declaration was drawn it was understood that these suites would immediately form a part of the common elements of the condominium and that title would be transferred to the corporation after the purchase price had been paid. The zero allocation was made to accommodate that understanding and not for any devious purpose. It recognized that while the suites were registered in the name of the developer, in reality they were common elements owned, as I stated earlier, in equity by the corporation. In my opinion, the zero allocation cannot properly be treated in these circumstances as a defect in the declaration entitling the corporation to the suites free of charge. Such a result would confer an unwarranted windfall on the corporation and would be plainly inequitable.

So long as the corporation remains the equitable owner of the suites and they continue to be used as common elements, the zero allocation is not inconsistent with the spirit and intent of the Act. No purpose is to be served in not permitting this allocation to continue in effect. The motion judge's decision to divest the corporation of any interest in the suites and return their ownership to the developer was not sought in these proceedings. This form of relief is unsatisfactory to the corporation and the unit owners. They could not have anticipated that the six suites could conceivably be eliminated from this condominium as the application was framed. Given these circumstances, I think it preferable that the matter be disposed of on the basis that, should the suites revert to the developer in the future, the developer can at that time seek relief from the difficulties that may have been created by the manner in which the percentage allocations attributable to the suites were dealt with in the declaration. The issue can then be dealt with on proper notice to the unit owners and in the light of the circumstances then existing.

Disposition

For these reasons, I would allow the appeal, set aside the judgment of Wright J. and in place thereof dismiss the application brought by the respondent condominium corporation. I would also dismiss the cross-appeal. I would make no order as to costs either here or in the court below.

Order accordingly.

Kenny v. Schuster Real Estate Co.

Between Sharon Kenny and Acme Protective Systems Limited, Plaintiffs, and Schuster Real Estate Co. Ltd., Peter D. Schuster and 321024 B.C. Ltd., carrying on business as Cafe Zen and the said Cafe Zen, Defendants, and 321024 B.C. Ltd., carrying on business as Cafe Zen and the said Cafe Zen, Third Party

Vancouver Registry No. C874184 [1990] B.C.J. No. 1420 British Columbia Supreme Court Cohen J. Heard: April 9, 10, 25 - 27 and June 12, 1990 Judgment: June 19, 1990

Counsel for the Plaintiff, Sharon Kenny: R.V. Burns. Counsel for the Defendants, Schuster Real Estate Co. Ltd. and Peter D. Schuster: K.R. Nichols. Counsel for the Third Party, 321024 B.C. Ltd. (Cafe Zen): R.J. Wilinofsky.

COHEN J.:-

I. Background

In January 1983, the plaintiff, Sharon Kenny, purchased a condominium at 102-1633 Yew Street, in the City of Vancouver, Province of British Columbia. Ms. Kenny was attracted to this area of the city because of its close proximity to the beach, the fact that there was convenience shopping and restaurants nearby and mostly the unique and colourful character of this section of Yew Street.

The building which housed Ms. Kenny's condominium contained four residential and two commercial strata lots. Ms. Kenny's condominium was located directly above the commercial strata lots, owned by the defendant, Schuster Real Estate Co. Ltd. (Schuster). At the time Ms. Kenny purchased her condominium, the commercial strata lots contained two restaurant operations. Before purchasing, Ms. Kenny made inquiries about the restaurant operations and satisfied herself that no foods were deep fried or cooked on their premises and that they served only light meals.

In May 1987 Ms. Kenny's enjoyment of her condominium ended with the installation of an exhaust fan by the defendant Cafe Zen, the tenant in one of the commercial strata lots. Normally restaurant exhaust fans are placed on the roof of the building. Apparently this was not possible in the case of Cafe Zen and the fan was installed directly below Ms. Kenny's patio deck underneath her dining and living room windows. Ms. Kenny found the operation of the fan to be noisy as well as creating unpleasant odours inside her condominium in the building's stairways, hallways and underground parking.

Because she felt she could no longer enjoy her condominium, Ms. Kenny listed it for sale in September 1987. It sold in May 1988. She brought this action claiming reimbursement of the real estate commission she paid on the sale of her condominium, damages alleging that the value of her condominium decreased by $10,000 because of the fan, reimbursement of moving costs as well as her legal costs incurred in connection with an application for an interlocutory injunction made on her behalf in September 1987. Finally, Ms. Kenny claims general damages for the annoyance, inconvenience and discomfort which she says she suffered as a result of the fan.

Ms. Kenny took default judgment against the defendant, Schuster in September 1987. In April 1988 Ms. Kenny discontinued her action against the defendant, Cafe Zen.

In September 1988 an application to set aside the default judgment was dismissed and Schuster's statement of defence was struck out. An appeal against this finding was dismissed.

By third party notice dated December 13, 1988, Schuster and the defendant, Peter D. Schuster, the principal of Schuster, gave notice to Cafe Zen claiming a right of contribution and indemnity in respect of any damages for which they might be found liable to Ms. Kenny.

Essentially then this is a case of assessment of damages on a default judgment. However, in rendering my judgment I will deal with the facts and law relating to the liability of the defendant Schuster for damages. By agreement between counsel for Schuster and the third party, I will not deal with the third party issues.

II. Ms. Kenny's Claim

Ms. Kenny, aged 38, is a lawyer. She was called to the bar of this province in 1981 and since then has served as a prosecutor with the Department of the Attorney General, Crown Counsel Office until February of 1990 when she accepted a position as Crown Counsel in Bermuda.

Ms. Kenny purchased her condominium in January 1983 for $85,000, it was her first real estate purchase. Prior to this she had lived in various residential areas in the city and accordingly, when she went looking for real estate, she knew Vancouver and knew she wanted to live in Kitsilano.

Ms. Kenny testified that in the summer months there is a fair amount of activity on Yew Street and that during the evenings the level of noise is higher. Nonetheless, she insisted that she had no concerns about the level of noise or activity and that if she did she would never have purchased her condominium in the first place.

She said that one of the big features of her condominium was the size of its wrap-around patio deck, some 656 square feet. Her condominium had a wood burning fireplace, two bedrooms, two bathrooms, ensuite laundry and all in all she considered it a very pleasant place to live. In May 1987 she had no plans to move. Her long range plans were to resurface the patio deck and glass-in an area off her master bedroom.

When she purchased her condominium Ms. Kenny made inquiries about the restaurants that were operating in the commercial strata lots. She was informed that there was no cooking taking place in the restaurants and that they served only light meals. In her words, had the restaurants involved cooking, she would not have purchased her condominium.

On May 1st, 1987 when Ms. Kenny was leaving her building for work, as she was driving out of the underground parking lot, she discovered the driveway ramp blocked by a large truck with a crane. The truck was lowering into place what Ms. Kenny described as a piece of equipment looking like the back-end of a jet airplane. This piece of equipment was being installed underneath her patio deck. The installers told her that it was an exhaust fan for the Cafe Zen.

When she arrived at work, Ms. Kenny telephoned various people to find out about the installation of the fan. She was unable to reach Mr. Schuster by telephone and left a message for him to call her back. She found out from City Hall that a permit had been granted for the installation of the fan.

At the end of the day, when she arrived home, Ms. Kenny went to the Cafe Zen and spoke to the owner, Mr. Seto. An employee of the firm installing the fan was present as well. She was extremely upset. She was assured by the installer that the fan would not be a problem. Mr. Seto told her that the fan would be in operation during the hours that the Cafe Zen was open. She was so distraught at this news that she left the restaurant in tears.

Mr. Schuster returned Ms. Kenny's call. Before she had chance to say anything he said "is it about the fan" and she said "you're damn right it is". She was very angry at the time he called. They arranged to meet in Ms. Kenny's condominium to discuss the matter. They met on May 4, 1987. During their meeting, Ms. Kenny told Mr. Schuster that she wanted the fan removed because it was an eyesore and because of the noise and smell that it might cause. She was very annoyed with Mr. Schuster for permitting the fan to be installed without consulting her. Mr. Schuster told her that he could not take it down because Mr. Seto had a three year lease. He said he did not want to fight with Ms. Kenny about it and if necessary he would purchase her condominium.

Following their meeting, but before the Cafe Zen officially opened, arrangements were made for the fan to be started so that Mr. Schuster and Ms. Kenny could listen to it. During the demonstration run of the fan, Ms. Kenny said that when the fan started up there was a kick-in noise. She described the noise from the fan as a constant whirring or humming sound. She told Mr. Schuster that the fan was not acceptable, that there was no way she could live with it underneath her condominium and that she wanted it taken down or stopped.

The Cafe Zen opened about May 20, 1987. Ms. Kenny did not hear directly from Mr. Schuster again. As to noise from the fan, she said that she could hear it turn on "when it sort of kicked in. It did not seem to matter where she was in her condominium she could hear it. It seemed to her that the fan usually started up between 8 and 8:30 a.m. and she described it as a constant whirring or humming noise. She said that when the fan was switched off it was as if an air of peace cloaked her condominium. It was often not turned off until between 1:00 and 2:00 a.m.

Ms. Kenny said that when she went out on her patio deck, the noise was more noticeable. If she stood in the area just above the fan it was extremely loud. In fact, she said that if she was talking with someone she would have to elevate her voice to be heard. Even with the doors and windows of her condominium shut she could hear the fan. She said that the noise from the fan was most pronounced in the areas closest to the fan, the kitchen, dining room, living room and on the patio deck.

As to the smell from the fan, she described it as a general oppressive type of almost a heavy type of oily smell that permeated the hallways not only on her floor but on the floor above. "Like a greasy smell, the closest I could come would be a deep fat frying type of odour". She said that the odour increased as she headed out of her hallway down the stairs to go into the underground parking lot. It was in the stairwell leading from the outside of the building and it seemed to increase as she would head down to the parking lot. She said that the smell of the entire building changed after the fan was installed.

Inside her condominium, she said that if something was being cooked she could often tell what it was by the smell. For example, onions were noticeable. She said that other than the oily smell she could also smell food odours. The smells were strongest in the dining room and living room areas. If she was out on her patio deck she could smell it, particularly if she was standing in the area immediately adjacent to the fan. Even around the corner of the patio deck in front of her sliding glass doors she could sometimes catch a whiff of the smell of food. She said that prior to the installation of the fan she had never detected any of these oppressive smells or odours.

In terms of how the noise and smell affected her general living from day to day, she said that the whole experience was an extremely upsetting one. It was her first home purchase and the noise was a source of constant aggravation to her. The smell was particularly offensive and she found the musty, heavy odour that was in the hallways, the greasy smell, really offensive. She said that the whole character of the condominium changed and it was just not a place that she wanted to be. For example, she did not sit and read a book in her living room when the fan was on and it was upsetting for her to be in her condominium when the fan was on unless there was something to mask the noise such as the sound from the television or stereo.

After the fan was installed, Ms. Kenny spent less time on her patio deck in the summer months. When she was on her patio deck, if the fan went on, she found it a "jangling" kind of experience. The noise and smell were extremely disturbing to her.

Although Ms. Kenny's lawyer had negotiations with Mr. Schuster regarding Mr. Schuster's offer to purchase her condominium, Mr. Schuster could not raise the funds to buy her out and after her attempt to secure an injunction to restrain the continuing operation of the fan did not succeed, she listed her condominium for sale in September 1987 at a price of $119,000. There were open houses on weekends and prospective purchasers viewed her condominium by appointment. After three months the price was dropped, finally after eight months she received an offer of $105,000 and decided to accept it.

III. Issues

The issue for me to decide is whether the noise and smell from the fan constitute an actionable nuisance and if so, the amount of Ms. Kenny's damages.

IV. Decision

I am satisfied that the noise and smell from the fan constitute an actionable nuisance, that Ms. Kenny sold her condominium in direct response to the nuisance and that her sale of the condominium was a justifiable response in all of the circumstances. In addition, I am satisfied that the defendant Schuster is responsible to Ms. Kenny for damages.

V. Reasons

The leading authority in this province on the test of what constitutes a nuisance is Royal Anne Hotel Co. Ltd. v. Ashcroft et al (1979), 8 C.C.L.T. 179 (B.C.C.A.). In that case the Royal Anne and one Saito were landowners and occupiers in the Village of Ashcroft. On December 14, 1974 their premises were damaged as a result of a backing-up of a municipal sewer constructed and maintained by Ashcroft. As a result of the blockage raw sewage escaped from the sewer and entered the two premises from plumbing outlets. Both parties sued Ashcroft alleging negligence and claiming also in nuisance.

The trial judge found that the back-up in the sewer was caused by a "random blockage" in the main sewer not far from the respondents' premises. He held that this blockage did not result from negligence on the part of Ashcroft, its agents or servants, in the design, installation or maintenance of the sewer or in any of the steps taken by Ashcroft and its servants to deal with the blockage when it was discovered. He dismissed any claim based upon negligence, but found Ashcroft responsible on the nuisance claim.

Ashcroft appealed against the attribution of liability for nuisance. The Court of Appeal held that the trial judge made no error, finding that the trial judge was correct and that an actionable nuisance had been shown. At pp. 184-186, McIntyre J.A., (as he then was), had the following to say about the test of nuisance:

The cases on this subject are many and often difficult to reconcile. Text writers have striven to bring some order into this field, and I have found assistance in Street on Torts (5th ed., 1972); Fleming on Torts (4th ed., 1971); and in a helpful article by J.P.S. McLaren, Nuisance in Canada, Linden's Studies in Canadian Tort Law (1968), p. 320. From a study of the cases referred to by counsel and cited in the above sources, the following principles emerge:

As has been said in Street on Torts, at p. 212: 'The essence of the tort of nuisance is interference with the enjoyment of land.' That interference need not be accompanied by negligence. In nuisance one is concerned with the invasion of the interest in the land; in negligence one must consider the nature of the conduct complained of. Nuisances result frequently from intentional acts undertaken for lawful purposes. The most carefully designed industrial plant operated with the greatest care may well be or cause a nuisance, if, for example, effluent, smoke, fumes or noise invade the right of enjoyment of neighbouring land owners to an unreasonable degree; see Manchester v. Farnworth, supra, and Walker v. McKinnon Indust. Ltd., supra, as examples.

When then can it be said that the tort of nuisance has been committed? A helpful proposition is advanced by the learned author of Street on Torts, at p. 215, in these terms:

A person then may be said to have committed the tort of private nuisance when he is held to be responsible for an act indirectly causing physical injury to land or substantially interfering with the use or enjoyment of land or an interest in land, where in the light of all the surrounding circumstances, this injury or interference is held to be unreasonable.

This proposition, stated in a variety of ways, has been accepted generally in the authorities.

The test then is, has the defendant's use of this land interfered with the use and enjoyment of the plaintiffs' land and is that interference unreasonable? Where, as in the case at Bar, actual physical damage occurs it is not difficult to decide that the interference is in fact unreasonable. Greater difficulty will be found where the interference results in lesser or no physical injury but may give offence by reason of smells', noise, vibration or other intangible causes. No finding is required regarding the exercise of care by the defendant and, while its conduct may frequently be such that a finding of negligence could be made, it is not necessary and the existence of due care will afford no defence if the other ingredients are present. Again this is well rooted in authority: for example, see the words of Lord Simonds in Read v. J. Lyons & Co., [1947] A.C. 156, [1946] 2 All E.R. 471 at 482 (H.L.), where the principles laid down in Rylands v. Fletcher (1868), L.R. 3 H.L. 330 (H.L.), were under discussion:

It was urged by counsel for the appellant that a decision against her when the plaintiff in the Rainham case [Rainham Chemical Works Ltd. v. Belvedere Fish Guano Co. Ltd.], [1921] 2 A.C. 465 (H.L.), succeeded would show a strange lack of symmetry in the law. There is some force in the observation, but your Lordships will not fail to observe that such a decision is in harmony with the development of a strictly analogous branch of the law, the law of nuisance, in which also negligence is not a necessary ingredient in the case. For, if a man commits a legal nuisance, it is no answer to his injured neighbour that he took the utmost care not to commit it. There the liability is strict, and there only he has a lawful claim who has suffered an invasion of some proprietary or other interest in land.

In my opinion, the rationale for the law of nuisance in modern times, whatever its historical origins may have been, is the provision of a means of reconciling certain conflicting interests in connection with the use of land, even where the conflict does not result from negligent conduct. It protects against the unreasonable invasion of interests in land.

What is an unreasonable invasion of an interest in land? All circumstances must, of course, be considered in answering this question. What may be reasonable at one time or place may be completely unreasonable at another. It is certainly not every smell, whiff of smoke, sound of machinery or music which will entitle the indignant plaintiff to recover. It is impossible to lay down precise and detailed standards but the invasion must be substantial and serious and of such a nature that it is clear according to the accepted concepts of the day that it should be an actionable wrong. It has been said (see McLaren, Nuisance in Canada) that Canadian Judges have adopted the words of Knight Bruce V.C. in Walter v. Selfe (1851), 4 De G. & Sm. 315, 64 E.R. 849 at 852, affirmed on other grounds 19 L.T.O.S. 308, to the effect that actionability will result from an interference with:

... the ordinary comfort physically of human existence, not merely according to elegant or dainty modes and habits of living, but according to plain and sober ... notions.

These words were approved by Middleton J.A. in the Ontario High Court in Appleby v. Erie Tobacco Co. (1910), 22 O.L.R. 533 at 535-36.

In reaching a conclusion, the Court must consider the nature of the act complained of and the nature of the injury suffered. Consideration must also be given to the character of the neighbourhood where the nuisance is alleged, the frequency of the occurrence of the nuisance, its duration and many other factors which could be of significance in special circumstances. While an owner of land in a quiet residential district may well expect to be protected from the operation of a boiler factory on his neighbour's land, he may not be entitled to expect to prevent the boilermaker from pursuing his lawful calling when he seeks to put his residence in an industrial area next to the factory. The conflicting interests must be circumstances. The social utility of the conduct complained of must be weighed against the significance of the injury caused and the value of the interest sought to be protected. But where the conduct of the defendant has caused actual physical injury to the plaintiffs' land, the mere fact that such conduct may be of great social utility, for example, construction and maintenance of a sewer, will not attract greater licence or immunity. There is no reason why a disproportionate share of the cost of such a beneficial service should be visited upon one member of the community by leaving him uncompensated for damage caused by the existence of that which benefits the community at large. The weighing of conflicting interests in the case at Bar, therefore, causes little difficulty. The interference with the plaintiffs' right of enjoyment of their land and the damage caused to their land is clearly such that the action for nuisance lies in the absence of any defence of statutory authorization.

In Appleby v. Erie Tobacco Co. (1910), 22 O.L.R. 533 (Divisional Court), the nuisance complained of was odour arising from the manufacture of tobacco on the defendant's premises. The plaintiff complained of noxious odours coming from the defendant's tobacco factory and interfering with the plaintiff's enjoyment of his premises in the vicinity of the factory. The plaintiff sought an injunction in respect of the odours. The trial judge dismissed the action in respect of the claim for an injunction and the plaintiff appealed. In holding for the plaintiff, Middleton J. said at pp. 536-538:

In Fleming v. Hislop, 11 App. Cas. at p. 691, the Earl of Selborne states his view of the law thus: 'What causes material discomfort and annoyance for the ordinary purposes of life to a man's house or to his property, is to be restrained ... although the evidence does not go to the length of proving that health is in danger.' Lord Halsbury, at p. 697, states what is substantially the same thing. 'What makes life less comfortable and causes sensible discomfort and annoyance is a proper subject of injunction.'

Now, it is to be borne in mind that an arbitrary standard cannot be set up which is applicable to all localities. There is a local standard applicable in each particular district, but, though the local standard may be higher in some districts than in others, yet the question in each case ultimately reduces itself to the fact of nuisance or no nuisance, having regard to all the surrounding circumstances. This is shewn by the oftenquoted passage in Lord Halsbury's judgment in Colls v. Home and Colonial Stores Limited, [1904] A.C. 179, at p. 185: 'A dweller in towns cannot expect to have as pure air, as free from smoke, smell, and noise as if he lived in the country, and distant from other dwellings, and yet an excess of smoke, smell and noise may give a cause of action, but in each of such cases it becomes a question of degree, and the question is in each case whether it is a nuisance which will give a right of action.'

In Rushmer v. Polsue and Alfieri Limited, [1906] 1 Ch. 234, (1907) A.C. 121, this principle is applied to the case of a printing office established in a neighbourhood devoted to printing, next door to the plaintiff's residence, and which rendered sleep impossible. Cozens Hardy, L.J., [1906] 1 Ch. at p. 250, sums up the situation in a way that commended itself to the Lords. It was, he says, contended 'that a person living in a district specially devoted to a particular trade cannot complain of any nuisance by noise caused by the carrying on of any branch of that trade without carelessness and in a reasonable manner. I cannot assent to this argument. A resident in such a neighbourhood must put up with a certain amount of noise. The standard of comfort differs according to the situation of the property and the class of people who inhabit it ... But whatever the standard of comfort in a particular district may be, I think the addition of a fresh noise caused by the defendant's works may be so substantial as to cause a legal nuisance. It does not follow that because I live, say, in the manufacturing part of Sheffield, I cannot complain if a steam-hammer is introduced next door, and so worked as to render sleep at night almost impossible, although previous to its introduction my house was a reasonably comfortable abode, having regard to the local standard; and it would be no answer to say that the steam-hammer is of the most modern approved pattern and is reasonably worked. In short ... it is no answer to say that the neighbourhood is noisy, and that the defendant's machinery is of first-class character.'

This case, as is shewn by this extract, puts an end to the controversy upon the question whether the reasonableness of the defendants' user of their own premises affects the plaintiff's rights. Kekewich, J., in Remhardt v. Mentasti (1889), 42 Ch. D. 685, carefully reviews the cases and concludes that it does not. Buckley, J., in Sanders-Clark v. Grosvenor Mansions Co., [1900] 2 Ch. 373, declined to accept this view, apparently confusing the question of nuisance having regard to the local standard with reasonable use of the defendant's premises.

In Attorney-General v. Cole & Son, [1901] 1 Ch. 205, Kekewich, J., discusses the apparent conflict and seeks to reconcile the two views.

In Drysdale v. Dugas, 26 S.C.R. 20, the majority of the Supreme Court review the earlier cases, and come to the same conclusion as that now accepted in England.

It is plain, in this case, that the defendants' manufactory does constitute a nuisance. The odours do cause material discomfort and annoyance and render the plaintiff's premises less fit for the ordinary purposes of life, even making all possible allowances for the local standard of the neighbourhood.

In Maker v. Davanne Holdings Limited et al, [1954] O.R. 935, the plaintiff sought an injunction restraining the defendant from using or causing to be used lands and premises for warehouse or storage purposes and for the purpose of a parking lot. In granting the injunction, Spence J. at p. 939-940 said:

The plaintiff, however, is not complaining of the ordinary noise consistent with the alteration of the character of the neighbourhood from a strictly residential character to a mixed residential and commercial character, but rather of the special noise resulting from the shifting about of goods in what was a semi-detached residence separated from his own only by a party wall.

Appleby v. Erie Tobacco Co. (1920), 22 O.L.R. 533, is a decision in reference to an alleged nuisance arising from noxious odours. Middleton J., as he then was, at pp. 536-7 quoted from English cases where the alleged nuisance was noise, particularly at p. 537, where he cited Rushmer v. Polsue & Alfieri, Limited, [1906] 1 Ch. 234, affirmed [1907] A.C. 121. He quoted as follows from Cozens Hardy L.J. (whose words were approved by the law lords) in that case at p. 250:

So it is no answer here for the defendants to say that the neighbourhood is noisy, containing stores, furniture-shops, etc. What the plaintiff complains of is this incessant racket right through the party wall from his bedroom. I am of the opinion that he has established a case for an injunction until trial upon the ordinary law of nuisance.

In general, a landlord is not liable for a nuisance on the premises; but the landlord is liable if he has authorized nuisance or if he knew, or ought to have known, of nuisance before letting (see Winfield on Tort, 9th Ed, (1971) p. 347). The discussed in Banfal et al. v. Formula Fun Centre Inc. et al. (1984), 34 C.C.L.T. 171 (Ont. H.C.). In that case, the defendant, took a lease from Ontario Hydro of vacant urban land, bounded upon three sides by motel properties. Their aim, which was made clear to Hydro, was to operate an automobile racing amusement ride; a proposal vigorously opposed by neighbouring property owners who feared noise pollution. A conditional certificate was eventually granted by the Provincial Environment Ministry and the City of Niagara Falls passed a bylaw, approved by the Municipal Board, allowing the track to operate.

The miniature racing cars produced a very high noise level from whining engines and screeching tires, a noise which was more or less persistent for 12 hours a day during the summer operating season and which was irritating and obtrusive. The plaintiff, the owner of one of the adjacent motels, brought the action in nuisance seeking damages and an injunction. The court found that the conduct of the racetrack was such as to create a material interference with the ordinary comfort and convenience which the plaintiffs were entitled to expect while enjoying their property. It was in law a nuisance. It found the noise was intrusive and abrasive, out of keeping with other noises in the vicinity and that it was unreasonable in all of the circumstances of the case. It also found that Ontario Hydro, as landlord of the property, had been fully aware of its tenant's intention and of the inevitable noise which the proposed use would have upon nearby properties. At p. 188 of the case, O'Leary J. discusses the liability of an owner for the nuisance created by its tenant as follows:

Is Hydro, the owner, liable for the nuisance by the tenant, Formula? In general, an owner is not liable for the nuisance committed by his tenant. To this rule there is one exception. Where the nuisance arises 'from the natural and necessary result of what the landlord authorized' the tenant to do, then the owner-landlord is liable: Harris v. James, [1874-80] All E.R. Rep. 1142. This exception to the general rule has been expressed in different terms. In Earl v. Reid (1911), 23 O.L.R. 453 at 466, 2 O.W.N. 873, 18 O.W.R. 562, Riddell J. said the landlord was not liable unless 'the use from which the damage or nuisance necessarily arises was plainly contemplated by the lease'. In Aldridge v. Van Patter, [1952] O.R. 595, [1952] 4 D.L.R. 93, Spence J. held the owner liable because the possibility of an automobile, during the course of a race, plunging through the fence around the track and injuring someone in the park (the nuisance that actually occurred) was in the immediate contemplation of the owner when the lease was executed. In Smith v. Scott, [1973] Ch. 314, [1972 3 All E.R. 645, [1972] 3 W.L.R. 783, it was suggested that the owner will be held liable if there is 'a very high degree of probability' that a nuisance will result from the purposes for which the property is let.

In my view, no matter what the correct wording of the exception, Hydro is liable for the nuisance on the evidence in this case. As already indicated, Hydro knew exactly the use Formula intended for the property before it entered into the lease. Hydro not only knew that Formula intended to use the land for an amusement ride, it knew and approved of the layout of the track. It knew the size, power and make of the cars to be raced thereon and the hours of the day the track would be in operation.

Hydro understood two cars might be racing on the track at any one time, and as I indicated earlier, Formula had frequently three and four cars on the track at once. Nevertheless, I am satisfied on the evidence that one or two cars racing on the track at one time are a nuisance. Therefore, the nuisance resulted from Formula operating the track, that is to say, using the land exactly as Hydro knew it intended to use it. By entering into the lease, Hydro authorized Formula to use the land in the manner that caused a nuisance. It follows that the nuisance was 'the natural and necessary result of what the landlord authorized the tenant to do'. Hydro was aware and concerned long before the lease was entered into that the track might cause noise unacceptable to its neighbours and several clauses in the lease purported to deal with how excessive noise was to be dealt with. Therefore, 'the nuisance was plainly contemplated by the lease' and the possibility of the track causing a noise nuisance 'was in the immediate contemplation of the owner'. Subsequent events have shown that there was not only 'a very high degree of probability that a nuisance would result from the purpose for which the property was let' but there was "a certainty" that such would occur.

Perhaps it is trite to say that a person who purchases a residence in a mixed residential/commercial neighbourhood must therefore accept the noise and smells that come with the neighbourhood. A succinct statement of the general principle is found in Halsey v. Esso Petroleum Co. Ltd., [1961] 2 All E.R. 145 (Q.B.D.) where Veale, J. at pp. 151-152 said:

So far as the present case is concerned, liability for nuisance by harmful deposits could be established by proving damage by the deposits to the property in question, provided, of course, that the injury was not merely trivial. Negligence is not an ingredient of the cause of action, and the character of the neighbourhood is not a matter to be taken into consideration. On the other hand nuisance by smell or noise is something to which no absolute standard can be applied.

It is always a question of degree whether the interference with comfort or convenience is sufficiently serious to constitute a nuisance. The character of the neighbourhood is very relevant and all the relevant circumstances have to be taken into account. What might be a nuisance in one area is by no means necessarily so in another. In an urban area, everyone must put up with a certain amount of discomfort and annoyance from the activities of neighbours, and the law must strike a fair and reasonable balance between the right of the plaintiff on the one hand to the undisturbed enjoyment of his property, and the right of the defendant on the other hand to use his property for his own lawful enjoyment. That is how I approach this case.

It may be possible in some cases to prove that noise or smell have in fact diminished the value of the plaintiff's property in the market. That consideration does not arise in this case, and no evidence has been called in regard to it. The standard in respect of discomfort and inconvenience from noise and smell that I have to apply is that of the ordinary reasonable and responsible person who lives in this particular area of Fulham. This is not necessarily the same as the standard which the plaintiff chooses to set up for himself. It is the standard of the ordinary man, and the ordinary man, who may well like peace and quiet, will not complain for instance of the noise of traffic if he chooses to live on a main street in an urban centre, nor of the reasonable noises of industry, if he chooses to live alongside a factory.

Sharon Kenny did accept the noise and smells that came with her part of Yew Street, but, on the evidence, the installation of the fan directly below her condominium, effected her lifestyle and caused Ms. Kenny substantial discomfort. I am satisfied that the installation of the fan interfered with her enjoyment of her condominium to such a degree that it was an unreasonable invasion of her interest in land and that, on the principles set out in the cases, constitutes an actionable nuisance.

Before purchasing her condominium Ms. Kenny made reasonable inquiries about the restaurant operations carried on in the commercial strata lots. She was satisfied that the restaurants would not be cooking foods that would create offensive odours. Her inquiries were borne out because for four years she lived in her condominium without interference in the enjoyment of her condominium from the restaurant operations. However, after the fan was installed by the Cafe Zen, Ms. Kenny's enjoyment of her condominium was substantially and unreasonably interfered with by the constant noise, disturbance and unpleasant odours created by the fan. I accept Ms. Kenny's evidence that the noise and smell was a substantial interference. She did not strike me as being an overly sensitive person or someone who would be unreasonable in assessing the degree of interference caused by the fan. She impressed me as a normal person of ordinary habits and sensibilities who suffered substantial personal discomfort from the noise and smell created by the fan. Mr. Schuster testified that until the fan was installed he got along very well with Ms. Schuster, liked her and that she made no complaints to him.

There is other evidence of the degree of interference caused by the fan. Mrs. Irene Hollo, a tenant in the condominium above Ms. Kenny, moved into her condominium in February 1987. She testified that when she entered her condominium on May 20, 1987 she heard a noise and thought that she had left an appliance running. After searching her condominium, she realized that the sound was coming from the dining room area. She looked out her dining room window and discovered that the noise she heard was coming from the fan. She described the noise like a car constantly idling. As to odours, she described the smell as greasy, a cooking odour. She said it had a smell like old grease that had been used over and over again. Like Ms. Kenny, Mrs. Hollo could smell the odours in the common areas and throughout her condominium. Mrs. Hollo said that she moved out of the rented condominium in May 1988 because of the horrible smells.

John Boyer, who purchased Ms. Kenny's condominium in May 1988, moved into the condominium in June 1988. He testified that with his condominium windows closed, he could not tell if the fan was in operation. However, when he opens his dining room window he can smell kitchen odours without any problem and he can hear the fan. In cross-examination he testified that he kept his dining room window closed because of the noise from the fan which he described as a bother. When the dining room window is left open, he can detect odours, particularly the smell of bacon cooking. He described the odours from the fan as being associated with the frying or deep frying of food. As to Schuster's responsibility to Ms. Kenny for the nuisance caused by the fan, there is no doubt that Mr. Schuster realized when he assigned the lease to Cafe Zen and approved the installation of the fan that it would change the character of the building. First, in the lease that was assigned to Cafe Zen, he had inserted a provision that there would be no baking of pizza or food preparation with a penetrating smell. He testified that this provision was inserted because he wanted to make sure that the building was as pleasant as possible for all the occupants. He explained that he had had an experience with a pizza parlour in another building owned by him where the smell from the baking of pizza had permeated the entire building.

Second, Mr. Schuster's decision to assign the lease and approve the installation of the fan was a purely economic one without regard to the impact of the fan on Ms. Kenny's condominium. The prior owner to the Cafe Zen was in financial difficulty. A restaurant in that neighbourhood was not economic without the ability to serve cooked foods. Mr. Seto testified that he had no intention of purchasing the restaurant unless he could have a menu serving cooked foods which meant the installation of a restaurant exhaust fan. Mr. Schuster's position was that he would approve the installation of the fan as long as it was permitted by City Hall. So, at the time of the assignment of the lease to Mr. Seto, Mr. Schuster knew full well that Mr. Seto intended to serve a menu with cooked foods. I am also satisfied that Mr. Schuster knew the details regarding installation of the fan and that it would exhaust fumes from cooked foods directly below Ms. Kenny's condominium.

Third, Mr. Schuster immediately acknowledged his responsibility when Ms. Kenny first complained about the installation of the fan. His initial response was to buy her out if he could not find an amicable solution to her complaint. The only reason he did not purchase her condominium was because he could not raise the cash.

In my opinion, it is conclusive in this case, that the noise and smell from the fan constitute a nuisance and that the nuisance arose as the natural and necessary result of what the defendant Schuster is liable for damages. (see Banfai v. Formula Fun Centre, supra.) It is no answer for the defendant Schuster to say that Ms. Kenny chose to live in a mixed commercial/residential neighbourhood and therefore she cannot complain of the noise and smell from the fan. Ms. Kenny did not choose to live in a building where there would be a restaurant creating offensive odours. When Mr. Schuster allowed the installation of the fan he knew the potential problems that the fan would create. What Ms. Kenny complained to Mr. Schuster about was not the noise and smells ordinarily consistent with the character of the neighbourhood but rather the extremely disturbing noise and smell coming from an exhaust fan installed, with Mr. Schuster's permission, in a location which created a substantial interference with the enjoyment of her condominium.

Mr. Schuster relied heavily on the fact that the city permitted the installation of the fan and that city inspectors approved it before and after its installation. A noise control supervisor from the City of Vancouver Department of Health was called to testify. While his file contained complaints regarding noise from the fan, at no time did anyone from his department take a reliable noise level reading from the street level or any reading from Ms. Kenny's condominium. Further, by letter dated September 8, 1987, the city wrote to the Cafe Zen confirming their inspection of the restaurant in regard to noise from the fan and stating "however, given that your system is operating at 65 dba, and the exhaust fan is located near residential accommodations, we would encourage your cooperation with your residential neighbours towards finding a compromise for their problems". Mr. Joe Rittberg, the owner of the firm that installed the fan, after looking at the letter, said that he would not have liked the fan operating at 65 dba which was at the top end of the permitted reading levels in the noise bylaw.

VI. Damages

On the subject of damages for nuisance, G.H.L. Fridman, Q.C., The Law of Torts in Canada, Vol. 1 (Toronto: Carswell, 1989) at pp. 161-162 states:

If the the nuisance has caused physical damage to the plaintiff's property, damages will be recoverable. Damages may also be an appropriate remedy where the plaintiff has suffered personal physical injury in consequence of the defendant's conduct. In this respect, it must be shown that the damage in question was not the result of any idiosyncratic condition of the plaintiff, recovery of such extra loss. that rendered him susceptible when the average person would not have been harmed. 237 However, whether personal or proprietary damages involved, it would seem that once the defendant's conduct amounts to an actionable nuisance vis-a-vis the ordinary reasonable man, the fact that the plaintiff suffers extra damage because of his sensitive nature (or the special use he is making of his property, such as the cultivation of orchids, a delicate plant) will not preclude the

Once damage to the plaintiff's property is established, the defendant can be held liable for consequential loss, such as loss of business, and the expenses incurred in repairing and protecting property. 239 one such consequential loss that has caused problems is the diminution in value of the plaintiff's property by reason of the interference resulting from the defendant's conduct. It has been said that no proof of damage is required where the nuisance consists of the personal inconvenience and interference with one's enjoyment, one's quiet, one's personal freedom, or anything that discomposes or injuriously affects the senses or the nerves.

No actual financial or physical damage need be proved as the damage in such cases consists in the annoyance and discomfort caused to the occupier of the premises. However, a number of decisions have concerned the possibility of a claim for financial loss resulting from such interference. Plaintiffs have argued that their property has lessened in value, in terms of saleability on the market, because the smoke, noise, dust, fumes, etc., made the plaintiff's property not as desirable as it might have been without such interference.

If the plaintiff is to seek a remedy, it must be shown, in the first instance, that the plaintiff believed that what the defendant was doing would result in such diminution of the value of the plaintiff's property. In other words, there must be a causal connection between the defendant's conduct and the alleged drop in value. Second, it must be proved that there was some diminution in value. One way to establish this, perhaps the best or truest way, is to show that attempts were made to sell the property and failed, or could only succeed if the price were significantly reduced from what would otherwise be a reasonable market price.

I am satisfied that the value of Ms. Kenny's condominium decreased due to the installation of the fan. Mr. Peter Mason, the real estate agent who listed Ms. Kenny's condominium, testified that it took seven months to sell it. He pointed out the fan to prospective purchasers because he was concerned to ensure that they knew about its existence. However, he kept the dining room window shut when he was showing the condominium because he did not want to emphasize the negative aspect of the fan. When he received Mr. Boyer's offer of $105,000 he encouraged Ms. Kenny to accept the offer because it was the only one received.

In my view, the extent of the diminished value of Ms. Kenny's condominium is settled by the evidence of Mr. Leslie Parton, a certified appraiser. Mr. Parton completed an appraisal of Ms. Kenny's condominium dated June 9, 1987. He concluded that "marketability may be impaired due to the nuisance of the restaurant's exhaust fan" and he estimated the value of her condominium at $105,000. In a letter dated July 21, 1988 Mr. Parton stated "the estimated loss due to noise and odours from the restaurant's exhaust fan located on and/or adjacent to the subject is $10,000. Therefore the net current market value is $105,000".

Mr. Parton based his conclusion of the loss of value of Ms. Kenny's condominium based upon his experience, expertise and common sense. I am satisfied, on the whole of the evidence, that his conclusion is a reasonable one and I therefore award Ms. Kenny damages under this head of $10,000.

With respect to Ms. Kenny's claim for non-pecuniary damages, see 15th ed. (London: Sweet & Maxwell Limited, 1988) at p. 869, paragraph 1401 states:

Beyond physical damage to the land however, a nuisance may cause annoyance, inconvenience, discomfort, or even illness to the plaintiff occupier. Recovery in respect of these principally non-pecuniary losses is allowable and may be regarded as part of the normal measure of damages.

Stephenson L.J. in Bone & Another v. Seale [1975] 1 All E.R. 787 (C.A.C.D.) considered the measure 'of damages for interference with the enjoyment of property and at pp. 792-794 said:

On the third ground, that the damages awarded by the judge were far too high, it seems to me that this court has a very difficult task to perform. It has to ask itself: what is the measure of damages for a nuisance of this kind? I start by considering whether there is really any authority which gives us, or which would have given the learned judge, any guidance. The only authority which has been cited in this court is the decision of Veale J. in Halsey v. Esso Petroleum Co. Ltd. That was a very different case of an unfortunate plaintiff living in Fulham who had to put up with smells, vibration and noise, by day and night, to an extent which very seriously interfered with his comfort and convenience over a period of something like five years. In 1961 the learned judge gave him, for all that, damages of 200. I do not think it could be suggested that that was a high figure, even in those days; if it had not been coupled with an injunction, it might well have been higher.

Is there any other guide to which we can turn in considering whether the judge's figure of over 6,000 for each of these plaintiffs is the right sort of figure? It is a figure which I think struck each member of this court rather as the figure in McCarthy v. Coldair Ltd struck Denning L.J., and led us to say to ourselves something like 'Good gracious me - as high as that!'

That figure of over 6,000 for what is a nuisance and is offensive but no more something which is rightly described as a nuisance - does seem at first blush to be a very high figure, and counsel for the defendant has asked us to say that it is a figure which is so high that this court cannot uphold it. We accept the test long ago laid down by Greer

L.J. in Flint v. Lovell. In that case Greer L.J. said:

I think it right to say that this court would be disinclined to reverse the finding of a trial judge as to the amount of damages merely because they think that if they had tried the case in the first instance they would have given a lesser sum. In order to justify reversing the trial judge on the question of the amount of damages it will generally be necessary that this Court should be convinced either that the judge acted upon some wrong principle of law, or that the amount awarded was so extremely high or so very small as to make it, in the judgment of this court, an entirely erroneous estimate of the damage [sic] to which the plaintiff is entitled.

That test was repeated by Lord Pearson, with the agreement of Lord Denning MR and Sir Gordon Willmer, in Hinz v. Berry, to which counsel for the plaintiffs also referred.

It is difficult to find an analogy to damages for interference with the enjoyment of property. In this case, efforts to prove diminution in the value of the property as a result of this persistent smell over the years failed. The damages awarded by the learned judge were damages simply for loss of amenity living on their property; and of course their enjoyment of their own property was indirectly affected by these smells inasmuch, as it affected their visitors and members of their families. The nearest analogy would seem to be the damages which are awarded almost daily for loss of amenity in personal injury cases; it does seem to me that there is perhaps a closer analogy than at first sight appears between losing the enjoyment of your property as a result of some interference by smell or by noise caused by a next door neighbour, and losing an amenity as a result of a personal injury. Is it possible to equate loss of sense of smell as a result of the negligence of a defendant motor driver with having to put up with positive smells as a result of a nuisance created by a negligent neighbour? There is, as it seems to me, some parallel between the loss of amenity which is caused by personal injury and the loss of amenity which is caused by a nuisance of this kind. If a parallel is drawn between those two losses, it is at once confirmed that this figure is much too high. It is the kind of figure that would only be given for a serious and permanent loss of amenity as the result of a very serious injury, perhaps in the case of a young person. Here we have to remember that the loss of amenity which has to be quantified in pounds and pence extends over a long period - a period of 12 1/2 years - but it must not take account of any future loss.

Scarman L.J. in the same case, at pp. 794-795 stated:

Nuisance is a wrong to property, but it is well recognised that even when there is no physical damage to property it may cause annoyance, inconvenience and discomfort to the occupier of the property in his enjoyment of it. As Mr. McGregor says in his work on Damages:

When there is a claim for damages in respect of non-pecuniary loss caused by nuisance, recovery of damages is allowable and may be regarded as part of the normal measure of damages.

In such a case as this, therefore, we are thrown back to general principles.

What is the relevant general principle? I think it is that to which Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest referred in the course of his speech in H. West & Son Ltd. v. Shephard. That was a case of very severe personal injury, but, speaking of the difficulty of awarding damages where there is no financial yardstick, he said simply: 'All that judges and courts can do is to award sums which must be regarded as giving reasonable compensation'.

Such is the principle, but the difficulty remains: what is reasonable? As Stephenson L.J. has mentioned there is very little guidance in the case law. In Halsey v. Esso Petroleum Co. Ltd., to which Stephenson L.J. has referred, Veale J. considered 200 appropriate damages for what, on reading the case, one would think was a gross interference with comfort and enjoyment of property over a period of five years or thereabouts. Nevertheless, there is in that case an indication of what one learned judge thought appropriate in a case of nuisance by noise and smell in 1961, and, unless it can be said that his estimate was itself wholly erroneous, it is something we must bear in mind when attempting to adopt a consistent legal pattern in the assessment of damages at large.

Where else can one go to for assistance as to what is reasonable? As Stephenson L.J. has indicated, it is appropriate to go to personal injury litigation and to note the sort of figure that judges award for the element of loss of amenity. It is difficult to be precise in such matters, and I think not helpful to refer to specific cases. But the indications, both from one's own experience and from such works as have collated damages in these cases, are that 6,000 for 12 years' discomfort in a matter of smell is out of all proportion to awards for comparable loss of amenity in that class of case.

It is not, I think, possible to say that we must adopt, or seek to adopt, any rigid standard of comparison between a nuisance case and personal injury litigation. Nevertheless, overall the law ought to remain consistent when it is dealing with analogous situations.

I find, therefore, both in Veale J.'s decision and in the general approach of judges to the loss of amenity element in damages in personal injury litigation, some indication that the damages awarded in this case were unreasonable.

But that in itself cannot be enough to entitle this court to disturb the award of the trial judge. We have to go as far as Stephenson L.J. has mentioned when he quoted the well-known passage from the judgment of Greer L.J. in Flint v. Lovell. Was there here an entirely erroneous estimate of the damage sustained by the two plaintiffs? This must be a matter of impression - impression derived from experience and a general knowledge of the way in which the law handles analogous claims.

One must bear in mind also a further general principle, that, when one is removed from the world of pecuniary loss and is attempting to measure damages for non-pecuniary loss, an element in reasonableness is the fairness of the compensation to be awarded. There must be moderation; some attention must be paid to the rights of the offending defendant as well as to the rights of the injured plaintiff.

Ms. Kenny says, and I believe, that she did not bring this action out of spite for Mr. Schuster or based on principle but because she lost the enjoyment of her condominium. Until the installation of the fan, she enjoyed living in her condominium. Ms. Kenny's condominium was unique because of its very large patio deck. Mr. Boyer testified that the patio deck is one of the big features of the condominium which adds value to it. But for the installation of the fan, Ms. Kenny planned to stay in her condominium and make improvements to it.

Ms. Kenny concluded, and I find reasonably so, that she had no alternative but to sell her condominium. There is no evidence of anything more she could reasonably have done to minimize the negative impact of the noise and smell from the fan. She asked for the fan to be taken down. She was prepared to sell to Mr. Schuster. She sought an injunction. She listed her condominium for sale. The installation of the fan was a gross interference with the comfort and enjoyment of her condominium over a period of approximately one year and I consider a fair and reasonable award to her for non-pecuniary damages to be $7,500.

In addition, Ms. Kenny is entitled to repayment of the commission which she was forced to pay by reason of her having to sell her condominium (see Horton and Horton v. Zirul (1982), 34 B.C.L.R. 234, Danish v. Danish (1981), 33 B.C.L.R. 176 and Murchie v. Murchie (1984), 39 R.F.L. (2d) 385). As well, she is entitled to reimbursement for her moving costs as well as her legal costs incurred in connection with the injunction application.

VII. Conclusion

In the result, Ms. Kenny will have judgment against the defendant Schuster in the amount of $25,557.45 plus her costs of this trial including her costs of the application before Paris J. on Monday, November 28, 1988. She is entitled to interest pursuant to the Court Order Interest Act.

L. Chung Development Co. v. Scarborough (City) (Ont. Div. Ct.)

IN THE MATTER OF Section 50(17) of the Planning Act, 1983 AND IN THE MATTER OF an application by L. Chung Development Company Ltd. for determination by this Board of Condition No. 5 as set out in Metro Toronto file No. 55CDM-87-041 on a plan of condominium located at 4002 Sheppard Avenue East and 2347 Kennedy Road in the City of Scarborough

Between L. Chung Development Company Ltd., Applicant/Appellant, and City of Scarborough, Respondent/Respondent

Action No. 1005/90 Ontario Court of Justice - General Division Divisional Court - Toronto, Ontario Rosenberg, Campbell and Then JJ. Heard: June 19, 1992 Judgment: August 31, 1992

Ian J. Tod, for the Appellant. Louis C. Mangoff, for the Respondent. Patricia M. Conway, for the Intervenor.

Reasons for judgment, allowing the appeal, delivered by Rosenberg J. and concurred in by Campbell and Then JJ.

ROSENBERG J.:--

NATURE OF THE PROCEEDINGS

The appellant appealed from the decision of the Ontario Municipal Board (the "Board") dated October 15, 1990 pursuant to leave granted by Madam Justice Weiler on January 22, 1991. The decision of the Board confirmed a condition placed by the City of Scarborough on the appellant's draft plan of condominium. The condition required that all of the parking spaces on the property be common elements of the condominium corporation rather than individual parking units as planned by the developer.

THE FACTS

The subject is a mixed use commercial property at the corner of Kennedy Road and Sheppard Avenue in the City of Scarborough (the "City"). The development consists of two office buildings of five and six stories with retail space and a six storey free standing parking structure.

The two buildings contain a total of 136 office condominium units. The parking structure contains 391 parking spaces. In addition, there are 34 surface parking spaces on the site.

The project was originally built as a rental project, in 1987 the appellant applied to the City for permission to convert it to condominium ownership.

While awaiting registration of the condominium, the appellant pre-sold 37 condominium units. The purchasers are in interim occupancy.

The purchasers did not purchase parking spaces along with their condominium units. Their Agreements of Purchase and Sale expressly provided that a parking space was not being allocated to the purchaser.

The relevant provisions of the Agreements of Purchase and Sale read:

37. The Purchaser acknowledges that this Agreement does not provide for any parking spaces to be allocated to the Purchaser whether exclusively or in common with others. Any parking areas surrounding the building in which the Unit is contained may at the sole option of the Vendor form part of the Condominium Corporation or the common elements thereof. The Purchaser acknowledges that any parking privileges which it may obtain shall be subject to space availability and shall be granted, if available, by way of separate agreement between the Vendor and Purchaser on the Vendor's Standard Form of Agreement for such purpose and at the current rental rate charged by the Vendor for such right.

38. The Purchaser acknowledges that the Condominium is situate in a building which contains as well certain premises which will be used for commercial retail purposes and commercial office purposes and which premises are not to be owned by the Condominium Corporation and shall not form part of the common elements of the Corporation and at the option of the Vendor may include as part of the Condominium Corporation the existing building owned by the Vendor known municipally as 4002 Sheppard Avenue East and the parking garage to be constructed. The Purchaser further acknowledges that portions of said commercial premises may, either individually or in combination, be retained by the Vendor in fee simple or registered by the Vendor as one or more individual commercial condominium corporations and may be leased to such Tenants or sold to such Purchasers as the Vendor deems fit from time to time. The Purchaser further acknowledges that the Corporation may have entered into an agreement or agreements with the owner or owners or tenant or tenants of said commercial premises, prior to completion of this transaction, which agreements shall govern the rights and liabilities of the Corporation and the owner or owners of the said commercial premises, including without limitation, terms and provisions relating to mutual easements, permitted uses, insurance, maintenance, repair, damage, demolition, termination and the allocation of costs of maintaining, operating and repairing the building and its systems and equipment (collectively referred to herein as the "Reciprocal Agreement"). The Purchaser covenants and agrees that it shall consent to, approve of and shall not object to (1) the execution and registration of the Reciprocal Agreement required by the Vendor, and (2) the registration of one or more commercial condominium corporations within the building or the incorporation of the proposed parking garage and/or the existing building at 4002 Sheppard Avenue East as part of the Condominium Corporation. The Purchaser hereby irrevocably nominates, constitutes and appoints the Vendor as his agent and attorney in fact and in law to execute any consents or other documents required by the Vendor to give effect to this paragraph. The Purchaser covenants and agrees that he shall execute and deliver to the Vendor on closing the undertaking, covenant and agreement of the Purchaser, to be prepared by the Vendor for the benefit of the Vendor and the owners, from time to time, of the remaining portions of the building, whereby the Purchaser agrees, inter alia, that (1) the Purchaser shall exercise his right to vote and shall otherwise cause the Corporation and its board of directors to comply with and perform all of the Condominium Corporation's obligations and...

Because the appellant was not selling parking spaces, the cost of the parking structure was not incorporated into the purchase price of the condominium units. Each purchaser could buy parking units but declined to do so. In September 1989, the City approved the appellant's draft plan of condominium with a condition (Condition No. 5) that all parking spaces on the property be common elements of the condominium corporation. Condition No. 5 was added to the appellant's plan pursuant to an unwritten policy of the City. Although the appellant's plan was submitted in June, 1987, the City did not communicate its unwritten policy to the appellant until September, 1989, after the sale of the 37 units.

The effect of Condition No. 5 is to convey the parking structure from the appellant to the condominium corporation without compensation.

The appellant proposed a compromise condition to the Board by which the parking garage would be part of the common elements of the condominium corporation, and each unit holder would have the exclusive use of one parking space. The appellant would hold the exclusive use of the spaces not assigned to purchasers so long as it remains a unit holder. The appellant's use would be restricted in that it could only assign or lease its spaces to unit owners or their invitees.

DISCUSSION AND ANALYSIS Municipal Board are as follows. The Board recited the Condition No. 5:

Prior to the registration of the plan, the owner shall submit a final Condominium Description and Declaration to the City for the approval of the Commissioner of Planning to ensure that all parking spaces and access driveways are maintained as common elements in the condominium.

The Board also stated:

At issue is the proposed ownership of the parking spaces within the garage.

The Board also found that:

...there are no formal written policies governing Commercial Condominium development as there are for both Residential and Industrial.

The Board also referred to the opinion of the principal planner for Scarborough, as follows:

... It is Mr. Januszcak's opinion that, the complex was approved and developed as a planned entity and therefore it seemed logical that to retain that entity, the parking garage would be part of the common elements under the control and operation of the Condominium Corporation...

If correctly quoted Mr. Januszcak had a misunderstanding of the condominium principle. The registration of the total project as one condominium, with the garage spaces being units in the condominium, would retain the total complex as a planned entity and would give the condominium corporation complete control as they have of the total project, including the parking spaces, common elements and the office units, and the retail units.

The Board also found:

The developer had proposed to identify all 391 of the parking spaces within the garage as "units" and not as common elements. Each unit was described as the concrete pad upon which a car is parked and the air space around and above such a rectangular space. The ramps, the driveways, the columns and the structural elements of the garage would then be described as part of the common elements. By this cleverly contrived scheme, the developer would be able to sell, lease or rent all of the parking spaces yet the Condominium Corporation would pay for the maintenance, repair, and replacement costs of the entire structure. His contribution to the Condominium Corporation operating budget would be negligible.

This passage indicated a misunderstanding of the condominium concept. If the developer had, in addition to any commercial units that he retained, 391 parking units, he would be paying a very substantial part of the common expenses. The Condominium Act requires that each unit bear a portion of the common expenses of the condominium project in accordance with the proportion set out in the declaration. Thus, the developer would have to pay a portion of the common expenses for each parking unit owned as well as each other unit owned, and would be contributing a significant portion of the condominium corporation's operating budget. The question of whether or not the proportions designated for each unit was appropriate was not something that should have been a concern of the Ontario Municipal Board. In fact, they did not examine into these proportions.

The Ontario Municipal Board also referred to the evidence that,

...the developer has pre-sold 37 units and did not incorporate the market or capital cost of the parking garage into the selling price of these units.

The Board referred to the financial hardship resulting from this as follows:

To end the issue of financial return, it was pointed out to Mr. Frank in cross-examination, and he agreed, that the remaining unsold 99 units could be re-priced to recoup the capital investment of the parking garage.

This is not economic reality. Presumably the remaining office and retail units would be sold for whatever supply and demand justify. It is unlikely that a purchaser would pay an additional amount to pay for someone else's parking units.

With regard to planning, the Board stated as follows:

To turn to the planned function, it is obvious from the evidence of the two professional planners, that the site was developed to function as one commercial entity with its own on-site parking facilities for tenants (owners), staff and clients/customers. The density allowed was determined by the number of parking spaces and by the site's location within one of four major commercial nodes identified in the Scarborough Official Plan. City Planners anticipate major developments and re-developments at the intersection of Kennedy Road and Sheppard Avenue east with the projection of 5 - 10,000 office jobs becoming available. Therefore, the Board finds that it is essential that the integrity of this complex be maintained so as not to interfere or interrupt the expected planned growth of this commercial node.

Mr. Januszcak was concerned that if parking, for whatever reason, became inconvenient or too costly for either staff or customers, the temptation would be so great to park in neighbouring restaurant or retail parking lots designed for the patrons of these commercial facilities. Agincourt Mall is directly across the street and a Mother's Restaurant is to the north. The overflow parking could disrupt the planned function of those lots to serve these other planned facilities.

Concern was also expressed that should the developer retain control of some 250 parking spaces, it could be tempting to lease spaces to other users in the node or commuters such as when the Sheppard subway becomes a reality and thereby deprive occupiers and visitors to the subject commercial complex from using its planned allocation of spaces. However, there would be nothing to prevent the Condominium Corporation in the original Condition 5 from doing the same if it became more profitable to do so. Intuitively though, the Board of Directors of the Condominium Corporation would have the best interest of the corporation in mind and promote a successful image as unit owners would not only be running their business from the premises, but would also have a substantial investment in the complex as property owners. In any event, the proposed amendment to the condition would prevent sale or lease of spaces to any users outside of the subject complex.

Whether the Board and Scarborough were entitled to reconsider the planning of the project because of the change in the method of occupancy from tenants to owners, is the main issue before this court.

With regard to the fairness aspect, the Board stated:

With regard to fairness, the Board finds that it is not fair by any stretch of the imagination to require all of the future unit owners, of which the declarant would be just one, to pay 100 per cent of the cost to repair, maintain and replace the parking garage when the declarant retains ownership of 250 of the 391 spaces. In addition, the Board was not provided with any evidence as to how the parking garage can operate effectively to the benefit of the commercial complex when some spaces are operated under the authority of the Condominium Corporation and 250 spaces under the control of the declarant. In making such a finding the Board relies on section 50(4) [now 51(4)] which states:

'In considering a draft plan of subdivision, regard shall be had, among other matters, to the health, safety, convenience and welfare of the present and future inhabitants of the local municipality and to the following,

(b) whether the proposed subdivision is premature or in the public interest.'

The Board's decision is contained in the following paragraph:

For all of the above reasons the Board finds that the proposed scheme would be a detriment to the convenience and welfare of the future condominium inhabitants nor is it in the public interest to allow one unit owner whether it be the declarant or someone else to have control over the majority of the parking spaces while draining the corporation with maintenance costs. The Board finds it would interfere with the Planned function of this commercial complex and could jeopardize the realization of a strong commercial node for the subject intersection.

The Board's attitude towards the legitimate proposals of the developer was revealed in the following statement:

The Board echoes the sentiment of Talions J. in York Condominium Corporation No. 344 and Lorgate Enterprises Limited and Wolf Von Teichman, in Trust (unreported, December 16, 1986 in the County Court of the Judicial District of York) in which he ends his judgment with the following:

'Although this Court has been unable to grant the relief sought in the Notice of Motion, it is clear that the developer's conduct leaves much to be desired and may be actionable in another forum, that the interests of so many unit holders may be held for ransom in such a way cries out for further refinement of the Condominium Act'.

The Board also stated:

In addition, the Board is concerned with the prospect of the Condominium Corporation not allocating sufficient funds to property maintain the parking garage and allowing it to fall into disrepair because of its lack of ownership of the majority of the spaces. Should the garage fall to disuse, it would greatly interfere with the planned function of this complex as a whole.

This view is based on the understanding that the condominium corporation owns the common elements. The common elements are owned by the unit owners in their unit proportions. Whether the parking spaces are common elements or units has no impact on the obligation of the condominium corporation to maintain the common elements.

The final conclusions of the Ontario Municipal Board are contained in the following paragraph:

Counsel for Scarborough put to the Board that somehow the condition requested by the Developer was an 'undemocratic scheme' contrary to the very principles of the Condominium Act. The said act provides for a concept of multiple ownership of property whereby pursuant to section 7(1) "The owners are tenants in common of the common elements". Section 1(9) defines "Common Elements" as "means all the property except the units" Given that thrust in the Condominium Act it follows that the Corporation which represents all of the owners should own and control all of the common elements. The Board then finds that it is 'reasonable' to require that all of the parking spaces within the garage be described as part of the common elements within the ownership of the Condominium Corporation.

The Board then pursuant to section 50(17) of the Planning Act determines that condition 5 as issued is reasonable and should remain a condition of approval of the draft plan of condominium.

The Board orders that condition 5 issued on December 20, 1989 by the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto for file 55CDM-87-041 remain unaltered as part of the conditions of approval.

The appellant argued that:

1. The subject property received all necessary municipal approvals in 1982 having been considered and approved with its own on-site parking. It was constructed and is operated as one rental complex.

2. The application for condominium conversion was made by the appellant in 1987.

3. The change of method of occupancy, that is by tenants or owners, does not change the planning criteria. The Planning Act provides that a Minister or his delegate may impose conditions to the approval of a condominium description which are reasonable "having regard to the nature of the development proposed". Planning Act, R.S.O. 1990, s. 51(5).

The legislature in the Condominium Act and related statutes provided protection for purchasers of residential condominium units. This was justified in Ontario where residential rental units were scarce and because purchasers of residential units were often unsophisticated and unfamiliar with condominium law. The same cannot be said for the purchaser of commercial condominium units. They are business people, usually sophisticated. There is no scarcity of office space or retail space in the City of Scarborough and there is no reason why the terms of a condominium project sale cannot be freely negotiated between the developer and the purchaser, as was done in this case. The purchasers agreed that they were not entitled to any of the parking units as part of their purchase price.

In the case of Pinetree Development Co. Ltd v. Minister of Housing for the Province of Ontario et al (1976-77) 1 M.P.L.R. 277, Steele J. speaking for the Ontario Supreme Court (Divisional Court) was dealing with the case where the Municipality proposed to re-examine the levies to be charged to the residential condominium developer on conversion from rental to condominium, and stated at page 285:

The region now stands in the same position as the Town of Pickering with respect to external services. Looked at in this light, it poses the question of whether or not a developer who, having once developed a plan and entered into a subdivision agreement providing for all of the internal services and payment of levies relating to external services under which the municipality agrees to assume responsibility for external services, must re-apply and pay further levies to the municipality when he wishes to convert his property into a condominium. In other words, must he go to the municipality the second time and pay additional levies which the municipality, through changed policies, has decided and which are more onerous than the original requirements. Stated differently, if an owner are appropriate to all subdivisions and condominiums wishes to change the type of ownership, must he be subjected to further payments to a municipality where there is no physical change in the development. I do not believe that this was the intention of the Legislature, nor do I believe that it was the intention of the Region of Durham when they set their development policies. In adopting their development policy and levy policy, they have set out the same levies for lands to be developed for subdivisions as for condominiums. This may well be appropriate because many condominium developments are, in effect, a horizontal method of ownership which is similar to a plan of subdivision, and it would appear that the same levies could be appropriate to both. In both these cases there will be an increase in the density or a requirement for additional services.

In the case of an existing property that has been developed by a plan of subdivision which the owner wishes to change to condominium ownership, there can be no justification in requiring that he pay the levies over again. On its face both the regional policy could apply, both to a new development that first was processed through as a plan of subdivision and where a few months later the owners decided to change the method of ownership. The question is, can the developer be required to pay the identical levies twice? I think the answer is no. (Emphasis added).

The same principles apply to a second consideration of the planning requirements that applied in the Pinetree case to levies. That is, there should not be a requirement that the developer be required to meet the planning requirements twice.

Steele J. does provide:

There may be some situations where there are additional municipal requirements properly attributable to a property that is converted from ownership rental type to condominium type, but there is no evidence that this is the situation in this case.

The type of appropriate planning consideration referred to by Steele J. could be demonstrated by the following example: a developer applied to convert a residential rental property to a condominium. A planning expert testified that condominium purchasers on the average drive more cars than tenants. That the parking facilities are inadequate for the same project occupied by owners of condominium units. Accordingly, it is an appropriate planning function to require additional parking before allowing the conversion to condominium. Such a planning consideration would be attributable to the change in type of occupancy. This, however, is not the type of consideration that led Scarborough to require that the developer, without compensation, give up ownership of all of the parking units.

Counsel for the intervenor did not cause the style of cause to be amended, nor was there evidence before us of the order allowing the intervenor to intervene. Counsel advised that the intervenor was granted that status by order of Craig J., and that the intervenor was one of the purchasers of a commercial unit, and that counsel also informally represented a number of the other purchasers. It is inappropriate for a purchaser who has signed an agreement that the purchase price does not include parking, and who has declined to purchase parking space, to come to court to reinforce the decision that gives them a windfall at the expense of the developer. If the decision giving them this windfall is upheld, that is unavoidable, but to argue for a position that is contrary to their freely negotiated contract is inappropriate. Counsel for the intervenor argued that the only issue before the Ontario Municipal Board was whether or not the compromise proposal was more appropriate than Condition No. 5. That does not appear to be the decision of the Ontario Municipal Board as they direct their decision to whether or not Condition No. 5 was appropriate and to the justification by Scarborough for Condition No. 5.

Accordingly, the appeal is allowed and the approval of the condominium conversion is amended by deleting Condition No. 5 from both the City of Scarborough and the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto approvals. If the parties cannot agree on the question of costs, we will receive written submissions in that regard.

The judgment of the court was delivered by

ROBINS J.A.:--These appeals, however decided, demonstrate yet again the need for a major overhaul of this province's residential condominium legislation. At issue is the interpretation and application of s. 52 of the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 84 (now R.S.O. 1990, c. C.26) ("the Act"). Section 52(1) provides that an agreement to purchase a new residential condominium unit will not be binding on a purchaser until the declarant or proposed declarant delivers a "current disclosure statement and all material amendments thereto". Section 52(2) provides that the purchaser may rescind the agreement within ten days after receiving "the disclosure statement" or, where there has been a "material amendment" to the disclosure statement, within ten days after receiving the material amendment. Section 52(6) sets out, in general terms, the items to be disclosed in a disclosure statement.

The purchasers in these appeals, which were heard together, contend that they are entitled to rescind their respective agreements of purchase and sale because the disclosure statements which were delivered to them failed to meet the requirements of s. 52 and because they were not provided with material amendments to those disclosure statements. Whether they are so entitled is the principal issue to be decided here. There are several additional issues which I shall come to later in these reasons.

FACTS

1. Abdool v. Somerset Place Developments

The respondents in this appeal ("the purchasers" or "the Somerset purchasers") are 38 purchasers who, individually or jointly, entered into 26 separate agreements to purchase residential condominium units in a project known as "The Royal Ascot Club" in Georgetown, Ontario. The Royal Ascot is a seven-storey residential building containing 83 proposed units, a common element suite, a recreation centre, a two-level underground parking lot and an outdoor parking lot ("the property"). The agreements were entered into between May and November 1988, save for two that were executed in 1989, and provide for an occupancy closing and a final closing. The date of the occupancy closing was to be September 1, 1989, or an extended date determined by the time at which the units were substantially completed for occupancy.

Canterra Developments Inc. ("Canterra") is the parent company of Somerset Place Developments of Georgetown Limited ("Somerset"), the developer of the Royal Ascot project and the named vendor in the agreements of purchase and sale. As a result of their financial circumstances, Canterra and Somerset ceased work on the project and effectively abandoned it prior to the commencement of these proceedings. Neither company appeared on this appeal or defended the application in the court below.

The appellant Prenor Equity Inc. ("Prenor") is a mortgagee of the property whose mortgage (including a debenture issued together therewith) is in default. Pursuant to the terms of its security, Prenor appointed 379059 Ontario Ltd., c.o.b. as Retail Engineering ("Retail Engineering"), as receiver-manager of the property to do the work necessary to complete the project. The cost of completion was financed by Prenor.

Before executing their respective agreements of purchase and sale, each purchaser was provided with a seven-page disclosure statement, which included a description of the recreational facilities and other amenities to be provided, and to which was appended: the proposed budget for the first year following registration of the project, and copies of the proposed condominium documents, including the proposed corporation's declaration, by-laws, rules, insurance trust agreement and management agreement.

The two purchasers whose evidence provided the basis for the application indicated that they sought and obtained legal advice before signing their agreements of purchase and sale. They knew that they had ten days in which to rescind their respective agreements, but chose not to do so. It can be taken that all of the other purchasers similarly agreed to the terms of their respective agreements. These terms provided, inter alia: that the final closing date for each unit could be extended for a period not exceeding 24 months in the aggregate; that the only warranty covering the units was that provided by the Ontario New Home Warranties Plan Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 350 (now R.S.O. 1990, c. O.3); that the building and the units were to be constructed to at least the minimum Ontario Building Code requirements and substantially in compliance with the municipally-approved plans and specifications; that the purchasers would have no claim against Somerset for any higher or better standard of workmanship or materials; and that the offer, when accepted, constituted a binding contract, and, that there was no representation, warranty, collateral agreement or condition affecting the agreement or the property other than those expressed in writing in the agreement.

As a result of delays in construction, due in part to the developer's lack of funds, the purchasers were unable to take occupancy of their units on September 1, 1989, the proposed occupancy closing date. The majority of purchasers took possession in January and February 1990, although some refused to complete the occupancy closing. In April 1990, Somerset's general contractor walked off the job and, while Somerset continued to do the work needed to finish the units, the work remaining to complete the recreational centre and certain parts of the common areas came to a halt. This work was resumed after Prenor stepped in to protect its mortgage position in November 1990, and appointed Retail Engineering as receiver-manager to complete the project and rectify any outstanding deficiencies. The mortgage between Somerset and Prenor empowered any receiver or receiver-manager appointed by Prenor to take possession of the property and to carry on the business of Somerset and provided that, in exercising any powers under the mortgage, the receiver or receiver-manager shall act as agent for Somerset and Prenor shall not be responsible for the receiver's actions.

During the period between September 8, 1989 and January 21, 1991, a number of notices of construction lien and certificates of action were registered against title, including one filed by the general contractor for an amount exceeding $1,700,000. No amended disclosure statement was ever delivered to the purchasers with respect to these liens or with respect to any other matter affecting the project.

Retail Engineering completed the recreational and other amenities by April 1991, and occupancy permits for these facilities were subsequently issued. The project was registered in accordance with the provisions of the Act on October 31, 1991. When this application came on for hearing, most of the problems arising out of deficiencies and delays in construction had been remedied. These problems, and the claims arising from them, were dealt with at length in the court below. They are, however, irrelevant to the s. 52 issues that are common to these appeals, and need not be discussed at this stage.

These proceedings were commenced by the purchasers on March 1, 1991, by way of an application seeking various forms of relief including a declaration that the disclosure statement failed to comply with s. 52 of the Condominium Act and that the agreements of purchase and sale were accordingly not binding on the purchasers. The application came on in Motions Court before Blenus Wright J. in June, 1991.

In reasons reported at (1991), 4 O.R. (3d) 280, 82 D.L.R. (4th) 50, 19 R.P.R. (2d) 229, the learned judge accepted the purchasers' position on the s. 52 issue and declared the agreements of purchase and sale non-binding. In addition, the judge ruled that Prenor was a declarant under the provisions of the Condominium Act and was subject to the liabilities of Somerset. These liabilities included an agreement with the purchasers to reduce the mortgage interest component of the monthly occupancy fees, to provide a courtesy van for the condominium corporation, and to supply appropriate furniture for the lobby of the complex. Prenor was ordered to refund the deposit monies, including monies paid for upgrades, plus accrued interest, and further, to refund the mortgage interest component of the monthly occupancy fees paid by the purchasers. Prenor appeals to this court from that judgment.

2. Budinsky v. Breakers East

The appellants in this appeal are 25 purchasers ("the purchasers" or "the Breakers purchasers") who, individually or jointly, between March and November 1988, entered into 14 separate agreements with the respondent to purchase residential condominium units in a project known as "The Breakers" in Ajax, Ontario. The respondent The Breakers East Inc. ("Breakers East") is the developer of the project and the proposed declarant.

The agreements provided that the purchase and sale was to be completed by November 30, 1989, or such other date as was provided in the agreement, and that there could be an occupancy closing prior to the final closing of the transaction. On signing their respective agreements, each purchaser received a bound booklet entitled "The Breakers" which contained a disclosure statement and the other materials required by s. 52(6) and (7) of the Act and s. 32 of Reg. 121, R.R.O. 1980. Whether these documents satisfied those provisions is in issue. The booklet is comprised of approximately 86 pages, seven of which contain the disclosure statement. The disclosure statement advised the purchasers that the condominium would have as amenities a recreational unit which included, inter alia, an indoor swimming-pool, an exercise room and an outdoor play area which included children's play facilities. The disclosure statement further specified that construction of the amenities would begin in October 1988 and would be completed by December 1990. An occupancy permit for the pool was not issued until July 1991 and, as of September 1991, the children's play area had not been completed.

For reasons which are not material to the main issue in this appeal, none of the units were ready for occupancy until November 1990. The purchasers of all but four of the units subsequently completed their occupancy closings and have since been in possession of their respective units. In some cases, the purchasers have paid the monthly occupancy fee; in others, they have failed or refused to make this payment. Some units have been leased by the purchasers, others have been occupied by the purchasers or members of their families, and others have remained empty. While the project is now substantially completed, registration has not yet been effected and no date for final closing has been set.

Subsequent to execution of the agreements of purchase and sale, a number of notices of construction lien and certificates of action were registered, and remain registered, against title. The liens range in amount from $1,396 to approximately $2,100,000. The latter amount represents the total of two liens registered on June 21, 1991 and August 22, 1991 by Atlas-Gest Inc. (formerly Jatas Inc.), which acted as the general contractor for the project and which, following a dispute with the respondent, was dismissed in the early summer of 1991. No amended disclosure statement was delivered to the purchasers with respect to these liens or with respect to any other matter affecting the project.

When they signed their agreements of purchase and sale, each purchaser acknowledged having received the disclosure statement and the attached documents. None of the purchasers complained about any deficiency in the disclosure statement or the accompanying material during the ten-day period provided in s. 52(2) or at any time prior to commencing this application. The disclosure statement was reviewed, in most cases, by the purchaser's lawyer before the agreement was executed.

The purchasers commenced these proceedings by application in August 1991, seeking, inter alia, a declaration that their disclosure statements did not comply with s. 52 of the Act and that they were not bound by their agreements of purchase and sale. The application came on for hearing before Borins J. in December, 1991.

In reasons now reported at (1991), 6 O.R. (3d) 255, 87 D.L.R. (4th) 572, 23 R.P.R. (2d) 54, the learned judge held that if a purchaser is for any reason dissatisfied with the disclosure statement, the purchaser is obliged to exercise the right to rescind within the ten-day period provided in s. 52(2). If the purchaser does not exercise that right, he or she must be taken to have accepted the disclosure statement and the agreement is binding. If the purchaser should later discover that the statement does not comply with s. 52, the purchaser's remedy, in so far as the Act is concerned, is limited to damages under s. 52(5). Since the right to rescind was not exercised in this case, the judge concluded that the agreements of purchase and sale were binding on the purchasers and found it unnecessary to determine whether the disclosure statements complied with the Act. The purchasers appeal to this court from that decision.

The Legislation

Section 52 of the Act provides that:

52(1) An agreement of purchase and sale entered into after the 1st day of June, 1979 by a declarant or proposed declarant of a unit or proposed unit for residential purposes is not binding on the purchaser until the declarant or proposed declarant has delivered to the purchaser a copy of the current disclosure statement and all material amendments thereto.

(2) The purchaser, before receiving delivery of a deed to or transfer of the unit, may rescind the agreement of purchase and sale within ten days after receiving the disclosure statement or, where there has been a material amendment thereto, within ten days after receiving the material amendment.

(3) A person may rescind an agreement of purchase and sale under subsection (2) by giving written notice of the rescission to the declarant or proposed declarant or to the solicitor of the declarant or proposed declarant.

(4) Every declarant or proposed declarant who receives notice of rescission under subsection (3) from a person entitled to rescind the agreement of purchase and sale under subsection (2), shall forthwith refund, without penalty or charge, to the person giving notice, all money that the declarant or proposed declarant received from that person under the agreement that was credited as payment against purchase price.

(5) Where any statement or material required under this Act to be provided by a declarant or proposed declarant to a purchaser of a unit or proposed unit for residential purposes contains any material statement or information that is false, deceptive or misleading or fails to contain any material statement or information, the corporation or any unit owner who relied on such statement or material is entitled, as against the declarant or the proposed declarant to damages for any loss sustained as a result of such reliance.

(6) The disclosure statement referred to in subsection (1) shall contain and fully and accurately disclose,

(a) the name and municipal address of the declarant or proposed declarant and of the property or proposed property;

(b) a general description of the property or proposed property including the types and number of buildings, units and recreational and other amenities together with any conditions that apply to the provision of amenities;

(c) the portion of units or proposed units which the declarant or proposed declarant intends to market in blocks of units to investors;

(d) a brief narrative description of the significant features of the existing or proposed declaration, by-laws and rules governing the use of common elements and units, and of any contracts or leases that may be subject to termination or expiration under section 39;

(e) a budget statement for the one year period immediately following the registration of the declaration and the description;

(f) where construction of amenities is not completed, a schedule of proposed commencement and completion dates; and

(g) any other matters required by the regulations to be disclosed.

(7) The budget statement mentioned in clause 6(e) shall set out,

(a) the common expenses;

(b) the proposed amount of each expense;

(c) particulars of the type, frequency and level of the services to be provided; (d) the projected monthly common expense contribution for each type of unit;

(e) a statement of the portion of the common expense to be paid into a reserve fund;

(f) a statement of the assumed inflation factor;

(g) a statement of any judgments against the corporation, the status of any pending lawsuits to which the corporation is a party and the status of any pending lawsuits material to the property of which the declarant or proposed declarant has actual knowledge;

(h) any current or expected fees or charges to be paid by unit owners or any of them for the use of the common elements or part thereof and other facilities related to the property;

(i) any services not included in the budget that the declarant or proposed declarant provides, or expenses that the declarant pays and that might reasonably be expected to become, at any subsequent time, a common expense and the projected common expense contribution attributable to each of those services or expenses for each type of unit;

(j) the amounts in all reserve funds; and

(k) any other matters required by the regulations to be disclosed.

Section 32 of Reg. 121, R.R.O. 1980, provides that:

32. Pursuant to subsection 52(6) of the Act, a declarant shall provide the following documents with the disclosure statement:

1. A copy of the corporation's declaration or proposed declaration.
2. A copy of the corporation's by-laws or proposed by-laws.
3. A copy of the corporation's rules or proposed rules.
4. A copy of any insurance trust agreement or proposed insurance trust agreement.

The Background of s. 52

When the Condominium Act was first enacted in 1967 (Condominium Act, 1967, S.O. 1967, c. 12) to create a new form of property ownership, it imposed no disclosure requirements on developers and provided little protection for purchasers. The Act has since been amended in a number of significant ways in order to protect purchasers of new condominium units from certain problems which manifested themselves in the industry.

Section 24b, the predecessor to s. 52, came into force as part of a 1974 package of amendments (S.O. 1974, c. 133, s. 14 [amending R.S.O. 1970, c. 77]). This section introduced the concept of full disclosure into the Act. It was designed to ensure that purchasers of new condominium units were made aware of all matters material to their purchase and of the rights and obligations inherent in condominium ownership. Under s. 24 b, an agreement of purchase and sale of a unit or proposed unit for residential purposes was not binding unless the declarant or proposed declarant had delivered to the purchaser copies of the declaration; certain parts of the description; the by-laws or proposed by-laws; the rules or proposed rules governing the use of common elements; any agreement for the management of the property or insurance trust agreement; a budget statement; and a statement of the recreational or other amenities to be provided by the declarant for the enjoyment of the owners and the conditions, if any, that apply to the provision of such amenities. Section 24 b also required a proposed declarant, at least ten days before delivering a deed or transfer for the unit to the purchaser, to deliver to the purchaser a further copy of each document or confirmation that the document is identical in all substantial or material respects to the corresponding document previously delivered.

Despite this amendment, consumers apparently continued to experience problems in purchasing condominium units. This led the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations, in November, 1976, to establish the Ontario Residential Condominium Study Group to investigate and make recommendations for changes to the existing condominium legislation. The study group identified a number of problems in the legislation and its application (see, Report of the Ontario Residential Condominium Study Group (1977)), including some caused by the complexity of the documents that the developer was required to deliver. Although s. 24b was intended to ensure that a purchaser was fully informed of the nature of condominium ownership before executing an agreement of purchase and sale, it seems that in practice the complexity of the condominium documents and the high-pressure sales techniques used by some developers often frustrated this objective. To remedy the situation, the study group recommended, inter alia, that purchasers be provided with a summary statement highlighting important aspects of the documents and be given a ten-day cooling off period, during which they could cancel the agreement, to review the documents.

Following the study group's report, the former Act was repealed and the Condominium Act, 1978, S.O. 1978, c. 84 (now R.S.O. 1990, c. C.26), which includes the present s. 52, was enacted. The Act was proclaimed in force on June 1, 1979. In introducing the new Act, the Honourable Larry Grossman, the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations, described it as a "form of consumer protection legislation" which would provide purchaser protection to consumers by requiring "tighter standards of disclosure between sellers and purchasers; allowing time for purchasers to become informed of their responsibilities; and clarifying purchasers' rights during the interim occupancy period": Debates, Legislative Assembly of Ontario, June 1, 1978.

Section 52, like s. 24b, is premised on a "full disclosure" philosophy. However, s. 52 provides purchasers with safeguards in addition to those provided by s. 24 b. Under s. 52, the declarant or proposed declarant is required to deliver a current disclosure statement containing the information prescribed in s. 52(6) and (7). The purchaser may unilaterally rescind the agreement within ten days after receiving the disclosure statement or, where there has been a material amendment to the disclosure statement, ten days after receiving the material amendment. This ten-day "cooling off" period is intended to ensure that the purchaser has an opportunity to acquire an understanding of the nature of his or her purchase. The disclosure statement is to assist in making the condominium documents more understandable. Until a copy of the current disclosure statement and all material amendments are delivered, the agreement is not binding on the purchaser. A false, deceptive or misleading disclosure statement, or one that fails to contain any material information, can render a declarant liable in damages under s. 52(5) notwithstanding that the transaction has been finally closed. To knowingly contravene s. 52(5), (6) or (7) is to commit an offence punishable under s. 55 of the Act.

With those background observations in mind, I turn to the first of the issues common to these appeals.

Is an agreement to purchase a proposed residential condominium unit binding on a purchaser if the disclosure statement delivered by the developer fails to comply with the requirements of s. 52?

This question arises only after the expiry of the ten-day cooling off period when, as in these cases, the purchaser for the first time questions the sufficiency of the disclosure statement in order to avoid the agreement. Within the ten-day period, the purchaser is, of course, free to rescind the agreement for any reason. For the purpose of this question, it can be assumed that the ten-day period has passed and, more importantly, that the disclosure statement does not comply with the Act. In those circumstances, is the purchaser bound by the agreement?

The learned judges from whom these appeals are brought have given conflicting answers to this question. On the one hand, Borins J. was of the opinion that the purchaser is bound by the agreement and, under the Act, is entitled only to damages pursuant to s. 52(5). Wright J., on the other hand, was of the opinion that the agreement is not binding on the purchaser and he or she is entitled to a declaration to this effect at any time before final closing. If Borins J. is correct it follows that, even if the disclosure statements in issue in these cases fail to satisfy the requirements of s. 52, the purchasers' claim for declaratory relief cannot succeed. If, however, Wright J. is correct, then it is obviously necessary to go on and determine whether there are in fact deficiencies in the disclosure statements such as to entitle the purchasers to a declaration that the agreements are not binding.

Wright J. reached his conclusion in Abdool on the basis that an agreement of purchase and sale can become binding on the purchaser under s. 52(1) only after the purchaser receives a disclosure statement that complies with s. 52(6) and (7). Until the declarant or proposed declarant delivers a disclosure statement that meets these requirements, the agreement cannot be binding. If s. 52(1) is not complied with, the judge said at p. 285 O.R., p. 54 D.L.R.:

. . . there does not appear to be any time-limit in which to declare an agreement of purchase and sale not binding on the grounds that the disclosure statement is inadequate as long as the purchaser has not become the owner of a unit.

Wright J. found support for his conclusion in Benner v. HLS York Developments Ltd. (1985), 52 O.R. (2d) 243, 21 D.L.R. (4th) 652 (H.C.J.), and in Brunott v. Coolmur Properties Ltd., an unreported decision of this court dated October 24, 1983 (noted at 22 A.C.W.S. (2d) 509). In Benner, Carruthers J., in dealing with the same issue, said at p. 246 O.R., p. 655 D.L.R., that:

. . . this right to rescind remains outstanding until the vendor provides a disclosure statement which complies with the provisions of the Act. Accordingly . . . in the absence of such a disclosure statement [the purchaser], can elect to rescind the agreement at any time. The fact that he did not purport to do so within 10 days of receipt of a form of disclosure statement offered by the [vendor], as is the case here, is of no moment. If a disclosure statement is found wanting so that, in effect, it is not a disclosure statement as required by the provisions of the Condominium Act, then a purchaser is at no time required to complete the transaction in connection with which it has been given.

In Brunott, this court earlier proceeded on the same basis. The court, in brief reasons, held that an agreement of purchase and sale was not binding on the purchasers after the ten-day period because the purported disclosure statement "lacked information on specific matters" enumerated in s. 52 and "was no more than a statement of intention". "Clearly", the court said, "the purpose of section 52 is that the purchaser be given this information". It is implicit in the decision that the court interpreted s. 52 to mean that if a declarant fails to deliver a disclosure statement in accordance with the requirements of s. 52, the agreement of purchase and sale may be declared non-binding at any time before title has been conveyed.

In Budinsky, Borins J., to the contrary, interpreted s. 52 to mean that a purchaser is entitled to avoid the binding effect of an executed agreement of purchase and sale only if the declarant fails to deliver a disclosure statement altogether, or if the purchaser rescinds the agreement within ten days after delivery of what purports to be a disclosure statement regardless of whether that document complies with s. 52(6) and (7). He describes the operation of s. 52, at pp. 275-76 O.R., pp. 591-92 D.L.R., as follows:

In my opinion, when read as a whole the provisions of s. 52 do not entitle a purchaser to walk away from an agreement to purchase a condominium unit at any time before final closing on discovering that the contents of a disclosure statement do not comply with s. 52(6) and (7). . . . If a disclosure statement is delivered, s. 52(2) gives the purchaser ten days to examine it and, if for any reason, the purchaser is dissatisfied, including the failure of the statement to comply with s. 52(6) and (7) in regard to its contents, the purchaser is at liberty to rescind the contract and pursuant to s. 52(4) receive a refund of any deposit. However, if a purchaser fails to exercise the right to rescind the agreement of purchase and sale it is binding on the purchaser and the purchaser must be taken to have accepted the disclosure statement. Should the purchaser subsequently discover that the disclosure statement "contains any material statement or information that is false, deceptive or misleading or fails to contain any material statement or information" (emphasis added), the purchaser's remedy is for damages against the vendor as provided by s. 52(5) and not by way of a declaration that the agreement of purchase and sale is not binding. A similar construction applies with respect to the non-delivery or delivery of an amended disclosure statement. Any other interpretation would render s. 52(2) and s. 52(5) meaningless.

(The emphasis is Borins J.'s)

Borins J. specifically refused to follow Abdool and Benner, and sought to distinguish Brunott, on the ground that the effect of s. 52(5), on which he predicated his construction of s. 52, had either not been considered in those cases or had been misconstrued. In his view, the remedy provided by s. 52(5) provides adequate protection to a purchaser to ensure that a developer, in the preparation of a disclosure statement or a material amendment thereto, will comply with the requirements of the Act. He expressly rejected the notion that the right of rescission remains outstanding until the vendor provides a disclosure statement that complies with the provisions of the Act, stating at p. 272 O.R., p. 588 D.L.R.: . . . I am unable to agree that it is "of no moment" that a purchaser who does not decide to rescind an agreement of purchase and sale within the ten days provided by s. 52(2) may do so at any time before the closing date if it is found that the disclosure statement is at variance with the requirements of the Act. If this were so, s. 52(2) would have no meaning and until the date of the final closing a condominium developer would remain at risk that at any time after the ten-day period a purchaser could attack the sufficiency of a disclosure statement and, if successful, obtain a declaration that the agreement of purchase and sale was not binding on the purchaser.

While I am mindful of the potential consequences to developers if the section is construed so as to entitle purchasers to have their agreements declared non-binding at any time before final closing, I am respectfully unable to accept Borins J.'s interpretation of s. 52 or to agree that s. 52(5) was intended to have the governing effect he attributes to it. Section 52 must be viewed in the light of its underlying full disclosure philosophy. The consumer protection afforded to purchasers by giving them ten days within which to consider the required information is predicated on the assumption that the disclosure requirements have been satisfied. I cannot accept that no matter how manifestly devoid of content a document purporting to be a "disclosure statement" may be, or no matter how false, misleading or deceptive the document may be, once the cooling off period has expired, a purchaser's only recourse under the Act is damages under s. 52(5).

In my opinion, s. 52(5), whether read alone or in the context of s. 52, cannot be interpreted as intended to deprive purchasers of the protections conferred by s. 52(1) and (2), nor can it be intended to provide the sole remedy available to purchasers for a breach of s. 52. This subsection is for the benefit of "the corporation or any unit owner" who relied on a false, deceptive or misleading statement or a statement that omitted any material statement or information. By giving purchasers who have sustained a loss in these circumstances (and their condominium corporation) a cause of action in damages after final closing, that is, after they become "unit owners", without regard to whether they knew of the disclosure defects before closing, s. 52(5) eliminates any question of merger on closing and provides purchasers with protection in addition to that provided by other subsections of s. 52. As s. 52 is framed, a disclosure statement which fails to meet the requirements of s. 52(6) and (7) cannot be a disclosure statement within the meaning of s. 52(1). Section 52, by its express language, creates an interdependence between s. 52(1) and s. 52(6) and (7). Section 52(6) requires the disclosure statement referred to in s-s (1) to fully and accurately disclose the information called for in cls. (a) to (g) and, by reference, the budget information specified in s. 52(7). Delivery of a disclosure statement which fails to adequately provide this information cannot start the ten-day period for rescission running under s. 52(2).

This brings me to the disclosure statements in issue in these appeals. However, before determining whether they are such as to render the agreements of purchase and sale non-binding, it is important to consider the standard by which compliance with s. 52(6) and (7) is to be measured.

By what standard is compliance with s. 52(6) and (7) to be measured?

In answering this question there are a number of factors to be kept in mind. These disclosure provisions must, of course, be given a construction consistent with their consumer protection objectives. However, in judging the adequacy of the disclosure for the purposes of deciding whether an agreement is binding, the rights of both parties to the agreement must be taken into consideration. The purchaser is clearly entitled to the information called for by the Act in order to make an informed decision about his or her condominium purchase. At the same time, however, once the ten-day period has expired, the vendor is entitled to assume that it has a binding agreement of purchase and sale and to rely on the certainty of that agreement in developing the project and conducting its business affairs.

To declare that otherwise binding agreements are unenforceable solely because of the disclosure statement is obviously a very serious matter. Depending, of course, on the real estate market, the adverse economic impact of such declarations on developers is manifest. Accordingly, it seems to me apparent that not every defect in a disclosure statement will warrant a declaration that an agreement is not binding. Before a defect can have that effect, it must be of such substance as to render the disclosure statement defective in a material respect. The sufficiency of a disclosure statement, like the need to deliver an amendment thereto, must be judged on the basis of materiality. I agree with Carruthers J. in Benner, supra, at p. 246 O.R., p. 655 D.L.R., that, in deciding whether a disclosure statement complies with the requirements of s. 52(6) and (7):

. . . the sufficiency or otherwise of [the] disclosure statement must . . . be judged on the basis of the materiality of its content. The absence of something not material should not, in itself . . . permit a purchaser to avoid the completion of an otherwise enforceable agreement of purchase and sale.

Agreements should not be rendered unenforceable by technical deficiencies or immaterial omissions in a disclosure statement. Contracting parties, it must be remembered, owe one another a duty to act reasonably and in good faith and to perform contracts honestly made. LeMesurier v. Andrus (1986), 54 O.R. (2d) 1, 25 D.L.R. (4th) 424 (C.A.), leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada refused (1986), 21 O.A.C. 239n, 74 N.R. 239n. Consumer protection legislation intended, as this Act is, to promote fair dealing between contracting parties, ought not to be applied in a manner which produces the opposite result by allowing a party to resile from an otherwise valid agreement on grounds that are unfair, unreasonable or capricious.

The Act does not stipulate in precise terms the information that is to be contained in a disclosure statement. The vague terms used make it difficult to determine the required contents with any degree of specificity. Although s. 52(6) begins by requiring the statement to fully and accurately disclose the matter set forth in cls. (a) to (g), cl. (b) requires only a general description of the property including the recreational and other amenities, and cl. (d) requires only a brief narrative description of the significant features of the enumerated documents. In light of these stipulations, the disclosure statement can be intended to be no more than an incomplete description of the documents and a condensation of their significant features. Since brevity is mandated, the disclosure statement must, by definition, be short or not long. That being the case, it may be asked at what point does a statement become so summary or concise or, conversely, so prolix or verbose that it will fail to meet these requirements? It may also be asked which features of the bundle of documents to be delivered along with the disclosure statement are to be deemed so important or vital as to fall into the category of "significant features"? Similarly, when does a description of the property referred to in s. 52(6)(b) become too general, or not sufficiently particular, to satisfy the section?

In the absence of a standard form of disclosure statement or any legislative provisions prescribing its precise content, the answer to questions of this nature necessarily involves judgment calls by those responsible for drafting this document. The Act does not contemplate or indeed, in my view, permit a disclosure statement which simply reproduces the accompanying documents or sizable portions of them. Decisions have to be made as to what items should be included or omitted to satisfy the requirements of brevity, generality and significance imposed by s. 52. Given the absence of statutory guidelines on these matters, a broad and flexible approach must be taken in determining whether a particular statement is so incomplete in detail or lacking in content or, by the same token, so encyclopedic, as to defeat the aim of the section and render an agreement non-binding.

In making this determination, I am of the opinion that regard can be had to all of the information provided to the purchaser. The disclosure statement cannot be viewed in isolation from the other documents mandated by s. 52(6) and (7) but must instead be seen in the context of those documents. They form part of the disclosure material and are intended, along with all of the information required by s. 52(6) and (7), to assist a purchaser in making an informed decision on whether to go ahead with the outstanding agreement. It may be noted that cl. (g) of s. 52(6) requires that the disclosure statement "fully and accurately disclose . . . any other matters required by the regulations to be disclosed"; under s. 32 of Regulation 121, this includes copies of the declaration or proposed declaration, the rules or proposed rules, the by-laws or proposed by-laws, and any insurance trust agreement or proposed insurance trust agreement. The disclosure statement contemplated by the Act cannot possibly provide full details of these documents or make reference to all of their provisions. It can, however, assist purchasers in comprehending them by directing attention to certain of their provisions for a more comprehensive statement of their content.

If no disclosure statement is delivered, the purchaser obviously cannot be bound to the agreement. The problem, which these cases exemplify, arises when a purchaser, before final closing, seeks to rescind an agreement of purchase and sale on the ground that a disclosure statement, which on its face purports to address the matters enumerated in s. 52(6) and (7), does not in fact comply with those provisions. If, as I have concluded, only material departures from these provisions warrant declaring an otherwise valid agreement non-binding, when is a defect to be considered material? To invoke a common dictionary meaning of "material", when is a defect so pertinent, germane or essential as to render a disclosure statement in contravention of the Act and entitle a purchaser to cancel the transaction?

I approach this question first by reference to the applicable burden of proof. In my opinion, when a purchaser who has had the opportunity afforded by the cooling off period to consider the disclosure statement and the accompanying documentation, and has decided to go through with the transaction, subsequently seeks to resile from his or her otherwise binding agreement of purchase and sale on the basis of the deficiency of the disclosure statement, the onus is on the purchaser to show that the disclosure statement fails to satisfy the requirements of the Act to the degree that the agreement must be declared non-binding.

To discharge this onus and prove the materiality of the complaint, in my opinion, the purchaser is obliged to establish objectively that had the information that was not disclosed, or that was inaccurately or insufficiently disclosed, been properly disclosed in the disclosure statement at the time it was delivered to the purchaser, a reasonable purchaser would have regarded the information as sufficiently important to the decision to purchase that he or she would not likely have gone ahead with the transaction but would instead have rescinded the agreement before the expiration of the ten-day cooling off period.

I shall consider later the right of a purchaser under s. 52(2) to rescind the agreement where there has been a material amendment. At this juncture, I would move to the actual disclosure statements in these appeals.

Are the disclosure statements in issue so materially defective as to entitle the purchasers to a declaration that their respective agreements of purchase and sale are not binding?

The basic proposition advanced by the purchasers is that their respective disclosure statements contain numerous deficiencies the cumulative effect of which renders the disclosure statements so wanting that, in effect, they are not disclosure statements as required by s. 52 of the Act. The purchasers stress that it is the sum total of these deficiencies that renders them non-binding. They do not contend that any single deficiency, or any particular class of deficiencies, provides a basis for the declaration. Indeed, counsel for the purchasers, in argument, was not prepared to assign more importance to any one item than another, nor to make submissions as to which of them should be given greater weight in determining the validity of the disclosure statements.

Thirty-eight disclosure deficiencies are complained of in Abdool; forty in Budinsky. The complaints follow the same pattern in both cases and, for the most part, relate to the developers' alleged failure to disclose, or to disclose adequately, information about particular provisions of the declaration, by-laws or rules which should have been included in the "brief narrative description" required by s. 52(6)(d). In view of the purchasers' overall position, it is not necessary to deal with these complaints individually or to set them out in full detail. In Budinsky, Borins J. found it unnecessary on his construction of s. 52 to consider the adequacy of the disclosure statement. This question was, however, considered at length in Abdool. Since essentially the same type of complaints are made and the same arguments are advanced in both cases, the issues can be examined primarily by reference to the reasons of Wright J. and the basis upon which he would hold that a disclosure statement is in breach of the Act.

Wright J. accepted the purchasers' contention that the disclosure statement failed to provide the purchaser with necessary information about the nature of the condominium corporation and the rules governing the use of the common elements and units. At pp. 288-92 O.R., pp. 58-61 D.L.R., of his reasons, he provides examples of various by-laws, articles, and rules which, although referred to in the disclosure statement, are not adequately reviewed. In the judge's opinion, information concerning the following matters in the proposed by-laws may be of particular interest to some purchasers and should have been set forth in the disclosure statement in order to comply with s. 52: (i) the preparation of an estimated budget;

- (ii) the employment and dismissal of personnel necessary for the maintenance and operation of the common elements;
- (iii) the investment of reserve monies held by the Corporation in interest bearing accounts;
- (iv) the establishment and maintenance of adequate reserve funds for the major repair or replacement of the common elements;
- (v) that under Article V of the by-law, the board shall call a special meeting: "Upon receipt of a requisition in writing made by owners who together own not less than 15% of the units";
- (vi) that at meetings "a quorum shall be constituted when persons entitled to vote and owning not less than 33;1% of the units are present in person or represented by proxy"; (vii) that the affairs of the corporation can effectively be dealt with by only one-third of the unit owners;
- (viii) that the number of directors shall be five, of whom three shall constitute a quorum, and that a director need not be an owner;
- (ix) the by-law with respect to default in payment of common expenses and that arrears, "shall bear interest at the rate of 18% per annum and shall be compounded monthly until paid";
- (x) the provisions of Article XII whereby the board sets the budget unilaterally; and that on receipt of the budget, owners must pay by 12 post-dated cheques. Extraordinary expenses may be assessed by the board at any time and are payable within ten days.

In addition, the judge offered the following further examples of information in By-law No. 1 which "some purchasers may consider to be significant and to which at least some reference might be made in a disclosure statement". At pp. 291-92 O.R., p. 61 D.L.R., he states:

Article III of the by-law describes the records which the corporation shall maintain. The following is a list of some of the records spelled out in Article III:

- 1(i) a table depicting the maintenance responsibilities and indicating whether the corporation or the unit owners are responsible.
- (j) . . . a list detailing current replacement costs and life expectancy under normal maintenance conditions of all major capital items in the property.
- (k) a separate record of all receipts on account of common expense payments.

. . . .

- 4(a) minutes of all meetings of the Board;

.....

(c) a copy of all consents for alterations to units.

5(a) a copy of annual financial statements shall be furnished to every owner.

The disclosure statement makes no reference to any of the records which the corporation is required to keep. To be advised that there is easy access to such records could be important to a purchaser who is becoming a shareholder of a business. The purchaser will be put somewhat at ease knowing that there is a record of who is responsible for maintenance and information available on life expectancy and current replacement costs of all major capital items. As well, a purchaser will have access to all minutes of the board meetings and will receive an annual financial statement. Probably an even more important record to a purchaser is the consents for alterations to units. There could be considerable consternation amongst unit owners if there was no such record. If there were no records, unit owners could discover that the corporation allowed certain alterations to be made by one owner but refused approval for similar alterations to another owner. Where the corporation must keep a record of all consents for alterations, unit owners are assured of even-handed treatment.

With respect to the rules, Wright J. says at p. 292 O.R., pp. 61-62 D.L.R.:

The disclosure statement does not tell a purchaser what is in the rules; it contains only a listing of general subject-matter. For example, it does not disclose that any losses, costs or damages incurred by the corporation by reason of any breach of the rules shall be paid by the owner and may be recovered in the same manner as common expenses. This includes any breach of the rules by any guests of the owner.

Rule 16 says: "No motor vehicle, other than a private passenger automobile, motorcycle or station wagon, shall be parked in any parking space". If a purchaser had a small trucking or delivery business, it would appear that the owner's parking space could not be used for a small truck or delivery van. The purchaser would not know this fact from reading the disclosure statement. . . .

Rule 22 states that any unit owner wishing to use the party or meeting room must first provide a refundable deposit "in such amount and upon such terms as may be determined by the Board or the manager in their sole discretion".

Rule 23 provides that children under the age of 16 are not permitted in the exercise rooms unless accompanied by a parent. This would be important information for a mother and father who both work and have children under 16. The children would like to use the exercise room after school and their parents would like them to be so occupied but they would not be able to use the facilities without a parent being present. Suppose a family has children under 16 and an older child age 18 or more. The purchaser should be informed about this rule to determine if it would be possible to amend the rule so that an adult other than a parent could be present with the children in the exercise room.

Both Rules 22 and 23 are conditions placed on the use of facilities. Those conditions are not disclosed in the disclosure statement. The absence of that disclosure is a breach of s. 52(6)(b) which requires the statement to contain "any conditions that apply to the provision of amenities".

The purchasers argue that there are many other equally significant provisions in the accompanying documents that ought to have been reproduced or reviewed in the disclosure statements. It may be observed that, like many of the items selected by the judge, many of these also relate to matters that are statutorily prescribed and cannot be waived or changed. Reference may, for instance, be made to ss. 6(4), 12(2), 15, 18, 19, 28, and 29 of the Act.

In Abdool, the purchasers complain that the disclosure statement fails to disclose, or inadequately discloses, such matters as these:

(i) that the exclusive use of parking spaces are designated according to the condominium plans as provided in Schedule F to the declaration;

(ii) that there are restrictions as to the use of visitor parking spaces by visitors only and that they cannot be used by the condominium corporation or by unit owners;

(iii) that the declaration provides that any owner leasing his unit shall not be relieved thereby from any of his obligations with respect to the unit;

(iv) that the declaration has a provision requiring an owner who leases his unit to furnish to the board of directors such owner's address and the name of the tenant;

(v) that the declaration has a provision which requires a tenant to deduct the defaulting unit owner's common expense contribution from rent payable to that unit owner;

(vi) that the declaration obligates a unit owner to maintain window sills and the exteriors of all windows accessible to his/her unit;

(vii) that the declaration, in addition to obligating the unit owner to reimburse the condominium corporation in full for the cost of any repairs made by the corporation that an owner is otherwise obligated to make, provides that such reimbursements includes [sic] any legal or collection costs incurred by the corporation in order to collect the costs of such repairs together with interest and that such amounts are deemed to be part of the common expenses and recoverable as such;

(viii) that the declaration provides that parking spaces shall be used only for the purpose of parking motor vehicles as defined in the rules;

(ix) that the provisions of the declaration with respect to indemnification, termination, and insurance are not disclosed or are insufficient;

(x) that the declaration requires the corporation to maintain a complete set of all the original as-built architectural and structural plans and specifications;

(xi) that the declaration provides that the corporation shall retain a key to all locks to each unit and that no locks shall be changed without providing the corporation with a key;

(xii) that the disclosure with respect to By-Law No. 1 is insufficient in that there is no narrative description of the significant features other than setting out certain general topics;

(xiii) that there is no narrative description of many significant features of the rules;

(xiv) that the disclosure statement fails to disclose the extensive duties of the manager as set out in the management agreement; and

(xv) that the disclosure statement fails to disclose the name of the insurance trustee or the portion of the units which the declarant intends to market in blocks of units to investors.

In Budinsky, the allegations of disclosure deficiencies run along the same line. The purchasers complain that the disclosure statement, again to take examples, is deficient in failing to disclose, or inadequately disclosing, such matters as these:

(i) that, although the disclosure statement states that the declaration provides that the declarant has the right to use and show any part of the common elements to any prospective purchasers as well as the right to store construction materials and equipment on the common elements until all units in the proposed corporation and the adjoining units have been completed and sold, the declaration provides merely that this right exist until such units have been completed and there is no mention of this right extending until such units have been sold;

(ii) that the disclosure statement fails to disclose the exclusive use portions of the common elements and merely refers readers to Schedule F of the declaration;

(iii) that the provision of the declaration which provides in effect that any losses, costs or damages incurred by the corporation by reason of any breach of any provision contained in the by-laws, rules or the declaration, by any unit owner, his family members, tenants, licensees, or invitees shall be borne and paid by such owner and shall comprise part of the common expenses of the unit, and that in the event of default in payment by the owner may be recovered by the corporation in the same manner as common expenses;

(iv) that the provisions of the declaration which provide that no unit shall be occupied or used in such a manner as to result in a cancellation or a threat of cancellation of any policy of insurance and that if the unit is so occupied or used, then the owner of such unit shall reimburse the corporation for such increase, and such increase in premium costs will be added to the owner's contribution towards the common expenses;

(v) the provisions of the declaration which require the owner of each unit to require all residents and visitors in or to its unit to comply with the Act, the declaration, the by-laws and the rules;

(vi) the disclosure statement fails to disclose the provisions of the declaration dealing with the use, maintenance, sale and lease of parking units including disclosure that the parking units may be used only and occupied only for the parking of private passenger automobiles, station wagon or motorcycle, that the owner of each parking unit must maintain such parking unit in a clean and tidy condition, that the parking units may not be sold or leased unless the purchaser or lessee is an owner, tenant or immediate family member of an owner or tenant residing in the corporation and the term of any lease of any parking unit to a tenant shall not exceed the term of the tenancy pursuant to the tenant occupying a unit in the building;

(vii) the disclosure statement fails to disclose the provisions of the declaration providing that following registration of the conveyance of the recreational unit to the condominium corporation the recreational unit cannot be mortgaged, charged or encumbered without the prior written consent of the other co-owners of the recreational unit and without prior proof of the majority [of] the owners of such corporation present at the meeting duly called for the purpose of obtaining such approval;

(viii) that the disclosure statement fails to disclose the types of insurance which the proposed condominium corporation is required to obtain and fails to disclose the types of insurance the unit owners may wish to obtain which are not required to be obtained by the corporation;

(ix) the various features of the by-laws including, no disclosure with respect to various features concerning meetings, the duties and powers of the corporation and the officers of the corporation; and

(x) that the disclosure statement is inadequate with respect to the significant features of the rules and regulations in that it only makes a brief mention of three general topics covered by the rules and regulations without any disclosure as to the significant features relating to such topics.

Wright J. did not discuss the nature of the standard to be applied in determining whether the particular by-laws and rules at pp. 288-92 O.R., pp. 58-62 D.L.R., ought to have been reviewed in detail in the disclosure statement. It appears clear, however, that he interpreted s. 52 as imposing an obligation to provide a detailed discussion of all the significant by-laws, articles and rules, regardless of the length and complexity of the disclosure statement that would result from the application of this approach. In his view, s. 52 imposes "stringent" disclosure requirements which necessitate the duplication of "a lot of the information" in the accompanying documents because that information may be of interest to particular purchasers. This approach became apparent in the course of his comments critical of the "the vague generalities" of the Act's disclosure provisions when he stated at p. 290 O.R., p. 60 D.L.R., that:

It is not adequate to simply require disclosure of "significant" features. Purchasers are sophisticated and unsophisticated. What would be a "significant" feature to one purchaser may be not at all "significant" to another purchaser. . . .

An entirely different approach to the legislation could be advanced due to the fact that the purchaser receives, with the disclosure statement, complete copies of the declaration, by-laws and rules of the corporation. It could be argued that the purchaser receives all of the required information and, therefore, it is not necessary that the disclosure statement duplicate a lot of the information. For that argument to be valid, the legislation requires amendment to make the requirements of the content of the disclosure statement much less stringent.

(Emphasis added)

While I may generally agree with the learned judge's critique of the legislation, I am unable to accept his approach to the current disclosure requirements. In my respectful opinion, this approach fails to construe s. 52 in a manner that properly balances consumer protection and the commercial realities of the condominium industry and, if adopted, would require a disclosure document incompatible with the underlying aim of the section.

The vagueness of the requirements and the absence of statutory guidelines mandate a broad and flexible approach -- not a rigid or stringent one -- in determining whether a given disclosure statement is adequate. As I indicated earlier, the disclosure statement cannot be viewed as separate from and unrelated to the other documents called for by s. 52(6) and (7); it must be seen in the context of the entire disclosure package. The narrative section of the disclosure statement can realistically be expected to do no more than highlight or summarize the most important features of the condominium documents and assist purchasers in comprehending those documents by directing them to the full text.

To require the inclusion of all of the details of the declaration, by-laws, rules and the like which the purchasers argue should be contained in the disclosure statement, and which the judgment of Wright J. would indeed require, would be to ignore the overall criteria of brevity, generality and significance and turn what was intended to be a short and comprehensible statement into a lengthy and legalistic document no more comprehensible to lay persons than the underlying documents themselves. To satisfy the standard of disclosure contended for in these appeals would effectively compel drafters of disclosure statements to reproduce or make reference to virtually all of the items in the accompanying documents or face the risk of having their agreements of purchase and sale declared non-binding. Professional advisers would face the additional risk of professional liability if the agreements were invalidated by reason of these items not being included in the disclosure statement.

Few current disclosure statements, I venture to say, could withstand the scrutiny to which it is argued here they must be subject. The resulting document would be a far cry from the one envisaged by the Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations when, in explaining s. 52 in committee on its introduction into the Act (Ontario Legislative Assembly, Standing Committee on the Administration of Justice, October 17, 1978), he said:

This is an attempt to make a disclosure statement meaningful in the sense that there is no point dumping a Xerox copy on them [the purchasers] at that stage and say here's what you are getting [bj96]Here we're talking about the disclosure statement which says to them in practical lay terms "This is what you're getting" . It's more akin to advertising or the holding out as to what they're getting.

If this is misleading, if the general description we're talking about is misleading, then of course they've got remedies flowing from misrepresentation or whatever.

(Emphasis added)

The disclosure statements in issue in these cases are carefully drawn documents, prepared, it would appear, with professional assistance, which on their face seek to address the requirements of the Act. There is no suggestion that either of them is false or designed to mislead or deceive a purchaser. They both provide a general description of the essential elements of the property, the proposed condominium and the recreational and other amenities. They also provide what is stated to be a brief narrative description of the significant features of the proposed declaration, by-laws and rules. Various provisions of the declaration such as common expenses, common elements, units, recreational unit, insurance, maintenance and repair are outlined in general terms. The by-laws and proposed rules are referred to and their general purpose and intent is made clear. Purchasers are advised that the narrative is merely a brief description or synopsis of the accompanying documents and are urged, more than once, to have recourse to those documents for their full text.

I cannot accept that the cumulative effect of the deficiencies complained of, many of which are plainly picayune, can render these disclosure statements so lacking in information that they are not disclosure statements at all. In my opinion, the statements adequately tell the purchasers "what they are getting". The disclosure statements cannot properly be faulted for failing to provide an analysis of the rights and duties of the condominium corporation or an analysis of the rights and duties of the purchasers as shareholders in the corporation, as the judgment below would, in effect, require. Nor can they be faulted for failing to duplicate the rules in their entirety or to make reference to all or substantially all of the rules. Purchasers are informed that there are proposed rules designed to promote the safety, security and welfare of the owners and to facilitate the orderly operation of the corporation. These rules are not unreasonable, unduly intrusive or unexpected. Purchasers must surely be taken to know that there must be rules of this nature governing this kind of communal living. If the purchasers have any interest in or concern about the rules, it is a simple matter to turn to the rules, probably the most easily understood of the condominium documents, as the disclosure statement specifically advises them to do.

While it appears to me that these disclosure statements, fairly read in the context of the disclosure package, cannot entitle the purchasers to a declaration that their agreements are not binding, given the basis upon which these appeals were presented, I do not think it necessary to put the court's imprimatur on the specific content of these particular statements. Putting the purchasers' position at its highest, they have not established the materiality of their complaint. There is nothing in these records to indicate that had the disclosure statements disclosed the information the purchasers contend should have been disclosed, or should have been more accurately or sufficiently disclosed, a reasonable purchaser would have regarded that information as sufficiently important to the decision to purchase that he or she would not have gone ahead with the transaction.

Indeed, there is no evidence that these purchasers would themselves have rescinded their agreements within the ten-day cooling off period had the disclosure statements contained the information which they allege was improperly omitted. Quite to the contrary, these statements played no part in the purchasers' decision to seek rescission. It is not suggested that their content, or lack of content, caused any purchaser to misunderstand the nature of his or her purchase or the effect of the condominium documents. Nor is it suggested that the disclosure statements prevented any purchaser from making an informed decision on whether to affirm or rescind his or her agreement. Indeed, it is clear that the purchasers' decision to seek rescission was prompted by declining real estate values, dissatisfaction with their purchases or a change in personal circumstances. The disclosure statements were in no way material to this decision.

As I noted earlier, most of these purchasers obtained legal advice before the expiry of the cooling off period and, prior to launching these applications, made no complaint about the form or content of the disclosure statements. In many cases, they had the units upgraded to their specifications and completed the interim closing. The evidence reveals, particularly in Budinsky, that having later decided that they no longer wished to go through with their contracts, they searched the disclosure statements for flaws with which to charge the developer. At this stage, the disclosure statement was of no importance to them other than as a vehicle to escape a transaction which, for reasons having nothing to do with disclosure, they wished to avoid. In the absence of evidence supporting a finding of materiality, no real question of consumer protection arises, and there is no proper basis for invoking the disclosure provisions of the Act to cancel binding agreements.

This brings me to the question of whether the developers in these cases are, as the purchasers allege, in breach of the requirements imposed by s. 52(2) to deliver "material amendments" to the disclosure statements.

Are the developers in these cases in breach of the requirements of s. 52(2) to deliver "material amendments" to the disclosure statements?

Section s. 52(1) makes reference to the delivery of "material amendments" to "the current disclosure statement"; and, where there has been a material amendment, s. 52(2) permits a purchaser to rescind the agreement of purchase and sale within ten days after receiving the material amendment. Obviously, not every amendment need be disclosed to ensure that the agreement of purchase and sale continues to bind the purchaser. The ten-day rescission period is revived only where there has been an amendment that is material. The term "material amendment" is not defined, nor is the time within which such an amendment must be delivered prescribed. It is clear, however, that s. 52(1) creates an ongoing disclosure obligation.

"Material amendment" was defined by Wright J. in Abdool, at p. 293 O.R., p. 62 D.L.R., as an amendment containing information which would provide a purchaser with a reasonable cause to reconsider whether to confirm the agreement of purchase and sale or to rescind.

and by Borins J., in Budinsky, at p. 281 O.R., p. 596 D.L.R., as an amendment to a disclosure statement is required when it is necessary to correct an error, omission or defect in the contents of the statement prescribed by s. 52(6) and (7) where the amendment is of such significance as to be likely to influence the decision of a reasonable purchaser to purchase the condominium unit or to alter the character of the disclosure statement.

I view the term "material amendment" as broad enough to include any change that should be reflected in the disclosure statement and would not limit it to the correction of errors, omissions or defects as Borins J. does. Subject to that reservation, the basic thrust of these approaches is essentially the same: the declarant must deliver an amended disclosure statement if the change would provide a purchaser reasonable cause to reconsider whether to confirm the agreement of purchase and sale or to rescind or, to the same effect, if the change is likely to influence the decision of a purchaser to purchase the condominium unit.

In the interests of consistency, I would determine the materiality of a change or amendment to the originally-delivered disclosure statement by reference to a test similar to that which I formulated earlier to determine the materiality of an alleged defect in a disclosure statement. Would a reasonable purchaser regard the change or amendment as sufficiently important to his or her decision to purchase that, had the disclosure statement contained the new or amended information at the time it was delivered, the purchaser would not likely have gone ahead with the transaction but would have rescinded the agreement within the ten-day period? If the answer to this question is in the affirmative, the developer is obliged to deliver an amendment to the disclosure statement and the purchaser has ten days from the date of delivery within which to rescind.

Amendments that substantially change a purchaser's anticipated use and enjoyment of the unit or the amenities associated therewith or that adversely affect the value of the unit, are, I would think, clearly material amendments that revive the rescission period. A reasonable purchaser could objectively assert that he or she would not have proceeded with the deal had this information been available at the time of the original disclosure statement. However, given the lifestyle aspects of condominium living, there may well be situations in which the individual circumstances of a particular purchaser may render an amendment which is not material to other purchasers, and which indeed may be acceptable to other purchasers in a given project, none the less material to this purchaser. The extent to which subjective considerations may reasonably be asserted in determining the materiality of the new or amended information is not before the court in these appeals and need not be considered. Nor is it necessary to consider the applicability of the principles of waiver or estoppel when a purchaser seeks to rescind on the basis of an undelivered material amendment of which the purchaser has had actual knowledge.

The purchasers here contend that two events occurred which were material and, therefore, required the delivery of amended disclosure statements: (1) the delay in the anticipated date of completion of the amenities stated in the disclosure statement; and (2) the registration of numerous notices of construction lien and certificates of action against the property, the disclosure of which, they argued, is required by s. 52(7)(g).

With respect to the delay in construction, Wright J. found that a major change in the construction schedule of recreational amenities constituted material information requiring delivery of an amendment to the purchasers. In contrast, Borins J. found that, the change in the anticipated date for completion of the amenities does not constitute a material amendment. He stated at p. 281 O.R., p. 596 D.L.R.:

Delays in the construction of a condominium complex are not unusual and occur for many reasons and to require a developer to deliver an amended disclosure statement with each change in the construction schedule for the amenities, thereby reviving the purchaser's right to rescind the contract, is not what is intended by the Act. There is no evidence to suggest that any of the applicants has suffered any economic loss as a result of the delay in completing the amenities nor is there any evidence that this delay has had any adverse effect on the value of what they have agreed to purchase and, therefore, cannot be said to be likely to influence the decision of a purchaser to purchase the condominium unit.

On the question of the construction liens and certificates of action, Wright J. held that these registrations were properly classified as material amendments and the purchasers should accordingly have been provided with this information. Borins J., again to the contrary, held that it would be unreasonable and contrary to commercial reality to require a developer to deliver an amendment at the time of registration of each construction lien, whether or not it is ultimately enforceable, vacated and regardless of the amount involved.

In my respectful view, neither of these events can properly be described as "material amendments" and invoked to revive the purchaser's right of rescission. Carrying the purchasers' argument to its conclusion, this right would be revived each time a construction lien or certificate of action is registered against title and each time there is a delay in the scheduled date for completion of the amenities. In my view, the Act cannot have intended a result so out of keeping with the recognized realities of the construction industry. The likelihood, if not the inevitability, of delays in construction for reasons which may be beyond the control of the developer, and which are commonly governed by standard building contract provisions, is manifest. So also is the likelihood of disputes with contractors, subcontractors and others that may give rise to lien claims. Consumer protection does not require that developers be denied any flexibility in these matters or that their contractual relationships be disrupted or destabilized in the event of these commonplace occurrences. In my opinion, the Act is not designed to produce that result.

With respect to changes in the anticipated date for completion of the amenities, for these reasons, and those of Borins J., I would not give effect to this submission. I might add that this conclusion does not, of course, preclude a claim for damages due to delay pursuant to s. 52(5) or any claim that the purchaser, as a matter of general contract law, may have under the agreement of purchase and sale. I am dealing here only with the Condominium Act. The agreement of purchase and sale, it must be remembered, remains the primary document governing the rights and obligations of the parties.

In so far as the submission with respect to the liens is concerned, the Act cannot be construed to require delivery of an amended disclosure statement upon registration of a lien or certificate of action. Section 57(7)(g) requires disclosure only of "pending lawsuits material to the property". Construction liens are not material to the property in the sense contemplated by the section. Unlike lawsuits involving an easement or right of way over the property or a claim to ownership of a part of the property, lien proceedings can have no effect on the condominium corporation or on the purchaser's interest in the property after final closing. The vendor is bound to provide clear title on final closing and, accordingly, must vacate any liens or certificates of action registered against title by that date. If they are not vacated, the purchaser may refuse to close irrespective of the provisions of this Act, and is free to assert his or her contractual rights under the agreement of purchase and sale.

I turn now to the additional issues in these appeals.

The Additional Issues in the Abdool Case

1. Was Prenor a declarant under the Condominium Act or a mortgagee in possession?

It will be recalled that the appellant Prenor Equity Inc. is a mortgagee of the Royal Ascot property pursuant to the terms of a mortgage granted by Somerset to Prenor as security for a substantial loan advanced by Prenor. The mortgage (and I include in that term the debenture which was given to Prenor as additional security together with the mortgage) provides, inter alia, that any receiver or receiver-manager appointed by Prenor in the event of Somerset's default shall have the power to take possession of the property and to carry on the business of Somerset. The mortgage further provides that in exercising any powers under the mortgage, the receiver shall act as the agent for Somerset and that Prenor shall not be responsible for the receiver's actions.

Following Somerset's default, on November 22, 1990, Prenor appointed Retail Engineering as receiver-manager of the project. Retail Engineering, with funds advanced by Prenor, proceeded to complete the project. As already noted, the condominium was in fact registered shortly after the judgment in appeal was issued.

Wright J. found that Prenor was a declarant under the Act and therefore, in his view, "stands in the place of the vendor, Somerset, and assumes all the rights and liabilities of the vendor". On this basis, he held that Prenor was obliged to honour Somerset's agreements with the purchasers, which included: (a) reducing the mortgage interest component of the occupancy fee paid by each purchaser based upon the difference between the rate actually used in the calculation of the occupancy fee (15.49%) and the mortgage rate effective 90 days prior to the unit transfer date; (b) providing a courtesy van for the condominium corporation; and (c) supply appropriate furniture for the lobby of the building. Further, the purchasers were granted judgment entitling them to recover as against Prenor the amount of their deposits plus accrued interest, the amounts expended by them in upgrading their respective units, and the entire mortgage interest component of the monthly occupancy fees paid by them after November 22, 1990.

In determining whether Prenor was a declarant under the Act, the judge asked himself: "is Prenor a mortgagee in possession, and therefore, an owner, and, therefore, a declarant?" The answer to this question depends primarily on the definitions provided by the Act. Section 1(1)(l) defines "declarant" as "the owner or owners in fee simple of the land described in the description at the time of registration of a declaration and description of the land, and includes any successor or assignee of such owner". "Owner" is defined in s. 1(1)(q) as "the owner or owners of the freehold estate or estates in a unit and common interest, but does not include a mortgagee unless in possession". The judge concluded that Prenor was in fact a mortgagee in possession and, hence, an owner and declarant and, as such, subject to all of the rights and liabilities of Somerset.

With respect, Prenor could not be an owner within the meaning of the Act or, it follows, a declarant. To be an "owner", it is not sufficient that Prenor simply be a mortgagee in possession, rather it must be a mortgagee in possession of the "freehold estate or estates in a unit". Given the definition of a "unit" in s. 1(1)(z), which is a part or parts of the land included in the description and designated as a unit by the description and comprises the space enclosed by its boundaries and all the material parts of the land within this space in accordance with the declaration and description.

Prenor could not be a mortgagee or a mortgagee in possession of a "unit" before registration of the declaration and description. This definition makes it manifest, and indeed it was not argued otherwise, that the definition of "owner" is applicable only to the post-registration period. Since registration had not been effected at the time relevant to this application, Prenor could not have been an owner of a freehold estate in a unit, or a declarant, even if it were a mortgagee in possession of the property. During this pre-registration stage, the units were "proposed units", as defined by s. 1(1)(t).

In my opinion, Prenor was not, in any event, a mortgagee in possession, and did not become one by virtue of its appointment of Retail Engineering as the receiver-manager of the mortgaged property. The effect of the appointment was to divest the debtor company's board of directors of its power to deal with the property comprised in the appointment: see Elan Corp. v. Comiskey (1990), 1 O.R. (3d) 289, 41 O.A.C. 282 (C.A.), at pp. 298 and 314 O.R., pp. 287-88 and 299 O.A.C. Those formerly in management and control of Somerset were effectively removed from that position. Somerset remains in existence but management and control is vested in the receiver-manager. For some purposes, notwithstanding the provision that the receiver is to be deemed the agent of the debtor and not the security holder, Retail Engineering may properly be regarded as the agent for the security holder. In particular, it may be so regarded for the purpose of conferring title on a purchaser free of encumbrances in order to realize the security: see Peat Marwick Ltd. v. Consumers' Gas Co. (1980), 29 O.R. (2d) 336, 113 D.L.R. (3d) 754 (C.A.).

However, in carrying on the company's business and completing the project, Retail Engineering acts, in accordance with the terms of the security, as agent for Somerset. As receiver, it is empowered to deal with third parties with whom the company has a contractual relationship, to complete existing agreements and to enforce the completion of existing agreements, all on the company's behalf so as to enable the security holder to realize on the security. The receiver will, of course, be subject to the same rights and liabilities under the terms of the agreements as the company: see generally, Kerr on Receivers, 17th ed. (1989), at pp. 372-81; Bennett, Receiverships (1985), at pp. 19-21 and 113-15.

For these reasons, I am of the opinion that the judge erred in holding that Prenor is a mortgagee in possession and a declarant under the Condominium Act and, as such, subject to the rights and liabilities of Somerset. If Prenor was found to stand in the place of Somerset under the agreements on the basis of novation, as was suggested in argument, there is no evidentiary foundation for such a finding.

2. Was there any basis upon which an abatement of the purchasers' interim occupancy fee or rent could be ordered?

On this issue, Wright J. concluded that the purchasers who took interim occupancy should be required "to pay only an amount for reasonable `rent' because they have been in effect tenants." He assessed the "rent" at an amount equal to "the estimated realty taxes plus the common expenses". The purchasers were accordingly held entitled to a refund of all the mortgage interest component of the monthly occupancy fee.

I am respectfully unable to find any basis for assessing occupancy rent in this manner. Accepting, without deciding, that the purchasers had paid an occupancy fee that was not "commensurate with a completed `prestigious' building with the promised amenities" and were entitled to compensation for "the many hassles and anxieties they have had to endure", there is no evidence to support the conclusion that a reasonable rent or market value rent for the premises is an amount equal to the estimated realty taxes plus the common expenses or, put another way, an amount equal to the monthly occupancy fee less the mortgage interest component thereof. The only evidence with respect to occupancy rent is the evidence of the amount actually agreed to by the parties. Under their agreements, the occupancy fee was, in effect, to be calculated in accordance with s. 51(6) of the Act.

Moreover, compensation for these problems cannot properly be set by reference to the mortgage interest component of the occupancy fee. There is, quite simply, no relationship between the two. The vendor's entitlement to the mortgage interest component was in issue in this application, but not in the context of a claim for compensation arising out of the problems caused by delays in completion of the promised amenities or inadequate maintenance services. A refund of this component of the occupancy fee was sought, pursuant to the decision in Albrecht v. Opemoco Inc. (1989), 70 O.R. (2d) 151, 61 D.L.R. (4th) 594 (H.C.J.), on the ground that the phantom mortgages provided for in the agreements of purchase and sale were invalid and mortgage interest could not, therefore, properly be included in the occupancy fee. This issue, however, was adjourned on agreement between the parties pending the appeal from the Albrecht decision to this court. In reducing the occupancy fee as he did, the judge, for all practical purposes, rendered the adjourned question moot. He indirectly granted the purchasers a monetary judgment that, in light of this court's subsequent decision in Albrecht at (1991), 5 O.R. (3d) 385, 85 D.L.R. (4th) 289, reversing the above-noted judgment, they could not have obtained on the basis that their claim for the return of this component of the occupancy fee was advanced.

I should perhaps note Prenor's concession to the effect that Somerset's agreement to reduce the mortgage interest component paid by each purchaser by the difference between the rate actually used in the calculation of the occupancy fee and the mortgage rate effective 90 days prior to the unit transfer date is a liability of Somerset for which the receiver is responsible on final closing.

Finally, several other issues were raised by the purchasers which I do not propose to detail. These issues were not referred to or dealt with by Wright J. In my opinion, none of them provide a basis for declaring the agreements of purchase and sale non-binding or entitling the purchasers to any other relief.

The Additional Issues in the Budinsky Case

1. Were any purchasers charged an occupancy fee based upon a mortgage interest component which exceeded the legally permissible rate prescribed by s. 52(6)(l) of the Act and, if so, is the developer obliged to repay such overpayments with interest?

This question was dealt with by Borins J. at pp. 282-83 O.R., pp. 597-98 D.L.R., of his judgment. I agree with those reasons and would only add that, given that interest rates can be expected to fluctuate, in my opinion interest should not be payable on either an overpayment or underpayment of the mortgage interest component whichever may turn out to be the case in any given transaction.

2. Does the developer's failure to register the condominium and close the agreements of purchase and sale entitle the purchasers to rescission?

This issue was not dealt with by Borins J. because, the respondent states, it was not part of the purchasers' original application. From my examination of the record, this appears to be the case. While s. 51 of the Act is referred to in the application, the material filed does not provide any evidence in support of a claim for rescission on the basis of that section or on the basis of the agreement. Accordingly, effect cannot be given to this submission. It also becomes unnecessary to decide whether the purchasers can, in any event, validly complain about the timeliness of registration in the circumstances of this case when they have manifested no willingness to close their transactions but have instead engaged in proceeding designed to avoid closing, which proceedings may in themselves hamper or delay the declarant's ability to effect registration.

3. The deposit interest rate issue

This issue arises by reason of the respondent's cross-appeal contesting Borins J.'s decision on the question of the interest payable to purchasers pursuant to s. 53(3) of the Act and s. 33 of Reg. 121. For the reasons of this court in Ackland v. Yonge-Esplanade Enterprises Ltd., delivered contemporaneous with these reasons [see p. 97, ante], the cross-appeal will be dismissed.

DISPOSITION In the result, I would allow the appeal in Abdool with costs, set aside the order of Wright J., and in place thereof order that the application be dismissed with costs. There will be no costs to the intervener.

In Budinsky, I would dismiss the appeal with costs. The order of Borins J. will be varied by setting aside paras. 1, 2 and 3 and in place thereof an order will go dismissing the application. The cross-appeal will be dismissed without costs.

Orders accordingly.

Carleton Condominium Corporation No. 347 v. Trendsetter Developments Ltd., Assaly and Thomas C. Assaly Corp.

9 O.R. (3d) 481

Action No. 626/91 Court of Appeal for Ontario, Robins, McKinlay and Arbour JJ.A. August 27, 1992

APPEAL from an order of the General Division (1991), 4 O.R. (3d) 300, 20 R.P.R. (2d) 9, declaring that the appellants could not vote at a meeting of unit owners of a condominium corporation.

Colin D. McKinnon, Q.C., and Kathryn Sabo, for appellants.

Janice B. Payne, for respondents.

The judgment of the court was delivered by

MCKINLAY J.A.:--The appellants, Trendsetter Developments Limited (Trendsetter), Thomas C. Assaly and Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. (Assaly Corp.), appeal a decision of the Ontario Court (General Division) dated July 22, 1991 wherein Isaac J., sitting in motions court, declared that the appellants Thomas C. Assaly and Assaly Corp. are not entitled to vote at meetings of unit owners of the Carleton Condominium Corporation No. 347 (the condominium) in their capacity as unit owners, and that the appellant Assaly Corp., as mortgagee, is not entitled to exercise a mortgagee's right to vote pursuant to s. 48 of the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 84 (now R.S.O. 1990, c. C.26) (the Act) [see (1991), 4 O.R. (3d) 300, 20 R.P.R. (2d) 9]. The decision of the motions court judge has been stayed pending appeal. Two applications were heard together, but only Application 52779/91 is the subject of this appeal.

The condominium was incorporated pursuant to the Condominium Act by registration by Trendsetter of a declaration and description on August 29, 1986. The property involved is a high-rise condominium in the City of Ottawa, known as the Kent Towers, which contains 219 residential units and seven commercial units. From its inception, the project was intended to be a mixed residential and commercial building. The appellant Trendsetter was amalgamated with Assaly Corp. on September 1, 1988, pursuant to the Business Corporations Act, 1982, S.O. 1982, c. 4 (now R.S.O. 1990, c. B.16), and was continued under the name Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. (Assaly Corp.). Thomas C. Assaly is the president and controlling shareholder of Assaly Corp.

Assaly Corp. owns two residential and seven commercial units in Kent Towers. One residential unit was obtained by foreclosure and the other as a result of a breach of the aunits are provided for in the declaration of the condominium, and are subject to its provisions as well as to the provisions of the Act. Each investor was aware of the intention to have commercial units.

At the time of trial, Assaly Corp. held virtually all of the second and third mortgages registered against the condominium units. Each of the Assaly Corp. mortgages contains a clause permitting the mortgagee to exercise the unit owner's right to vote. A trust company holds first mortgages on all units, payment of which is guaranteed by Assaly Corp. Those mortgages also provide for exercise by the mortgagee of the unit owner's right to vote. There was some dispute during argument as to the number of mortgages held by Assaly Corp. at the time of the appeal hearing; however, neither counsel was able to provide adequate information as to the precise holdings. Counsel were informed by the court that this appeal would be decided on the basis that Assaly Corp. held in excess of 15 per cent of the junior mortgages on the units -- a fact agreed to at the time of the hearing before the motions court judge.

Thomas C. Assaly personally owns 53 residential units, and it is not disputed that those units were purchased by him at fair market value. A majority of the other units are owned by individual investors who take advantage of the substantial tax benefits of ownership, as does Thomas C. Assaly with respect to his 53 units. Very few units are owner-occupied.

At the material time, the board of directors of the condominium were Gayle Duggan, Taxiarchis (Mike) Chatzipantazis, Thomas G. Assaly, Ashwin Shingadia and Gillian Brown, all of whom own residential units in the building. Thomas G. Assaly is the son of Thomas C. Assaly, and is employed by the Assaly group of companies.

Thomas C. Assaly has a controlling interest in Assaly Holdings Ltd., which in turn has a controlling interest in both Assaly Corp. and in a company called Asgo Management Ltd. (Asgo). Asgo became the manager of the condominium for a term of five years from October 15, 1986 by virtue of a management agreement entered into between Asgo and Trendsetter at a time when Trendsetter, as developer, was owner of 100 per cent of the units. Thomas C. Assaly makes all significant decisions on behalf of Assaly Corp. and on behalf of Asgo.

THE DISPUTE

In the spring of 1991 a dispute arose among the directors with respect to the future management of the condominium. The majority of the board of directors, consisting of Duggan, Chatzipantazis and Shingadia, were of the view that the management contract with Asgo should not be renewed on its expiry on October 14, 1991. Assaly and Brown were in favour of renewal of the Asgo contract, Brown proposing that she be hired as salaried managing director.

By letter dated June 7, 1991 Assaly Corp., in its capacity as mortgagee of no less than 15 per cent of the units, wrote to unit owners enclosing a notice, pursuant to s. 18(2) of the Act, of a special meeting of owners to remove Duggan, Chatzipantazis and Shingadia from the board of directors because they did not support the renewal of the Asgo agreement. It also sent to owners a notice indicating its intention to exercise the voting rights of all units against which it held mortgages. There was a dispute between counsel on the appeal as to whether Assaly Corp. at that time held mortgage security over at least 15 per cent of the units. As stated above, counsel were unable to satisfy us as to the then current status of the mortgages, and thus we are dealing with the issues on appeal as if Assaly Corp. does in fact hold mortgages over 15 per cent of the units. Assaly Corp. had two reasons for calling the meeting of unit owners: first, it wished the renewal of the Asgo management contract, which was a profitable one, on its expiry on October 14, 1991; and second, it did not want to jeopardize the renewal of contracts which Asgo held with individual unit owners to manage their particular units.

Mr. Thomas C. Assaly, in cross-examination on his affidavit filed in the proceedings, stated that the appellants wished to maintain control over the management of the property to produce the best possible results for all investors. Gayle Duggan, in her filed affidavit, stated that the board of directors had encountered difficulties in dealing with Asgo as the condominium manager, particularly when Asgo or the appellant found themselves in a position adverse to the respondent.

THE ISSUES

Four issues were argued on appeal:

- (i) whether Thomas C. Assaly, as shareholder of the developer, could be a bona fide unit owner of condominium units under the Condominium Act ;
 - (ii) whether Thomas C. Assaly's position as controlling shareholder of Assaly Corp. imposes a fiduciary duty upon him which prohibits him from exercising a right to vote as unit owner;
 - (iii) whether Assaly Corp. is under a fiduciary duty which prohibits it from exercising its right to vote as unit owner; and
 - (iv) whether Assaly Corp. as mortgagee of a majority of the units of the condominium is entitled to vote under s. 48 of the Condominium Act?
- (i) Controlling shareholder of declarant as bona fide owner of condominium units

The learned motions court judge held that Thomas C. Assaly was not entitled to vote at the meeting called by the mortgagee. At p. 34 of his reasons [p. 317 O.R., pp. 26-27 R.P.R.], he stated as follows:

The principles laid down in cases such as York Condominium No. 167, Peel Condominium Corp. No. 199, and Carleton Condominium Corp. No. 279 , supra, are, first, that the Act was intended to benefit unit owners who are bona fide purchasers, secondly, that declarants and their successors and assignees stand in a fiduciary relationship to unit owners, and finally, that they may not use their positions to further their own economic interests at the expense of bona fide unit owners.

The decision by Thomas C. Assaly Corporation Ltd. to invoke the machinery of s. 18(2) of the Act in order to remove from office the majority directors of the board because they had the temerity to vote against renewal of the management agreement with Asgo Management Limited is, in my respectful view, nothing short of a massive use of its position to further its own economic advantage. This is the type of conduct which Carruthers J., in a different factual context, excoriated in Peel Condominium Corp. No. 199, supra, and I find it no less reprehensible here.

It follows from the foregoing that I accept the submissions of Mr. Davidson for the applicant that Thomas C. Assaly is not entitled to vote at the meeting.

The first and third principles referred to above involve the question of whether or not Thomas C. Assaly is a bona fide purchaser of his 53 units. The second principle relates to his position as the controlling mind of Assaly Corp. and of Asgo.

It is not disputed that Thomas C. Assaly paid fair market value for the units which he purchased in his personal capacity. The appellant argues that because he paid fair market value he is a bona fide purchaser within the terms of the Act, stating that s. 1(1)(1) refers to a "bona fide purchaser" as one "who actually pays fair market value". That is not a completely accurate reference to s. 1(1)(1). The section defines a "declarant" as follows:

(1) "declarant" means the owner or owners in fee simple of the land described in the description at the time of registration of a declaration and description of the land, and includes any successor or assignee of such owner or owners but does not include a bona fide purchaser of a unit who actually pays fair market value or any successor or assignee of such purchaser . . . It is clear from that provision that, for any successor or assignee of the "declarant" to be exempt from the statutory obligations of a declarant, he must not only pay fair market value, but he must also be a bona fide purchaser. As stated above, payment of fair market value is not in issue in this case. However, the question whether Thomas C. Assaly was a bona fide purchaser is one of some difficulty. Although the motions court judge did not address the issue directly, it appears from his conclusions that he was of the view that Thomas C. Assaly could not be a bona fide purchaser because of his position in Assaly Corp. and in Asgo. He also appears to have considered that the calling of a meeting of unit holders by Assaly Corp. as mortgagee, pursuant to s. 18(2) of the Act, could be attributed to Thomas C. Assaly in his personal capacity. He relied on the decisions in Peel Condominium Corp. No. 199 v. Sanrose Construction (Dixie) Ltd. (1989), 68 O.R. (2d) 513, 5 R.P.R. (2d) 70 (H.C.J.); York Condominium Corp. No. 167 v. Newrey Holdings Ltd. (1981), 32 O.R. (2d) 458, 122 D.L.R. (3d) 280 (C.A.); and Carleton Condominium Corp. No. 279 v. Rochon (1987), 59 O.R. (2d) 545, 38 D.L.R. (4th) 430 (C.A.).

The Sanrose decision involved the failure of a developer to sell 57 out of 270 units in the Fairways condominium development in Mississauga in accordance with the requirements of s. 51(1)(b) of the Act, which requires sale by a declarant "without delay". In that case, the units left unsold were owned by the declarant corporation, by two individual defendants who were the individuals behind the original development plan, and also by other "persons or entities" with whom they had a "connection or association". However, the question at issue in our case -- whether persons who have purchased units in their individual capacity must be treated in the same way under the Act as corporate declarants controlled by them -- was one that it was unnecessary to decide in the Sanrose case.

The declaration in Sanrose contained the following provision:

No person or company or persons or companies acting in consort or under common control shall be allowed to buy more than 1% of the total number of units.

No such provision is found in the declaration in this case. In Sanrose, the trial judge made several statements as to the intent of the Act and the intent of the declaration and by-laws of the condominium involved, but all were made in the context of the declarant's statutory duty to sell, and the above-quoted provision in the Sanrose declaration.

In the Rochon case, this court considered whether a private arrangement made between the purchaser of a unit and the declarant, prior to the sale of all of the units, was binding upon other purchasers -- a substantially different situation from the one before us.

In that case, Finlayson J.A. stated [at p. 554 O.R., p. 439 D.L.R.]: "He (the declarant) can never be a bona fide purchaser of a unit and it is these 'unit owners' that the Condominium Act is intended to protect." Although that is a reasonable interpretation of the Act, it does not answer the question whether the controlling shareholder of a corporate declarant can become a bona fide purchaser of a unit.

Cases were cited to us addressing the issue whether a purchaser of particular property was a bona fide purchaser for value. I do not consider those cases to be of assistance in resolving the issue in this case. They arise most frequently in the context of alleged fraudulent conveyances and negotiable instrument cases. One question common to both is whether or not true value was paid for the conveyance or the bill. The second is, in the fraudulent conveyance cases, whether the intent of the transfer was to defraud, hinder, or delay creditors of the transferor and, in the negotiable instrument cases, whether the holder of the bill took with any notice of defect in title of previous holders. The context is substantially different in cases dealing with the statutory scheme established under the Condominium Act. In my view, once the payment of fair market value is determined, s. 1(1)(1) of the Act requires a further determination of whether the transaction was a true sale rather than merely a transfer to a nominee, and whether there was any underlying intent which would be inimical to the purposes of the Act.

It was argued by the respondent that where, as here, the purchaser is one and the same person as the controlling mind of the corporate declarant, the transaction is a mere sham to avoid the deemed covenant in s. 51(1)(b) of the Act that the declarant will "take all reasonable steps to sell the other residential units included in the property without delay". Such an interpretation of the Act would go much further than the common law of this province in piercing the corporate veil, and would preclude any developer controlling a closely held corporation from purchasing units in a condominium developed by that corporation, regardless of the purpose of the purchase.

Thomas C. Assaly purchased his units for investment purposes, and for the tax advantage which he could derive personally from their purchase -- the same reasons why most other owners purchased their units. The evidence indicates additional reasons for Mr. Assaly's purchases, not necessarily shared by other unit owners. These were the stabilization of prices of the units in the project, and the furthering of the interests of Asgo in maintaining its management contracts. There is no evidence that he acted as a mere nominee of Assaly Corp. in purchasing his units.

The remaining question is whether there are any facts in this case which indicate any underlying intent on the part of Mr. Assaly which would be inimical to the purposes of the Act. One of the main objectives of the Act is to place control of the condominium in the hands of the owners at the earliest possible date. However, nothing in the Act prohibits any individual from owning a sufficient number of units in the project to put him in control. Such a prohibition could be written into the declaration, as was done in the Sanrose case, but that was not done in this case. In any event, ownership of 53 out of 219 residential units does not of itself constitute control.

I see no facts surrounding his purchase of residential units which would preclude Thomas C. Assaly from exercising a vote as bona fide owner of each of his units.

(ii) Does the controlling shareholder of a declarant owe a fiduciary duty to owners, and if so, does that duty prohibit him from exercising a right to vote as unit owner?

The respondent takes the position that Thomas C. Assaly owes a fiduciary duty to the owners of units in the condominium as a result of his being the controlling mind of the declarant, and must, therefore, act in their interests alone when their interests are in conflict with his own. The only condominium case cited for that proposition was the decision of this court in York Condominium Corp. No. 167 v. Newrey Holdings Ltd., supra. The relevant portion of that decision involved extra parking spaces remaining after parking spaces had been allocated to all residential units in the project. The developer declarant, prior to the registration of the declaration, proposed to sell the extra parking spaces and retain the proceeds. Its position was that, although the extra spaces were part of the common elements, they remained the property of the developer until registration of the declaration and could be disposed of by it at will. Wilson J.A., writing for the court, stated at p. 467 O.R., p. 289 D.L.R.:

With respect, I can see no reason why as a matter of simple contract law the parties cannot contract with reference to the Act and declaration prior to the registration of the declaration and in anticipation of its registration. Indeed, I think they must be taken to have done so where units in a condominium project are sold prior to registration since the condominium is substantially a creature of statute. It would be wholly unreal to view those transactions as agreements for the sale of separate pieces of real estate. This being so, I think the Court may look, and indeed must look, to the provisions of the Act and the declaration in determining the rights of the parties under the agreements of purchase and sale. I think they must also look to the general law of real property as to the status of a purchaser once his offer has been accepted. I do not think the position of the owner-developer remains unchanged after he starts to sell units. I think that at that point he has committed the character of the project to that of condominium under the Act and declaration. I think he has also placed himself in a fiduciary relationship to the unit purchasers not only with respect to their units but also with respect to the interests appurtenant thereto. He therefore holds the property in trust for the unit purchasers, present and prospective, and for the condominium corporation which will come into being upon registration of the declaration. I believe he is under a duty to protect the interests of all unit owners, present and prospective, and cannot put his own interests in conflict with theirs even although he himself continues to be an owner as long as any units remain unsold.

That decision supports the extension of principles of real property contract law to contracts involving the purchase of condominium units. I see nothing in the words quoted that indicates the imposition of a fiduciary duty upon a person who is himself a bona fide purchaser of units. Had an individual, owning a controlling interest in a condominium management corporation unconnected to the declarant, purchased the same number of units as Mr. Assaly, I cannot conceive of any voting issue being raised. I see no reason to treat Mr. Assaly differently from such a purchaser.

However, even if Mr. Assaly were subject to a fiduciary duty, it would not preclude his voting at meetings of unit holders. It would merely require that, in so doing, he vote in the interests of all unit holders, since it would be to all that he owed the duty, and not to a few. It is quite possible in this case that Mr. Assaly's interests correspond to those of the unit holders as a whole. There is no evidence of the views or interests of the unit holders as a group; the evidence merely indicates the opinion of some of the directors that Mr. Assaly would not vote in the interests of all unit holders.

Two potentially conflicting considerations are of importance in dealing with condominiums -- the first, that condominiums are creatures of statute, and courts should be cautious about reading into the statute rights and duties which the legislature did not see fit to include; and the second, that condominium corporations, unlike business corporations, are made up of individuals who make their homes in the premises operated by the corporation, or whose tenants do, and the fate of the corporation is of vital importance to them in their everyday lives. The efficient operation of the building is in Mr. Assaly's interests, as well as in the interests of the other owners. It is my view, on the facts of this case, that Mr. Assaly does not owe a fiduciary duty to other unit holders, and can vote in any way he chooses as the bona fide purchaser of 53 residential units. However, in so stating, I wish to make it clear that, in assessing situations such as this, one must look carefully at the facts. For example, if Mr. Assaly had purchased sufficient units to effect control of shareholders' meetings, the court might take a different view of the issue of fiduciary duty.

(iii) Does Assaly Corp. owe a fiduciary duty to unit owners which prohibits it from voting at meetings of unit owners?

The appellant concedes that a fiduciary duty is owed by the Assaly Corp. as declarant with respect to unsold residential units. Assaly Corp. owns two residential units -- one obtained as a result of a breach of an agreement of purchase and sale by an investor, and the other by foreclosure under a mortgage held by it.

Section 51(1)(b) of the Act states:

51(1) Every agreement of purchase and sale entered into by a proposed declarant for a proposed unit for residential purposes shall be deemed to contain,

(b) a covenant by the vendor to take all reasonable steps to sell the other residential units included in the property without delay other than any units mentioned in a statement under clause 54(1)(c) . . .

That provision does not cease to be effective merely because an agreement of purchase and sale has been aborted. The declarant continues to be bound by the deemed covenant to sell the unit involved "without delay". There can be no doubt on the facts of this case that the declarant has not fulfilled that covenant and, consequently, is subject to a fiduciary duty which precludes it from voting with respect to that unit other than in the interests of the unit owners as a whole.

Different considerations apply to the residential unit which was obtained as a result of mortgage foreclosure. Before Assaly Corp. took mortgage security over that unit, it had fulfilled the covenant to sell, and was no longer subject to any fiduciary obligation. Following default under the mortgage and subsequent foreclosure, it became owner not through its capacity as declarant, but as mortgagee; thus it would become a bona fide purchaser for value of the unit, and have the same right to vote as any other unit owner.

Commercial units, of which Assaly Corp. owns seven, are treated differently under the Act. The deemed covenant to sell under s. 51(1)(b) is limited specifically to residential units. The declaration does not stipulate that the commercial units be sold. On the contrary, purchasers of residential units would have been aware of the existence of commercial units, and should have anticipated the likelihood of their retention by the declarant for commercial rental purposes. I see no reason, pursuant to the statute or otherwise, why the declarant should not be at liberty to vote as owner of the commercial units.

(iv) Right of junior mortgagee to vote pursuant to s. 48 of the Act

Assaly Corp., at the time of trial, held virtually all second and third mortgages of the condominium units. As stated above, it is assumed for the purposes of these reasons that it held mortgage security over at least 15 per cent of the units, which entitled it, pursuant to s. 18(2) of the Act, to call a meeting of the owners of the condominium corporation at any time, subject only to the provisions of s. 48 of the Act, which reads:

48. Where a mortgage of a unit and common interest contains a provision that authorizes the mortgagee to exercise the right of the owner to vote or to consent, the mortgagee may exercise the right, and, where two or more such mortgages contain such a provision, the right may be exercised by the mortgagee who has priority.

The mortgages held by Assaly Corp. in this case do contain a provision authorizing the mortgagee of the unit to vote. The motions court judge concluded that Assaly Corp. was not entitled to vote the units over which it held mortgage security. In doing so, he stated: first, that he was following the decision of Philp J. in Keyes v. Metropolitan Toronto Condominium Corp. No. 876 (1990), 73 O.R. (2d) 568, 11 R.P.R. (2d) 169 (H.C.J.); second, that he was following the principles laid down in the decisions cited earlier in these reasons; and third, that the intent of the Act indicated that Assaly Corp. as mortgagee should not be entitled to vote.

The motions court judge did not elaborate on his second and third reasons. However, I find nothing in the cases referred to earlier which in any way clarifies the issue of a mortgagee's voting rights. Nor do I see anything in the Act which would indicate that a mortgagee, which also happens to be a declarant, is, therefore, precluded from exercising its statutory rights as mortgagee.

The issue of a mortgagee's right to vote was addressed by Philp J. in the Keyes case. He stated that the purpose of s. 48 of the Act was to protect the rights of mortgagees, who have an investment in the mortgaged units and, following the unreported decision of Krever J. in Mann v. Canada Mortgage & Housing Corp., Ont. H.C.J., released May 21, 1982, held that the right of the mortgagee to vote in no way depends upon default under the mortgage. I am in complete agreement with that portion of the decision in Keyes and the reasoning on which it is based.

Philp J. went on in Keyes to consider the rights of junior mortgagees to vote in a situation where a first mortgagee does not avail itself of the opportunity. On that issue, he stated, at p. 579 O.R., p. 181 R.P.R.:

The words of s. 48 speak only of the right being exercised by the mortgagee who has priority, which, in my view, would be the first mortgagee. There is no provision for the right to be transferred to a mortgagee with lesser priority in the event that the first mortgagee decides not to exercise its right to vote. As well, paragraph (c)(i), contained in all mortgages and reproduced above, contemplates the mortgagee giving the mortgagor notice if it does not intend to exercise its vote, thereby enabling the mortgagor to exercise the right to vote. If, therefore, the developer does not have the first mortgage, he will not have the right to exercise the vote contained in the second mortgage, in my view, according to s. 48.

While s. 48 is not as clear as one would like, I am unable to agree with Philp J.'s interpretation of it. There can be no doubt that the first part of the section, down to the words, "the mortgagee may exercise the right", gives to any mortgagee, whose mortgage document contains the appropriate authorization to vote, the right to exercise that vote if it wishes to do so. The ambiguity lies in the words, "where two or more such mortgages contain such a provision, the right may be exercised by the mortgagee who has priority". Section 22(1) permits only one vote per unit at a meeting of unit owners. Consequently, only one mortgagee could vote a unit regardless of the number of mortgages registered against it. The latter part of s. 48 is permissive, and allows the mortgagee with priority to vote if it wishes to. It does not, however, prohibit voting by junior mortgagees if the senior mortgagee does not wish to avail itself of its rights. To hold otherwise, would be to limit the opening part of s. 48 to first mortgagees only; but the wording of that part indicates no such limitation. If the opening part were specifically limited to first mortgagees, then the latter part would be redundant. In addition, to construe the section in that way would limit the rights of the mortgagee and mortgagor to contract for the assignment of the owner's right to vote. To effect such a result, the Act would have to do so in very clear terms. I am satisfied that the legislature had no such intent, and that the right of a mortgagee to vote a unit arises by virtue of its agreement with the unit owner. However, it can be exercised only within the terms of that agreement, and only if a prior mortgagee does not avail itself of its right to vote.

RESULT

In result, I am of the view that the appellants are entitled to declarations that:

- (a) Thomas C. Assaly is entitled to vote at unit owners' meetings as owner of the 53 residential units registered in his name.
- (b) Assaly Corp. is entitled to vote at unit owners' meetings as owner of seven commercial units and one residential unit. It is entitled to vote in a fiduciary capacity only with respect to the one residential unit it owns as a result of the aborted agreement of purchase and sale.
- (c) Assaly Corp. is entitled to exercise its rights as mortgagee to vote at unit owners' meetings, within the terms of its mortgages, but only in situations where prior mortgagees do not avail themselves of their prior right to vote.

I should like to comment on a matter which I consider to have confused the issues in this appeal. The disputes between the parties arose at a meeting of directors of the condominium corporation, but the issues in the appeal deal with matters which do not involve directors at all, but involve the rights and duties of registered unit owners and mortgagees. There is no doubt that all directors must act at all times in the interests of the condominium corporation as a whole. Their position is the same as the position of a director of any other corporation, and nothing in the Act reduces their responsibilities. Unit owners, however, are in a position similar to that of shareholders of a corporation -- they act in their own personal interests unless something in the general law or in the Act requires them to do otherwise. In this case, the proposed purpose of the unit owners' meeting is to replace some of the directors. If that is done within the terms of the Act and of the declaration and by-laws of the corporation, there can be no complaint. However, once new directors are appointed, they owe a fiduciary duty to the corporation and not to any other individual or organization. If they fail in the exercise of that duty, they are subject to the full force of the law.

I would set aside the judgment below, and in its place give judgment in favour of the appellants in accordance with these reasons. The appellants are entitled to their costs here and below.

Appeal allowed.

Carleton Condominium Corp. No. 11 v. Shenkman Corp. Ltd.; Grainger et al., Third Parties

49 O.R. (2d) 194 ONTARIO HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE KREVER J. 14TH JANUARY 1985.

ACTION for damages in respect of repairs to the common elements of the plaintiff condominium corporation; THIRD PARTY PROCEEDINGS by the developer against the contractor and the mortgagee.

John P. Nelligan, Q.C., and John E. Johnson, for plaintiff.

J.B. Chadwick, Q.C., and T.C. Barber, for defendant.

Jessen DeW. Wentzell, for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, third party.

KREVER J.:-- The plaintiff's claim, asserted in this action only in contract, is to recover the expenses, actually incurred and to be incurred, to repair and correct defects in certain common elements of the plaintiff condominium corporation. The defendant, the owner-developer of the condominium project, brought third party proceedings against a firm of architects retained by it to design, prepare the drawings for and supervise the construction of the project, Acto Builders Limited, the contractor engaged by it as the contractor for the project's parking structure, and, finally, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which, as mortgagee, financed the project. The parking structure, which was not originally part of the project and which was added to meet municipal parking-space requirements, was, however, not included in the mortgage commitment made by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which, for convenience, I shall refer to as CMHC. Prior to trial the solicitors for the third party, Acto Builders Limited, were, by order, removed from the record and, also by order, but one made on consent, the third party proceedings against the architects were dismissed. At the opening of the trial counsel for Acto Builders Limited sought, and was granted, leave to withdraw. As a result the third party issues, which were tried at the same time as the main action, proceeded against both Acto Builders Limited and CMHC but only with the latter represented by counsel.

The defendant, an experienced developer, began the project, using land from its own extensive land bank in the Ottawa area, in response to a federal government programme designed to encourage the construction of low-cost housing for persons at the lower end of the income scale or, as described in the evidence less euphemistically, for the poor and disadvantaged. The government's mechanism was the availability, through CMHC, a creature of statute, of funds to finance the construction of the project. Construction began in October, 1970 and, almost from the beginning, the project was beset with problems, first of a physical nature -- poor construction -- and later of a legal nature resulting, even before the commencement of this action on October 3, 1974, in litigation in February and March, 1972, between the plaintiff and its original architects and general contractor. The members of society for whom this perfectly laudable and well-meaning programme was designed were poorly served by its execution in this undertaking.

The complex was located in Gloucester Township and consisted of tower units, townhouses, three outdoor parking areas, of which only two are the subject of this litigation, and, as finally executed, a parking garage or parking structure. The towers were six in number, in two groups of three. Each of these two groups of towers contained 92 units and was of frame construction with a brick veneer. The townhouses, of similar construction, also arranged in groups of three, were 44 in number. Although the contract for the construction of the complex between the plaintiff and its original general contractor was not executed until November, 1970, construction began in October, 1970. Some units were sold in the spring and summer of 1971 and their owners took possession of them in June and July of that year. A smaller number of units were rented to tenants originally but, later, in 1975, were sold to purchasers. The parking structure, built pursuant to a contract between the defendant and the third party Acto Builders Limited, was not completed until about December 21, 1971.

With the registration of the required declaration and description, the plaintiff condominium corporation came into existence on October 29, 1971. Under the terms of a written contract between the plaintiff and the defendant developer the defendant was the manager of the plaintiff until January 30, 1973. At the time of the trial of this action there were four different categories of unit owners, namely, those who had purchased their units before the completion of the construction, those who had purchased after the completion of the construction, those who had purchased their units on a resale to them by original unit owners and, finally, those who, in 1975, that is, after the commencement of the action, had been first purchasers, not, however, of new units but of units that had been rented to tenants. Because of the opinion I hold with respect to the law that governs the relationship of, and the rights and obligations between the plaintiff and the defendant, it is, in my view, unnecessary to break down these categories into numbers. It is enough to describe the relationship between an original owner who purchased before the completion of the construction and the plaintiff and the defendant. I add, however, because it may be useful to do so, that all of the original owners, no matter whether they purchased before or after completion, with the exception of those who, in 1975, purchased "used" units, received from the defendant standard warranties in writing the terms of which I shall refer to in some detail later.

I use as my example of original unit owners who purchased before the completion of the construction Mr. and Mrs. William Hersh. Mr. Hersh became the president of the condominium corporation and acted in that capacity from 1972 to 1975 and was therefore president at the commencement of this action. By an agreement in writing dated June 25, 1971, he and his wife agreed with the defendant (to be accurate, the predecessor of the defendant but, as nothing turns on it, no distinction need be made) to purchase a unit in the condominium in accordance with a description and a declaration to be registered. The agreement, which referred to the Condominium Act, 1967 (Ont.), c. 12, contemplated the creation of the condominium corporation but provided that if the unit and common elements reasonably necessary for the enjoyment of the unit were substantially completed and fit for occupancy before the registration creating the condominium corporation, the purchasers would take occupancy of the unit on a rental basis. Clause 5 and the relevant portion of cl. 14 of the agreement of purchase and sale read as follows:

5. The vendor agrees that it will erect the said unit in accordance with the plans and specifications filed with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or any amendment thereto. It is agreed that acceptance of construction and amendments to plans by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation shall constitute conclusive acceptance by the Purchaser. The Vendor shall have the right to substitute other material for that provided for in the plans and specifications, provided that such material is approved by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, or is of a quality equal to or better than the material in the specification.

14. (a) The Vendor agrees to provide the Purchaser on occupancy with a one-year Home Owner's Warranty in a form approved by the National House Builders' Association with respect to workmanship and materials.

(c) It is understood and agreed that there is no representation, warranty, collateral agreement or condition affecting this agreement or the Real Property or supported hereby other than as expressed herein in writing.

Despite the incomplete state of the construction Mr. and Mrs. Hersh moved into their unit on June 30, 1971, and on the following day, July 1, 1971, according to Mr. Hersh's testimony, the transaction of purchase and sale was closed. As part of the transaction the defendant gave to Mr. and Mrs. Hersh a written warranty in the standard form as described in cl. 14(a) of the agreement of purchase and sale set out above. The warranty, executed by the defendant and dated July 1, 1971, begins with the words "National House Builders Association", an association of which the defendant was a member, and is entitled "Home Owner's Warranty". With deletions of provisions on which, in my view, nothing turns, the warranty is in the following language:

TO WILLIAM HERSH & LISA SHAPIRO

1. Your Builder guarantees that your home on Unit 61, Level 1, and its appurtenant common interest Carleton Condominium Plan No. 11 in the Township of Gloucester, delivered to you on the 1st day of July, 1971 has been constructed in a thorough and workmanlike manner in accordance with accepted Home Building Standards. Inspection by local building authorities and by our trained personnel guarantees to you that all local codes, hydro regulations and municipal by-laws and where applicable, minimum National Housing Act standards in existence at the time of construction have been complied with.

2. Your Builder further certifies that this home, upon delivery to you, was structurally sound and free from defects in workmanship and materials.

3. Your Builder will, at his option, either replace or repair free of cost, any such defects which occur under ordinary use and care, within one year from the date of delivery as shown above subject to the limitations hereinafter expressed. Such defects must be brought to your builder's attention in writing within the one year period hereinbefore set out.

6. Your Builder does not assume liability or responsibility for:

(a) Damage due to reasonable wear and tear or damage caused by termites or other insects, fire, lightning, tempest or other acts of God, or through negligence of the occupier of the home.

(b) Conditions resulting from condensation or contraction or expansion common to the type and grade of materials used.

(c) Checking or cracking of plaster or dry wall.

(d) Latent defects inherent in the type and grade of materials used.

(e) Minor depressions in grounds caused by settling of sewer, plumbing or utility ditches or ground grading.

(f) Cracks common to concrete and masonry work.

7. In no event shall the undersigned Builder be liable hereunder for an amount in excess of that necessary to replace or repair the defective material or workmanship.

8. This is the only warranty made or authorized by your Builder with respect to your home and is in lieu of all other warranties expressed or implied and of all other obligations and liabilities on your Builder's part whether with respect to materials or workmanship in the home, damages suffered by the purchaser or others or to his or their effects or otherwise. No warranty is made beyond the time limited above even though the claimed defect does not become apparent within such period.

10. This warranty is solely for the protection of the original owner and is not transferable. Any obligation under this warranty terminates in the event of sale of the property or in the event of the property not being occupied by the original purchaser.

It is, I think, fair to observe that the standard form on which the warranty appears is one designed for what may reasonably be thought of as more conventional houses and not especially for condominium units.

From the very beginning the original unit owners had reason to complain about the defects in the units and the common elements. Most of the defects were attributable to the poor quality of workmanship and supervision in the construction of the project. It is not without significance that the defendant itself, in its litigation with its original architects and general contractor, took the position that the quality of work and supervision fell below reasonable standards. The claim in this action is limited to the unacceptable quality of the common elements and, as the issues eventually became defined in the proceedings before trial, does not include complaints with respect to the individual units. In this connection it is appropriate to draw attention to the reference to "appurtenant common interest" in the first clause of the home owner's warranty.

It is to the common elements that are the subject of the plaintiff's claim that attention must now be directed. They are to be found in the townhouses, the parking structure, two of the parking-lots and, although compared with the first three, of much less importance, roof hoppers on the towers. It is not disputed that the items about which complaint is made are, indeed, common elements as opposed to the units of the condominium. By "common elements" I mean common elements as defined in s. 1(1)(g) of the Condominium Act, now R.S.O. 1980, c. 84, that is, all the property except the units. I need not review in the same detail given at the trial the evidence of the defects and shortcomings in respect of which the plaintiff's claim is made in the light of the defendant's fair position that the real issues between the plaintiff and the defendant were the plaintiff's entitlement to any judgment against it and, if that were decided in the plaintiff's favour, the determination of the reasonable cost of repairs.

The townhouses, sometimes referred to in the evidence as maisonettes, were defectively constructed in several respects. The more serious of these, as far as the common elements are concerned, were the following. The stucco on the gable ends was so poorly applied that it buckled with the result that the buildings were left exposed to the elements requiring, in July, 1980, replacement of the stucco with aluminum siding. The dormer windows, because of poor window design and inadequate flashing, allowed water to enter the units damaging floors, walls and ceilings. Kitchen venting was so poorly installed that odours from one kitchen entered the adjoining kitchen. This resulted from the venting of adjoining kitchen exhausts into a common box before going through the roof to the outside, thus permitting a cross-over of air. There were leaks in the roofs. Roof ventilation allowed condensation in the attic space, causing damage to exterior surfaces and the curling of shingles. I accept the evidence of Mr.

Herbert Otto, an architect, and Mr. R. John Oliver, a professional engineer, who expressed their opinions that the defects I have described reflected poor workmanship, lack of adequate supervision and inspection during the construction and contraventions of a serious nature of both the Gloucester Township building by-laws and the 1965 National Building Code which the by-laws incorporated. In short, the construction was not carried out in a workmanlike manner and the defects clearly required correction.

The quality of the construction of the parking structure, erected, it will be recalled, by the third party Acto Builders Limited, was, it is common ground, undeniably poor and unacceptable. Quite apart from its inability to resist earthquake forces, a required standard for structures of its kind in the Ottawa region, it was generally unacceptable. The columns supporting the beams and joints were inadequately secured in their footings, all of which supported the upper level concrete deck, and were out of plumb. The concrete deck was constructed without a satisfactory membrane or sealer to prevent water from penetrating through the asphalt, causing leaking to the level below, excessive corrosion of the beams and other steel components and short circuiting in the electrical system. The enclosed staircases were so poorly built that little time could be lost in replacing them. That the design and construction of the parking structure patently failed to meet any reasonable standard is, on the evidence, an inescapable conclusion.

The same conclusion must be made about the two parking-lots or areas. The deterioration of the parking-lot asphalt, tilting of the lamp standards, deterioration of the bollards installed to permit the winter heating of unit owners' cars, and damage to the parking-lots' concrete curbs, all of which were described in detail by the witnesses at the trial and are evident in the photographic exhibits, can be attributed to the less than professional solution adopted to drain the ground on which the parking-lots were put down. In this connection I accept the evidence of Mr. Lloyd Bredison, a professional engineer and the president of a company of consulting engineers and geologists engaged in soil investigations and inspection and testing services. The soil problem involved in the construction of one of the parking-lots was more serious than that in the other and the first part of my brief description relates to what was called "parking-lot two", the more difficult area. According to Mr. Bredison, there had been no adequate provision made for water drainage and as a result the water which had not been drawn off sat on impervious material. Under winter conditions, this "perched" water froze and expanded by 10%, and in so doing lifted the materials above it and reached the surface asphalt. The next observation made by Mr. Bredison had to do with the soft clay which was used under the granular fill. It was, he said, inappropriate because it created a weak base and became even softer when saturated by perched water allowing the asphalt to be pushed down by the weight of the cars. In some areas, sand had been used under the granular material and this too created a poor sub-asphalt base. Moreover, insufficient class A granular was used. It is also clear that surface drainage for the parking-lots was ineffective. The subsidence of asphalt around the catchment basins and the shallow nature of the storm sewers inevitably causes ponding of water on the lots. There was a difference of expert opinion over the magnitude of the repair measures needed, a matter to which I will return in my discussion of damages, but no disagreement about the failure of the parking-lots to meet reasonable standards.

Finally, and briefly, I mention the roof hoppers on the towers. They lacked a necessary sleeve and were erected or installed in such a manner that their drainage purpose was frustrated. This defect was also a breach of acceptable standards.

I conclude this part of my discussion of standard of care with a reference to an attitude expressed during the trial by a witness that is perhaps as significant a piece of evidence as any that could be led to reflect the defendant's attitude about the quality of housing that lower-income members of society, for whose benefit the programme was intended, were entitled to receive. By this reference I mean no disparagement of Mr. V.K. Whittaker, who throughout the material period was a vice-president of the defendant and in charge of the development. He was, I find, an honourable, fair and frank witness. Moreover, the comment I am about to relate was made in cross-examination, in the give and take of an adversary proceeding. But, making allowance for that, it is nevertheless significant for me. In answer to a question about the large number of complaints being made by unit owners even before the completion of construction Mr. Whittaker explained that the reason why the number was excessive was because "these people had never [before] owned. They bought Volkswagen and thought they were entitled to Cadillac." When asked by Mr. Nelligan whether a Volkswagen was acceptable with leaking windows, Mr. Whittaker answered, "If that's all you can afford."

The first difficult issue of law to be considered -- the status of the plaintiff condominium corporation to sue, or if possessed of status, to sue for the full extent of the damages to be assessed -- takes me into an unsettled subject in which conflicting judicial approaches are found. Simply put, the question is one of the correct interpretation of s. 9(18) of the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 77. It will be recalled that this action was commenced in October, 1974. The governing statutory law was therefore that set out in the 1970 revision of the statutes and not that found in the version in which it appears in the 1980 revision. The statutory provision, then, that is relevant for present purposes, s. 9(18), read as follows:

9(18) Any action with respect to the common elements may be brought by the corporation and a judgment for the payment of money in favour of the corporation in such an action is an asset of the corporation.

One of the differences in the statute that took place between the two revisions may be seen by an examination of the language of s. 14(1) and (2) of the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 84, which I reproduce, in part:

14(1) The corporation ... may, on its own behalf and on behalf of any owner, sue for and recover damages and costs in respect of any damage to common elements ...

(2) The corporation ... may sue on its own behalf and on behalf of any owner with respect to the common elements and any units, notwithstanding that the corporation was not a party to the contract in respect of which the action is brought ...

Having drawn attention to the statutory changes, it is right that I say that the interpretation that I have concluded is the correct one for the provision as it read at all material times, up to and including the time of the commencement of this action, is in no way influenced by the subsequent amendment of the legislation. On this point the following sections of the Interpretation Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 219, are relevant:

17. The repeal or amendment of an Act shall be deemed not to be or to involve any declaration as to the previous state of the law.

18. The amendment of an Act shall be deemed not to be or to involve a declaration that the law under the Act was or was considered by the Legislature to have been different from the law as it has become under the Act as so amended.

19. The Legislature shall not, by re-enacting, revising, consolidating or amending an Act, be deemed to have adopted the construction that has by judicial decision or otherwise been placed upon the language used in the Act or upon similar language.

The debate that has developed relates not to the right of the condominium corporation to sue but to the basis of that right. It is argued that s. 9(18) did not create any substantive right in the corporation but was only a procedural mechanism or vehicle by which the right of the individual unit owners (who, under the provisions of s. 7(1) and (2) of the Act, both then and now, were and are tenants in common of the common elements), can be exercised by the corporation. Thus, according to this position, if none of the individual unit owners was entitled to sue, the corporation was not entitled to sue. If only one, say, out of a total of 100 unit owners had a cause of action, then the corporation was entitled to assert only that unit owner's right to sue with a concomitant limitation with respect to the recoverable assessed damages. The result, so the argument continues, is that, to take the same example, if the assessed damage to the common elements was $100,000 the corporation could only recover $1,000 because its right was no greater than the one-unit owner having the cause of action. Because, by the agreement of the parties, the plaintiff's claim in this case is to be dealt with only as one in contract as opposed to tort or to contract and tort, the difficulty of the plaintiff's case is compounded by the nature of the contractual right the plaintiff is entitled to assert. If the right arises out of the express written warranty, it must be borne in mind that only some of the unit owners, at the time of the commencement of the action, had been given written warranties. At that time, some of the unit owners were persons who had purchased their units, not from the defendant, but from original unit owners who had purchased from the defendant and had been given warranties. Some others, the 1975 purchasers of units which had been rented to tenants until then, received no warranties on their purchase. If the right arises out of the warranty implied by common law in respect of the purchase of incomplete residential premises, only some of the original unit owners who were still unit owners had bought their units before the completion of the construction. In either event, if the defendant were shown to be liable to the plaintiff only part of the damages would be recoverable. Conceding, as I am quick to do, that this analysis can find support in both logic and history, I say, for reasons I shall give later, that I am unable to accept it.

I am relieved of the necessity of making an extensive review of the cases on this issue because of the recent careful and articulate exploration of them by Mr. Justice Reid in York Condominium Corp. No. 76 v. Rose Park Wellesley Investments Ltd. et al. (1984), 48 O.R. (2d) 455, 13 D.L.R. (4th) 413. That was an action for damages for breach of contract by a condominium corporation in respect of an allegedly defectively-constructed parking garage in a large condominium project. The garage was a common element. Since, in the result, it was held that because of the exculpatory clause in the agreements of purchase and sale there was no liability on the part of the defendants and that, in any event, no failure to follow good building practice had been demonstrated, it may be said that Reid J.'s views with respect to the true basis of the condominium corporation's right to sue were not a necessary part of his decision. Even so, they were expressed with his customary skill and power of persuasion and command my respect. There, as in this case, the defendants contended that the condominium corporation's status to bring the action was in relation only to the original unit purchasers, of whom only fewer than half remained at the time the action was commenced. Also, as in this case, the statutory provision with which Mr. Justice Reid was concerned was s. 9(18) of the Act as it appeared in the 1970 revision, and not in its current version. In the course of his reasons he considered the somewhat differing views of Cromarty J. in Frontenac Condominium Corp. No. 1 v. Joe Macciocchi & Sons Ltd. (1974), 3 O.R. (2d) 331, 45 D.L.R. (3d) 347, and Gray J. in Loader et al. v. Rose Park Wellesley Investments Ltd. et al. (1980), 29 O.R. (2d) 381, 114 D.L.R. (3d) 105, 17 C.P.C. 150.

I cannot, in fewer words than he has used, improve upon Mr. Justice Reid's explanation of the issue and of the cases which, before his decision, were the leading Ontario cases on it and, despite its length, I reproduce what he has had to say at pp. 462-5 O.R., pp. 420-3 D.L.R. of his reasons:

Plaintiff's counsel submitted that s. 9(18) furnishes a "statutory cause of action", yet submitted also that it stems from and rests upon the contracts entered into between the original unit purchasers and the developers. Mr. Starkman [counsel for the plaintiff] conceded that if none of the original purchasers had retained ownership of a unit there would be no basis for the action. His position was that there were some 600 continuing original unit purchasers who were, in May, 1983 (the date borne by ex. "A"), and therefore, at the time the action was commenced, members of the condominium corporation. That figure was accepted by defendants' counsel. Thus, according to Mr. Starkman, the necessary foundation exists.

As I understood Mr. Starkman's submission it was that the statute placed the condominium corporation in the shoes of the original purchasers with the result that York was, in effect, entitled to assert their contractual rights. He went further than that, however, in arguing that York could assert the same kind of claim on behalf of subsequent owners, that is to say, persons who purchased units from the original purchasers, notwithstanding that the members of the latter group had no contractual relationship with the developers. The effect of this was, Mr. Starkman submitted, that York is in a position to claim as damages the entire amount of expense to which York had been or would be put pursuant to its statutory obligation to maintain the buildings, without any reduction in recognition of the fact that only 600 or so of the 1,400 original purchasers remained as owners, and therefore, as members of the corporation at the time the writ was issued.

Furthermore, it was plaintiff's contention, as I understood it, that the measure of damages was the amount already expended by York for repairs and the amount that York would require for future repairs. No regard should be had for the fact that in order to pay for repairs already undertaken York had made assessments against its members over a substantial period of time and that numerous owners had been called upon to pay over to York an aggregate amount in respect of each unit totalling about $1,200. It was not revealed who of these were original or, alternatively, subsequent purchasers nor how much anyone had paid in that way. In Mr. Starkman's submission the making and payment of assessments was nihil ad rem to the lawsuit. In particular, the assessments were not to be taken into consideration in the calculation of damages.

Plaintiff's submission appears to rest heavily upon the decision of Cromarty J. in the first case in which the effect of s. 9(18) was considered. That was Frontenac Condominium Corp. No. 1 v. Joe Macciocchi & Sons Ltd. [(1974), 3 O.R. (2d) 331, 45 D.L.R. (3d) 347]. There Cromarty J. concluded that the section was "procedural only" and was enacted to overcome a perceived difficulty. Section 7(1) of the Act read:

"7(1) The owners are tenants in common of the common elements."

Subsection (2) of that section read:

"7(2) An undivided interest in the common elements is appurtenant to each unit." Cromarty J. observed that as a tenant in common each unit owner would be entitled to claim only for the damages suffered with respect to his or her share in the common elements. This would lead to "chaos", for in order to mount a claim for the totality of any alleged damage to the common elements, each unit owner would have to commence his or her own proceedings. As I understand the decision, Cromarty J.'s view was that s. 9(18) was enacted simply to avoid that difficulty and to enable the claims of all owners to be asserted in one action. The corporation was simply a "conduit" through which the owners' rights could be asserted in relation to the common elements, but the claim ultimately had to rest upon rights of the owners.

He observed at p. 350 O.R., p. 366 D.L.R.:

"Having concluded that the plaintiff can properly sue for any shortcomings in the common elements, it must then be shown that it has some cause of action upon which to sue.

"It seems to me that the cause of action must be found in one or more of the owners of the common elements.

"If none of them had a cause of action then there would be nothing upon which the plaintiff could bring action."

Cromarty J. did not have to deal with claims by subsequent owners. I understand plaintiff to depend upon the decision of Mr. Justice Gray in Loader v. Rose Park, supra, to support the contention that the condominium corporation may represent subsequent owners on the same basis as if they had been original owners. Loader dealt with an issue not before me, i.e., whether a class action lies, but it contains certain observations that suggest that s. 9(18) is not confined to serving procedural convenience but in some way confers on subsequent owners a right of action in contract. That would place them in the same position, qua defendants, as original, continuing, purchasers.

With respect, I am unable to read the section as going that far. Gray J. was clearly of the view that s. 9(18) was intended to facilitate claims by the unit owners with respect to common elements, and in that he demonstrated his concurrence with Cromarty J.'s classification of the section as procedural. But he went further than that in expressing the view that the rights which could thereby conveniently be asserted were not just those of the original owners but of all owners. Thus, both original and subsequent owners could claim in an action brought by the corporation; it was not to be confined to the "select group" of original purchasers (see report, p. 390 O.R. p. 114 D.L.R.).

My difficulty stems from the fact that Gray J. did not describe or explain what was the nature or source of the "right" to be asserted on behalf of a subsequent owner. In Frontenac, Cromarty J. held that if the original purchasers had no cause of action the corporation had none. Thus, the source of the rights to be asserted was the contractual relationship between original purchasers and developers or an implication arising from it, by way, say, of warranty.

Plaintiff relied on Loader for a reading of s. 9(18) that would confer not only a procedural facility for those who had existing rights to assert independent of the statute but new substantive rights on those who had none, i.e., contractual rights without any contract. To place the subsequent owners in the same position as original purchasers it would be necessary to create a fictional contract written in the terms of the one common among the original purchasers and the defendants. The effect of that would be not only to create contractual rights where none existed, in favour of subsequent owners, but to create contractual obligations on the developers where none existed.

It may be that the Ontario Legislature has the capacity to enact such extraordinary legislation but I cannot read the legislation before me as either achieving that result or disclosing an intention to do so. So remarkable a departure from the principle that those who are not parties to a contract have neither rights nor obligations stemming from it can be, and has been, achieved by statute on occasion -- I can think of one -- but that occasion has been rare and the legislative intent has been spelt out in clear terms. I find nothing in s. 9(18) or in its context in the statute that either demands or would justify such an interpretation.

In short, I accept Cromarty J.'s interpretation of the section, with the result that the only substantive claims that York may assert are claims that stem from a contract or some other source outside the statute. No suggestion is made in this case that any claim exists apart from the contracts. Indeed, the statement of claim makes it clear that plaintiff relies only upon the provisions of the common-form contract, and terms that should be read into it by implication.

I can find no cause of action existing on behalf of subsequent owners. Cromarty J. saw the corporation as a conduit for the assertion of claims of original purchasers. A consistent view is that the corporation is agent for the unit owners: Burry et al. v. Centennial Properties Ltd.; Modern Construction Ltd. et al., Third Parties (1979), 38 N.S.R. (2d) 473. I do not think it is necessary in this case to go further into the concept of agency, for I am satisfied with the "conduit" classification, save to repeat that the agency here is confined to the original purchasers as principals.

This view is significant in relation to the question of damages. Briefly, it means that any recovery made by plaintiff would be confined to damages suffered by original purchasers and flowing from breach of contract. I shall deal with that more fully later.

On the basis of the foregoing the plaintiff has status to bring this action for, in light of counsel's agreement already mentioned, 600 original purchasers or more were members of the corporation at the time the action was commenced.

[Emphasis added.]

Because I can find no fault with Reid J.'s logic I am forced to agree with his conclusion that without a contract it is difficult to have contractual rights with the result that, in an action brought in contract and in which the condominium corporation, the proper plaintiff in an action in respect of the common elements, is not itself a contracting party, one or more of the unit owners must be shown to be a party to the contract, express or implied. But despite the great respect I have for Mr. Justice Reid's reasons, I cannot go all the way with him to the conclusion that, owing to the derivative nature of the condominium corporation's right to sue, the damages which it may recover bear the same proportion to the assessed damages as the number of unit owners who were contracting parties bear to the total number of unit owners at the time of the commencement of the action. To this extent, and for the purpose of the measure of damages, I have sympathy for the approach adopted by Mr. Justice Gray in Loader et al. v. Rose Park Wellesley Investments Ltd. et al., supra.

The Condominium Act was, without question, remedial legislation. It made possible and facilitated the marketability of a type of property ownership which, it is safe to say, required a departure from the common law. As remedial legislation one is obliged to give it such a large and liberal interpretation as will best attain the object of the Act according to its true intent, meaning and spirit: see s. 10 of the Interpretation Act. In my view, that object will not be attained if one restricts the damages to which the corporation is entitled to an amount which makes impossible the repair of the defective common elements. It is of little encouragement to the development of the condominium concept to so interpret the legislation that, in a case where only half the unit owners at the time of the commencement of that action were contracting parties and in which the roof has collapsed, the condominium corporation is awarded only half the expense of constructing a new roof. For the purpose, then, of damages, and given the existence of at least one unit owner who was a contracting party through whom the condominium corporation can base a claim, the following exposition by Mr. Justice Gray in the Loader case has, in my opinion, much merit. It may be found at pp. 389-90 O.R., pp. 114-5 D.L.R.:

I am of the opinion that s. 9(18) of the Condominium Act, which permits the condominium corporation to bring an action in respect of the common elements precludes the right of unit owners to bring a class action for themselves and all other unit owners in respect to the common elements. It is clear that the Condominium Act sets up a statutory scheme by which the fruits of any litigation in respect of the common elements will be equitably distributed amongst all the unit owners. Furthermore, the condominium corporation is created to represent the best interests of the unit owners and since it is a creature created to represent their interests and is controlled by them, it seems to me that it is the only proper party to bring such an action. In some situations, permitting a class action to proceed under Rule 75 may actually conflict with the right of a condominium corporation to bring an action in respect of the common elements. For example, in this case, the action is being brought only on behalf of the original purchasers of the individual units. The benefit of the terms claimed in para. 6 of the statement of claim that the building and condominium units will be completed in a good and workmanlike manner may only be claimed by the original purchasers. If this action is permitted to proceed, it will benefit only a select group of the individual owners in the condominium and the others will be excluded. Presumably the damage sustained to the common elements affects all the owners in a condominium complex. Consequently, the owners of individual units, who did not purchase their units directly from the builder, have no remedy in law for any damage sustained to the common elements except through that given to them by virtue of s. 9(18) of the Condominium Act. If a suit were brought under s. 9(18) of the Condominium Act, it would be a difficult question indeed to determine the rights of the unit owners who have already benefited from the class action. It appears to me that should the class action be permitted to proceed and succeed, there is a possibility the unit owner could recover twice by virtue of the distribution scheme provided for in the Condominium Act. When the condominium corporation sues in respect of the common elements, the Act provides that the fruits of litigation will become an asset of the corporation and will be distributed to the unit owners according to their share in the common elements. Under the Act, benefits of such litigation cannot be restricted to those who have not benefited from the class action.

Finally, I add that I cannot reconcile the traditional limitations on the rights of tenants in common at common law, as reflected in such authorities as Blackborough et al. v. Graves et al. (1673), 1 Mod. 102, 86 E.R. 765, and Viner's General Abridgment of Law and Equity (1742), p. 523, with the needs of condominium law in the late twentieth century. As a result I see no need to encumber this novel form of property ownership with an impediment of an earlier age to which such a revolutionary concept as condominium would have been unimaginable.

Only slightly less difficult are the questions whether the plaintiff has shown a breach of contract or, more accurately, a breach of warranty and, if so, whether it was a breach that would support an action commenced as late as October, 1974. The defendant was not given notice of the deficiencies in the parking-lots until 1974 and although it learned of complaints concerning the parking structure in November, 1972, they were then, compared with the complaints made in the litigation, relatively minor in nature. For convenience I again reproduce cls. 1, 2, 3 and 8 of the home owner's warranty given by the defendant to the original unit owners on the purchase of their units and repeat that many of them, of whom Mr. and Mrs. Hersh are examples, purchased their units and appurtenant common elements before the construction of the condominium project was completed:

1. Your Builder guarantees that your home on Unit 61, Level 1, and its appurtenant common interest Carleton Condominium Plan No. 11 in the Township of Gloucester, delivered to you on the 1st day of July, 1971, has been constructed in a thorough and workmanlike manner in accordance with accepted Home Building Standards. Inspection by local building authorities and by our trained personnel guarantees to you that all local codes, hydro regulations and municipal by-laws and where applicable, minimum National Housing Act standards in existence at the time of construction have been complied with.

2. Your Builder further certifies that this home, upon delivery to you, was structurally sound and free from defects in workmanship and materials.

3. Your Builder will, at his option, either replace or repair and liabilities on your Builder's part whether with respecty use and care, within one year from the date of delivery as shown above subject to the limitations hereinafter expressed. Such defects must be brought to your builder's attention in writing within the one year period hereinbefore set out.

8. This is the only warranty made or authorized by your Builder with respect to your home and is in lieu of all other warranties expressed or implied and of all other obligations to materials or workmanship in the home, damages suffered by the purchaser or others or to his or their effects or otherwise. No warranty is made beyond the time limited above even though the claimed defect does not become apparent within such period.

I reject two of the bases on which it is asserted that the exclusionary or exculpatory language in the warranty set out above does not stand in the way of the plaintiff's success if it is found, as I expressly do, that the defendant was in breach of its warranty that the units and common elements would be completed in a good and workmanlike manner. First, it is submitted that the defendant was giving the warranty to purchasers at the very time it knew that the representation contained in the warranty was false. It was at the same time criticizing its own architects and contractors for unsatisfactory work. I am, however, not persuaded that these circumstances result in a conclusion of fraudulent misrepresentation on the part of the defendant. I have no doubt that the defendant fully expected that the defects about which it was then complaining would eventually be made good. It was acting in good faith. Second, the position is taken that the defects and deficiencies which I have described were of such proportions as to justify the judgment that the unit owners did not receive that which they bargained for. Accordingly, it is argued, there was a fundamental breach of contract by the defendant and, on the proper construction of the contract, the exclusionary provisions were not intended to survive the contract so that they cannot now operate as a bar to the plaintiff's recovery. In this connection, the plaintiff, of course, relies on the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Beaufort Realities (1964) Inc. et al. v. Chomedey Aluminum Co. Ltd., [1980] 2 S.C.R. 718, 116 D.L.R. (3d) 193, 13 B.L.R. 119. Despite the manner in which I have characterized the defects in construction of the common elements complained of, when they are considered in the context of the magnitude of the entire project, it would be unfair to hold that they brought about a fundamental breach. If the plaintiff is to overcome the defence of the exclusionary provisions it must do so on some other ground.

I believe that there is, indeed, such another ground. In short, it is that the exclusionary language in this case is not sufficient to displace the warranty implied by law that, with respect to residential premises purchased before the completion of construction, the premises would be fit for habitation and completed in a workmanlike manner. As a warranty implied under common law, it is "judge-made" but it is now clear that, illogical as it may be, it cannot be extended by courts to premises purchased after completion. These propositions were established by the judgments of the Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court of Canada, respectively, in Croft v. Prendergast, [1949] O.R. 282, [1949] 2 D.L.R. 708, and Fraser-Reid et al. v. Droumtsekas et al., [1980] 1 S.C.R. 720, 103 D.L.R. (3d) 385, 9 R.P.R. 121. If the unit owners who purchased before the completion of the construction did not contract out of this implied warranty, it is clear that the defendant was in breach of the warranty -- the premise, i.e., the common elements, were not completed in a workmanlike manner -- and, since on the date the action was commenced some of the unit owners who had purchased before the completion of construction were still unit owners, the plaintiff had a good cause of action. Does the written home owner's warranty given by the defendant exclude the implied warranty?

I begin my discussion of this issue by expressing my opinion that nothing turns on the fact that the home owner's warranty was executed only by the defendant and not by the unit owners. It will be recalled that the agreements of purchase and sale, in cl. 14(a), reproduced above, provided that the defendant would provide the purchasers with a home owner's warranty in a form approved by the National House Builders Association with respect to workmanship and materials. The warranty so provided contained a one-year term and, in cl. 8, purported to be the only warranty made by the defendant and was "in lieu of all other warranties expressed or implied."

In Chabot v. Ford Motor Co. of Canada Ltd. et al. (1982), 39 O.R. (2d) 162, 138 D.L.R. (3d) 417, 22 C.C.L.T. 185, a no less strongly worded exclusionary clause that provided that there were no warranties expressed or implied was held by Mr. Justice Eberle to be ineffective to exclude statutory conditions. It is true that that case dealt, not with the sale of an unfinished house, but with the sale of a truck to which the Manitoba Sale of Goods Act, R.S.M. 1970, c. S10, applied, and that in this case the defendant's obligations do not derive from statutory conditions. Nevertheless, the Chabot case is helpful in pointing out the difficulty a constructor, in that case a manufacturer, has in avoiding its responsibilities imposed by law in its dealing with a purchaser in a weaker bargaining position.

The same home owner's warranty given by the defendant was given to original purchasers of units whether they had purchased before or after the completion of construction. Since those who became unit owners after the completion of construction were not, on the authority of the Fraser-Reid case, entitled to the protection of the implied warranty to which I have referred, and were, nevertheless, recipients of the warranty purporting to exclude all other implied warranties, more precise language was in my opinion necessary to exclude the warranty by which only some of the purchasers were protected. I therefore hold that the exclusionary language in the home owner's warranty is ineffective to prevent the plaintiff from recovery of the damages to be assessed. I find support for my conclusion in the reasoning of the courts in Thompson et al. v. Plainsman Developments Ltd. (1981), 19 R.P.R. 226; Hancock et al. v. B.W. Brazier (Anerley), Ltd., [1966] 2 All E.R. 901, and, particularly with respect to the temporal limitation on the home owner's warranty, Simpsons Ltd. v. Pigott Construction Co. Ltd. (1973), 1 O.R. (2d) 257, 40 D.L.R. (3d) 47. Burry et al. v. Centennial Properties Ltd.; Modern Construction Ltd. et al., Third Parties (1979), 38 N.S.R. (2d) 473, affirmed loc. cit., p. 450, to which I was referred by the defendant, is a case in which none of the plaintiffs had purchased a unit before the completion of construction and is not an authority that is irreconcilable with the conclusion I have reached. For the sake of clarity, I conclude my consideration of this point by stating my understanding that the implied warranty I have been discussing relates not only to the house but, on the authorities, to the "house and grounds". I consider the parking-lots and the parking structure to be included in the grounds or the common elements appurtenant to the individual units.

The plaintiff's damages are conveniently itemized in the amended paragraph of the amended statement of claim where they are separated into those which have already been incurred for necessary repairs and those which, though not yet incurred, will be equally necessary. The expenditures already made are not seriously disputed by the defendant, if indeed they are disputed at all, and I am satisfied that they have been satisfactorily proved. They are set out in para. 9(a). Paragraph 9(b), the list of expenditures yet to be made, with the qualifications I shall mention, are, in my opinion, reasonable estimates of the repair costs that will be necessary to correct the defects which I have identified. The two categories of expenditures, taken from para. 9 of the statement of claim, are the following:

(a) EXPENDITURES ALREADY MADE.

- (1) Electrical repairs Re: Parking Lot conduit and bollards;

Richard Desjardins -- Backhoe October 1977 $ 456.00

- (2) Servant Electric, November 1st, 1977 1,580.87

- (3) Brycor Ltd., December 31st, 1977 503.00

- (4) Central Precast Products Ltd., October 11th, 1977 276.26

- (5) Alex Paving Limited Re: Paving and patching repairs, October 11th, 1977 1,975.00

- (6) Electrical Repairs Re: Parking Garage Brycor Limited, October 31st, 1977 3,442.00

- (7) Gene's Electrical, February 28th, 1974 306.79

- (8) Gene's Electrical, March 17th, 1974 596.35

- (9) Removal of Locker heaters 1,670.10

- (10) Repair and replacement of Apartment Building roof hoppers;

Frank Martel, July 18th, 1977 (3 hoppers $150.00 each) 450.00

(2 hoppers $170.00 each), April 13th, 1976 340.00

- (11) Interprovincial Plumbing April 13th, 1976 -- Repairs to 2 hoppers 45.00

July 9th, 1977 -- Repairs to 3 hoppers 46.00

- (12) Repairs to roofs and windows and ventilation

Bun Wiseman, December 13th, 1974 (47 windows) 3,525.00

(13) A & M Roofing (8 Windows) April 7th, 1976 216.00

(4 Windows), October 5th, 1977 120.00 (12 Windows), October 12th, 1977 360.00

(14) Frank Martel reshingling 2,100.00

(15) Frank Martel roofing (4 Metal Strips over windows, July 18th, 1974 160.00

(16) Ted Smith, roofing repair, October 16th, 1979 906.21

(17) Drilling dormer vent holes, insulating kitchen and bathroom vent pipes, louvers and special tools, material 997.86

Labour 1,359.17

(18) Replace nine gable ends with aluminium siding July 3rd, 1980

Gerald Gravel 5,400.00

(19) Labour to install air vents and gable end vents -- Eric Angus 240.00

(20) Material for louvers 283.76

(21) Remove old stucco, haul and dump 849.52

(22) Townhouse Gable ends

ByTown Aluminium January 10th, 1977 (two gable ends) 1,460.00

May 12th, 1976 (four gable ends) 2,860.00

February 20th, 1975 (one gable end) 825.00

May 9th, 1979 (one gable end) 800.00

October 25th, 1974 (four gable ends) 2,800.00 Sub-total $36,949.89

(b) EXPENDITURES TO COME.

(1) Separation of kitchen exhaust vents 5,377.50

(2) Repair of interior individual unit damage

Town House -- Window Repairs 50,556.00

(3) Parking Lot Repairs Removal of defective surface materials, installation of new drainage system for dewatering purposes, reconstruct storm drain systems with catch basins, reconstruct underground electrical wiring system with pipe standards. Repaving of parking lots and approach roads disturbed by storm drainage installations, per estimate Ted Smith Building Services Ltd., May 4th, 1979, and further particulars provided to Defendant November 30th, 1979. Cost estimate 166,591.00 General supervision, 80 hours 3,100.00 at $38.75 per hour

Overhead 10% 16,659.00

Contractors' Fee 10% 18,635.00

Total Estimate 204,985.00

(4) Parking Garage Repairs.

Stripping out defective asphalt on ground level, installation of underground weeping drains, and replacement of storm drainage piping and catch basins. Replacement of all concrete column surrounds followed by prepared granular base and asphalt paving. Installation of concrete grade beams and panels of solid masonry, jacking and straightening of steel columns and installing of steel beams and metal braces to stabilize structure. Secondary reinforcement of beams, stripping of asphalt upper decks and installation of membrane waterproofing on concrete decks and resurfacing of upper deck with asphalt paving.

Cleaning and painting of structures

Per estimate, Ted Smith Building Services Limited, May 7, 1979 with further particulars provided On November 30, 1979 120,940.00 General Supervision, 80 Hours at $38.75 per hour 3,100.00

Overhead expense 10% 12,404.00

Contractors' Fee 10% 13,644.00

Total Estimate $150,088.00

For the defects associated with the towers and the townhouses respectively, I allow the sums of $2,551.10 and $25,262.52. There was a conflict in the professional opinions expressed with respect to the cost of correcting the defects in the parking-lots. There was general agreement about the nature and extent of the defects but Mr. Lloyd Bredison and Mr. Peter Beckett, both engineers and both impressive witnesses, offered different views of the remedial measures required to produce satisfactory parking areas. I have been persuaded that Mr. Beckett was right when he said that the parking-lots that Mr. Bredison's proposals would produce would be superior in quality than that needed. They would, in fact, be appropriate for a much more intensive use such as that of a municipal parking-lot. For the more limited use to be made of these parking areas expenditures as high as those contemplated by Mr. Bredison's recommendations are not required. I have concluded then that in addition to the $4,791.13 already spent an additional $121,817 ought to be allowed for the parking-lot damages, or a total of $126,608.13. The allowance for the parking structure is the total of $4,345.14 already expended and a further $145,088, that is, $149,433.14. I accept the evidence that if the plaintiff had had a reasonable programme of regular cleaning and painting, the estimate for the further expenditures for the repair of the structure would have been reduced by the sum of $5,000 and I have made a deduction of that amount.

I am unable to agree with the submissions made on behalf of the defendant that the assessed damages should be reduced by an appropriate sum that reflects the failure of the plaintiff to attend to the repairs expeditiously. The submission is grounded on a duty which the plaintiff has to mitigate its damages. The defendant cannot be heard to complain about a failure to mitigate in this case for two reasons. In the first place it knew that the project was designed for persons, who by reason of their qualifications for admission to the programme, were of very limited means and secondly, as manager of the corporation, the defendant itself had recommended such a small amount for the unit owners' contribution to a reserve for maintenance that it would be impossible to expend as much as the repairs attributable to the defendant's faulty work involved. Moreover, I cannot find that the postponement of the repairs exacerbated the construction deficiencies. Finally, I do not accede to the defendant's request that the damages assessed as they have been on a 1983 basis should be reduced in such a way that they are awarded on a 1974 cost basis. I do not believe that in real terms there is a difference and, moreover, the defendant has had the use of the money represented throughout the period. I assess no blame for the lengthy period between the commencement of the action and the commencement of trial.

To sum up, the plaintiff is entitled to judgment in the sum of $359,797.89, together with prejudgment interest on $36,949.89, the amount found by me to have already been expended by the plaintiff. I have concluded that the fair rate of interest to award is an average of 13.9% from December 1, 1977.

In the third party proceedings the defendant's claim over against the third party Acto Builders Limited was, I repeat, not contested at trial. The only part of the condominium project for which Acto was responsible was the construction of the parking structure. Both the design, entrusted by Acto to an architect retained by it, and the construction of the structure were, as I have pointed out, exceedingly poorly carried out, contravened required standards and, for those reasons, exposed the defendant to liability at the hands of the plaintiff. In its statement of defence Acto refers to art. 17 of the contract between it and the defendant which limits the defendant to the right to require the remedying of any defects of materials or workmanship within one year of substantial completion. In my view, the magnitude of Acto's faulty performance of its contractual obligations was such that it can reasonably be said that its lack of care was indeed a fundamental breach. On a proper construction of the contract it cannot be permitted to have the protection of the exclusionary article. The defendant is entitled to be indemnified by Acto for the damages it is required to pay to the plaintiff in respect of the repair of the parking structure, that is to say, in the sum of $149,433.14, together with prejudgment interest from December 1, 1977, at the rate of 13.9% on the amount of the expenses already paid, that is, $4,345.14.

The third party claim against CMHC requires a consideration of additional legal issues. The evidence establishes that it was CMHC that brought to the defendant's attention the government's programme and the availability of financing for such a project as the one that was eventually constructed. CMHC, moreover, approved the purchasers of the units of the condominium from whom it took mortgages, and the prices to be charged for the units. It financed the construction of all of the project with the exception of the parking structure but, even with respect to it, it required the defendant to receive its approval of the plans and specifications. It also inspected the construction of the parking structure. As mortgagee it came to have a property interest in the project. Furthermore, it is fair to say that CMHC was known throughout the construction industry, of which the defendant was a prominent member, as having expertise in the construction of housing, including low-cost housing. Finally, its inspections were less than exemplary and it approved construction which, in retrospect, it is easy to say should not have received its approval.

On the other hand, the defendant, as a highly experienced builder and developer, at all material times had access to its own professional resources on which it could and did rely, was well aware of the function and practices of CMHC. This was not its first relationship with CMHC. The defendant, moreover, had completed two applications for loans for the project on forms which drew its attention, by the use of capital letters in large print in a prominent location on the forms, to the following statements:

1. CMHC inspections solely ensure construction is in reasonable conformity with prescribed construction standards. They are not supervision on the applicant's behalf.
2. The applicant is responsible for his own contract with the builder. Disputes will NOT be arbitrated by the lender or CMHC.
3. A loan cannot be made or insured if work has proceeded beyond the first floor joist stage for houses of one or two units, or beyond excavation for buildings of more than two units.
4. The loan may be cancelled or reduced if the applicant for a home-owner loan does not occupy the housing unit.
5. The applicant is responsible for payment of legal and survey costs. The NHA mortgage insurance fee will be deducted from loan proceeds.

The first ground on which the defendant asserts its claim for indemnification or contribution is that, in law, CMHC was a joint venturer and is accordingly equally liable. I accept as a useful definition of joint venture that found in Williston on Contracts, 3rd ed. (1957), vol. 2, p. 554:

The joint venture is an association of two or more persons based on contract who combine their money, property, knowledge, skills, experience, time or other resources in the furtherance of a particular project or undertaking, usually agreeing to share the profits and the losses and each having some degree of control over the venture.

Some support for the defendant's position is found in the judgment of Jones J. of the Trial Division of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia in Central Mortgage & Housing Corp. v. Graham et al. (1973), 43 D.L.R. (3d) 686, 13 N.S.R. (2d) 183. There, CMHC was held liable, as a joint venturer, along with a builder which had breached an implied warranty of fitness. The houses in the project in question were part of a shell housing project initiated by CMHC to provide home ownership for low-income families. The idea and its promotion came from CMHC which actively sought municipal approval and directly enlisted contractors to work on the houses. It provided full financing and purchasers had to be approved by it. All plans and specifications were provided by CMHC. On these facts CMHC and the builder were held to be involved in a joint venture. At pp. 709-10 D.L.R., pp. 211-2 N.S.R., Mr. Justice Jones said:

In my view, there was a contribution by both parties of money, property, skill and knowledge to a common undertaking. There was a joint property interest in the subject-matter even though evidenced only in the mortgages. The parties had a mutual control and management of the enterprise during the construction of the houses and in the sales. The arrangement was limited to this project. There is no doubt that Bras D'Or intended a profit from the project. While there was not a mutual sharing of the profits, Central Mortgage clearly had a financial interest at stake and was vitally concerned with the successful completion of the venture. The project was within the operations of Central Mortgage under the National Housing Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. N-10. This was made clear by the evidence of the officials of the corporation. Based on the evidence, the arrangement between Central Mortgage and Bras D'Or can be characterized as a joint venture. To the extent that Bras D'Or in carrying on the venture incurred liabilities then both parties were bound.

The much heavier involvement of CMHC in the Graham case makes it readily distinguishable from this case. In the more recent case of Fraser-Brace Maritimes Ltd. v. Central Mortgage & Housing Corp. (1980), 117 D.L.R. (3d) 312, 42 N.S.R. (2d) 1, 18 R.P.R. 113, Mr. Justice Jones, by this time a member of the Appeal Division, emphasized, at p. 324 D.L.R., p. 17 N.S.R., the necessity of examining the contractual relationship between the parties in the determination of the issue whether a joint venture exists. In the circumstances of that case, he held that there was no intention on the part of CMHC as owner and the developer to enter into any other relationship than that of owner and contractor. In my opinion, there are not present in the case at bar sufficient indicia of a joint venture as defined in Williston to lead to any other conclusion than that the relationship between the defendant and CMHC was that of developer and mortgagee. The purpose of CMHC's participation was essentially to protect its investment in the project. In a mixed economy such as ours, it would, I fear, be ill advised and an undesirable frustration of social policy, to say that a measure adopted by government to encourage, induce or provide an incentive for the private sector to ameliorate a social problem, such as adequate housing for the disadvantaged, makes the government agency a joint venturer. In any event, it was not a joint venturer in this instance.

The second ground on which the defendant's claim over is based is that of negligent misrepresentation. Reliance is placed on Hedley Byrne & Co. Ltd. v. Heller & Partners Ltd., [1964] A.C. 465, and J. Nunes Diamonds Ltd. v. Dominion Electric Protection Co., [1972] S.C.R. 769, 26 D.L.R. (3d) 699. In my view, the special expertise possessed by CMHC was not one relied on by the defendant and did not create a duty of care toward the defendant. The approvals given by CMHC, including the completion certificate, did not create the necessary relationship between it and the defendant to justify liability on this basis. The defendant could not have failed at all times to be aware of the contents of the important notice drawn to its attention on the loan application form which I have set out above.

Furthermore I do not agree that CMHC should be held liable to the defendant because of its negligent gratuitous inspections. It is true that even if there is no duty to act, one who acts gratuitously cannot avoid using reasonable care in the circumstances. That, for example is a duty a gratuitous rescuer owes to a person in need of rescue. I see no justification for extending that concept to the circumstances of this case in which the defendant had no right to rely on, and did not rely on, CMHC's "gratuitous" inspections. In any event, it is misleading to call the inspections gratuitous. They were carried out in CMHC's own interest.

Finally, I am unable to accept the defendant's submission that it is entitled to succeed in its claim over against CMHC because of breach of its statutory duty. The leading case on the question whether breach of a statutory duty gives rise to a civil cause of action is now The Queen in right of Canada v. Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, [1983] 1 S.C.R. 205, 143 D.L.R. (3d) 9, [1983] 3 W.W.R. 97. The breach of statutory duty of which the defendant complains is not, in my view, a duty owed to the defendant although it may be a duty owed to the unit owners and occupiers. The defendant has not made out this basis of liability.

The defendant's third party proceedings against CMHC must be dismissed.

The parties have had no opportunity to make submissions with respect to costs. They may do so if they so desire within the next month. If they choose to make no submissions costs will follow the event.

Judgment for plaintiff.

Loader et al. v. Rose Park Wellesley Investments Ltd. et al.

29 O.R. (2d) 381, 114 D.L.R. (3d) 105

ONTARIO HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE GRAY, J. 16TH JULY 1980.

APPLICATION by the defendants for an order striking out the writ of summons and statement of claim as not being the proper subject for a class action.

D. R. Dowdall, for applicants, defendants.

V. I. Balaban, for respondents, plaintiffs.

GRAY, J.:-- This is an application pursuant to Rule 126 for an order striking out the writ of summons and statement of claim as not being the proper subject for a class action. In the alternative, particulars are sought. In my view, Rule 126 gives me no jurisdiction to strike out a writ and, in the result, the alternative relief is not required.

This action was framed as a class action. The plaintiffs, Ernest W. Loader and Nancy Edmunds, sue on behalf of themselves and all persons who purchased new condominium units from the defendants at Nos. 1, 3 and 5 Massey Square in the Borough of East York in the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto and who have not sold or otherwise disposed of their unit prior to the issuing of the writ in these proceedings. The class which the plaintiffs purport to represent is, therefore, restricted to the original purchasers of the individual units in these three condominium buildings who retained the ownership of these units up to and including May 9, 1979, when the writ was issued. Unit owners who purchased on a resale from original owners or their successors are excluded from the class sought to be represented.

The defendant corporations were the builders of the three condominium buildings above described. Each of the members of the class purchased their condominium unit from the defendants. It is alleged that it was an implied and specific term of each of the agreements of purchase and sale that the buildings and condominium units would be completed in a good and workmanlike manner. The plaintiffs allege a breach of this term and claim for damages to the units arising out of alleged deficiencies in the construction of the common elements. It is not alleged that there is anything wrong with the individual units themselves.

Class actions in Ontario are permitted by Rule 75 of the Rules of Practice:

75. Where there are numerous persons having the same interest, one or more may sue or be sued or may be authorized by the court to defend on behalf of, or for the benefit of, all.

Counsel for the defendants challenges the validity of this action as a class action on several grounds. While the plaintiffs allege that each of the members of the class entered into a standard form of agreement with the defendants, there was a separate agreement for each purchase and the agreements are not identical in all cases. Some of the agreements state that the rights of the purchaser survive closing. Others say the rights of the vendor and the purchaser survive closing. This particular difference in the agreements does not appear to me to be significant in this application.

Secondly, the defendants object to the class action on the basis that not all of the members of the class are entitled in law to rely on an implied term. The implied warranty that a building will be completed in a good and workmanlike manner was established in the case of Croft v. Prendergast, [1949] O.R. 282, [1949] 2 D.L.R. 708, and is restricted to contracts between the builder and a purchaser where the building is incomplete at the time of the agreement of purchase and sale. The class described by the plaintiff includes those who purchased their units when the building was complete and those who purchased their units when the building was incomplete. Only the latter would be entitled to the benefit of the implied warranty which is one basis of the plaintiffs' claim.

Thirdly, it is argued on behalf of the defendant that this action is not the proper subject-matter of the class action because a separate assessment of damages is required to ascertain the amount of damages for each member of the class.

On behalf of the plaintiffs, it is argued that the true test as to whether or not a class action is properly constituted under Rule 75 is that enunciated by Lord Macnaghten in Duke of Bedford v. Ellis et al., [1901] A.C. 1 at p. 8, in which three requirements for a class action were set out: (1) a common interest; (2) a common grievance, and (3) that the relief sought be beneficial to all the members of the class which the plaintiffs purported to represent. It is argued that the common interest or common ingredient running through all the claims by the member of the class is the implied warranty in the Croft v. Prendergast case and the express term in the agreement of purchase and sale. It was submitted that this common ingredient fills the test expressed by Vinelott, J., in Prudential Ass'ce Co. Ltd. v. Newman Industries Ltd. et al., [1979] 3 All E.R. 507 at p. 520, where it stated:

The second condition is that there must be an "interest" shared by all members of the class. In relation to a representative action in which it is claimed that every member of the class has a separate cause of action in tort, this condition requires, as I see it, that there must be common ingredient in the cause of action of each member of the class.

With respect to individual assessment of damages, it is argued on behalf of the plaintiffs that once a declaration is obtained that the defendants are liable to the plaintiffs in damages, a reference could be directed to determine the individual amount of damages for each member of the class.

For the plaintiffs, it is also contended that the common grievance requirement is fulfilled here because each of the members of the class have the same cause of complaint. Due to faulty construction of the common elements in each of the three buildings, it is alleged that water has seeped through the walls causing damage to the walls and floors of the units. Thus, the common grievance shared by all members of the class are the alleged deficiencies in the construction of the common elements.

With respect to the objection that some of the members of the class are entitled to the benefit of an implied term and others are not as a result of the Croft v. Prendergast decision, the plaintiffs argue that para. 6 of the statement of claim alleges that each of the members of the class are entitled to both a specific and implied term that the building would be completed in a good and workmanlike manner and since applications under Rule 126 must take all the allegations in the statement of claim to be true, this cannot be a valid objection. However, I think that this argument must fail. One of the very issues which must be determined on under this application is whether or not all of the plaintiffs will benefit if the cause of action is successful. This particular issue is clearly stated by Bull, J.A., in Shaw et al. v. Real Estate Board of Greater Vancouver (1973), 36 D.L.R. (3d) 250 at p. 254, [1973] 4 W.W.R. 391, where it is stated:

It appears to me that the many passages uttered by Judges of high authority over the years really boil down to a simple proposition that a class action is appropriate where if the plaintiff wins the other persons he purports to represent win too, and if he, because of that success, becomes entitled to relief whether or not in a fund or property, the others also become likewise entitled to that relief, having regard, always, for different quantitative participations.

Accordingly, if some of the plaintiffs are entitled to relief by virtue of an implied term and others are not entitled to relief because their agreement did not contain this implied term, the class action will not lie. Just as, if one wins all win, if a defence is successful against one, it must be capable of being successful to defeat the claims of all. The plaintiffs cannot avoid the determination of this issue by stating as an allegation in its statement of claim that all the members of the class are entitled to the relief so claimed, where different principles of law may apply to different members of the class.

The validity of class actions brought on behalf of unit owners of condominiums has been considered in a number of recent cases in Ontario and these were fully argued before me. The issue to be determined is whether or not a condominium unit owner may bring a class action on behalf of himself and the other unit owners in the same condominium building in respect of both the individual units and the common elements. (I have already stated why a unit owner cannot sue on behalf of unit owners of a different condominium building.) It is apparent upon an examination of the cases that different considerations apply to the validity of a class action for common elements than apply to a class action in which damages with respect to individual units is being claimed.

In Frontenac Condominium Corp. No. 1 v. Joe Macciocchi & Sons Ltd. (1974), 3 O.R. (2d) 331, 45 D.L.R. (3d) 347 [reversed on another point, 11 O.R. (2d) 649, 67 D.L.R. (3d) 199], Cromarty, J., considered an action brought by the condominium corporation against the builder for incomplete and deficient completion of the common elements. In addition, it was alleged that the fireplaces in some of the individual units were incomplete and damages were claimed for them as well. With respect to damages for the incomplete fireplaces, it was held that since these were wholly owned by the unit owners, only the unit owner could bring an action for their faulty construction. With respect to the incomplete common elements, the defendant argued that such an action should have been brought as a class action by the unit owners. In dealing with this point, Cromarty, J., stated at p. 341 O.R., p. 357 D.L.R.:

The defendant's next point is that the right of action lies in the unit owners as a class and that a class action must be brought.

I do not agree, but in the event that I am wrong, leave is granted, as requested, to amend the statement of claim as necessary to permit Frank W. Ramsay and George Wilson to be added as parties plaintiffs suing on behalf of themselves and all other owners of units in the Frontenac Condominium Corporation No. 1, save and except Joe Macciocchi & Sons Ltd., or otherwise as is necessary properly to constitute the action.

I do not consider that the above statement provides authority for the proposition that unit owners may bring a class action in respect of the common elements. Rather, a procedural concession is being granted to some of the individual unit owners in order to preserve their rights. In this regard, I agree fully with the comments made by Henry, J., in York Condominium Corp. No. 148 v. Singular Investments Ltd. (1977), 16 O.R. (2d) 31 at p. 34, 77 D.L.R. (3d) 61 at pp. 64-5.

It was held in the Frontenac v. Macciocchi case that the condominium corporation was the proper plaintiff to bring an action in its own name against the builder of the condominium building for faulty construction of the common elements. In reaching this decision, reliance was placed on ss. 9(17), (16) and (18) of the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 77. These sections provide:

9(16) The members of the corporation share the assets of the corporation in the same proportions as the proportions of their common interests in accordance with this Act, the declaration and the by-laws.

(17) A judgment for the payment of money against the corporation is also a judgment against each owner at the time the cause of action arose for a portion of the judgment determined by the proportions specified in the declaration for sharing the common expenses.

(18) Any action with respect to the common elements may be brought by the corporation and a judgment for the payment of money in favour of the corporation in such an action is an asset of the corporation.

The effect of these sections is that a defendant who successfully defends a class action brought by the condominium corporation under s. 9(18) can recover costs from each individual unit owner under s. 9(17) of the Act. The condominium corporation may bring an action in its own name in respect of the common elements of the building and, upon achieving success, under s. 9(16) the members of the corporation share the proceeds of the litigation as assets of the corporation in the same proportions as their share in the common elements. The Act provides a method by which an action may be brought in respect of the common elements and the scheme of distribution is provided to benefit all the unit owners according to their interest in the common elements. Cromarty, J., states at p. 339 O.R., p. 355 D.L.R., that it is "to provide a procedurally convenient method of bringing actions affecting all the owners that the Act contains s. 9(18)".

In York Condominium Corp. #161 et al. v. Deltan Realty Ltd. (1976), 3 C.P.C. 27, two condominium corporations and one of the unit owners of each of the condominium corporations brought an action against the builders. The individual unit owners sued on behalf of themselves and all other members of their respective condominium corporations. Southey, J., held that while s. 9(18) of the Condominium Act allows a condominium corporation to bring an action in respect of the common elements, nevertheless the individual unit owners are also entitled to bring a class action with respect to the common elements. He states at p. 29: While that subsection makes it quite clear that an action with respect to the common elements may be brought by the corporation, it does not take away any action with respect to the common elements which might otherwise have properly been brought in a class action on behalf of the unit holders. On the face of it, it seems to me that an action in respect of the common elements would quite properly be the subject of a class action.

With respect to the claims relating to the individual units, Southey, J., felt that such claims could only be brought by the individual unit holder and were not the proper subject-matter of a class action. However, because this objection to the statement of claim related to only three of some 20 or 30 claims in the statement of claim which was otherwise properly constituted, he refused to apply Rule 126 to strike out part of the statement of claim.

In York Condominium Corp. No. 148 v. Singular Investments Ltd., supra, Henry, J., considered the class action brought by the condominium corporation on behalf of itself and the individual unit owners against the builder of the condominium for breach of its construction contract. It is not clear from the decision whether the plaintiff was claiming damage to both the common elements and the individual units. The defendant was successful in having the statement of claim struck out on the grounds that the condominium corporation could not bring a class action on behalf of the unit owners, because the only authority given to the condominium corporation is that contained within the Act itself which does not authorize the corporation to bring such a class action. While this part of the decision was sufficient to dispose of the application before him, Henry, J., went on to consider the appropriateness of class actions where an action is brought on behalf of individual unit owners or where an action is brought in respect of common elements. First, with respect to common elements, Henry, J., states at pp. 32-3 O.R., p. 63 D.L.R.:

The common elements which I may say in very brief terms are those parts of the property which provide facilities available to all the owners of the units in common, are expressed by s. 7(1) of the Act to belong to the owners as tenants in common. It might be supposed that the question could be raised whether, with respect to the common elements, the owners of the units as tenants in common might bring a class action, but the Legislature has seen fit to dispose of that problem by providing, as I have said, in s. 9(18), that an action with respect to the common elements may be brought by the condominium corporation. So far as I have been able to determine, with the assistance of counsel, there is no other provision in the statute that authorizes the corporation to engage in litigation at all.

The Legislature has therefore singled out the circumstances of litigation concerning the common elements and has provided that the corporation may bring the action. The corporation is given no status to bring that action on behalf of anybody else. It merely sues in its own name and, as provided by s. 9(18), a judgment for the plaintiff for money in favour of the corporation becomes an asset of the corporation. As such it is obviously, under the scheme of the statute, under the control of the members who are the unit owners and who participate in the control and management of the corporation in accordance with the statutory scheme.

These reasons illustrate why the condominium corporation cannot itself bring a class action. Henry, J.'s comments also support the proposition that the statutory scheme set up by virtue of s. 9(18) of the Condominium Act was intended as a substitute for what could otherwise be brought as a class action by individual unit owners under Rule 75. This interpretation is in conflict with the opinion expressed by Southey, J., in York Condominium Corp. No. 161 v. Deltan Realty, supra.

In the Singular Investments case, Henry, J., went on to consider generally whether a class action lies. He states at p. 33 O.R., p. 64 D.L.R.:

While admittedly the concept of the condominium is a new one, and it may be necessary for the Courts to develop new techniques to deal with the practical legal problems that arise, nevertheless in my judgment, the rules relating to class actions must be adhered to until of course the Courts or the Legislature hold otherwise.

He goes on to consider Rule 75 and states at pp. 34-5 O.R., p. 65 D.L.R.:

The question what considerations will support the class action has been set out in a number of the authorities, but more recently collected by Morand, J., in Farnham v. Fingold et al., [1972] 3 O.R. 688, 29 D.L.R. (3d) 279. In that decision, which was a shareholder action, Morand, J., stated the general thrust of the authorities as imposing the following requirements on a class action. Firstly, the class must be properly defined; secondly, all members must have a common interest; thirdly, the breach of the obligation is a wrong common to all; fourthly, the damage suffered is the same to all except in amount; fifthly, the relief sought is beneficial to all; and finally none of the members of the class has an interest antagonistic to any other members.

It appears to me that there are at least two of these elements lacking in the present situation, and I confine my comments to those. It cannot be said that the breach of the obligation is a wrong common to all because it must be self-evident that in respect of the individual owners there may be various breaches of their contracts with the builder and if negligence appears, various acts of negligence which may be said to be individual but not common to all. So far as I can see the only area in which the damage would be common to all would be with respect to the common elements which is property held by all the owners as tenants in common. And further, at pp. 35-6 he considers the authorities which hold that a class action cannot lie where there must be an individual assessment of damages for each of the members of the class, including Farnham et al. v. Fingold et al., [1973] 2 O.R. 132, 33 D.L.R. (3d) 156 (C.A.), and Markt & Co. Ltd. v. Knight Steamship Co. Ltd., [1910] 2 K.B. 1021.

For these reasons, Henry, J., concludes that a class action will not lie on behalf of the unit owners of the condominium.

It is argued on behalf of the defendants in the instant case that Henry, J.'s decision on this matter was obiter, also that his reasons really only address themselves to claims for damages to the individual unit and they do not apply to the validity of a class action in respect of common elements. In fact such an interpretation of the Singular Investments case was made in a further decision by Southey, J., in York Condominium Corp. No. 228 et al. v. Tenen Investments Ltd. et al. (1977), 17 O.R. (2d) 579, 6 C.P.C. 185, in which a class action brought by a unit owner on behalf of himself and all other unit owners of a condominium building in respect of the common elements alone was allowed to proceed. It was Southey, J.'s opinion that common elements may be the subject of a class action. It should be noted that in the Tenen Investments case, counsel conceded that no class action would lie for damages to the individual units. Such a concession has, of course, not been made in the present application.

I am of the opinion that s. 9(18) of the Condominium Act, which permits the condominium corporation to bring an action in respect of the common elements precludes the right of unit owners to bring a class action for themselves and all other unit owners in respect of the common elements. It is clear that the Condominium Act sets up a statutory scheme by which the fruits of any litigation in respect of the common elements will be equitably distributed amongst all the unit owners. Furthermore, the condominium corporation is created to represent the best interests of the unit owners and since it is a creature created to represent their interests and is controlled by them, it seems to me that it is the only proper party to bring such an action. In some situations, permitting a class action to proceed under Rule 75 may actually conflict with the right of a condominium corporation to bring an action in respect of the common elements. For example, in this case, the action is being brought only on behalf of the original purchasers of the individual units. The benefit of the terms claimed in para. 6 of the statement of claim that the building and condominium units will be completed in a good and workmanlike manner may only be claimed by the original purchasers. If this action is permitted to proceed, it will benefit only a select group of the individual owners in the condominium and the others will be excluded. Presumably the damage sustained to the common elements affects all the owners in a condominium complex.

Consequently, the owners of individual units, who did not purchase their units directly from the builder, have no remedy in law for any damage sustained to the common elements except through that given to them by virtue of s. 9(18) of the Condominium Act. If a suit were brought under s. 9(18) of the Condominium Act, it would be a difficult question indeed to determine the rights of the unit owners who have already benefited from the class action. It appears to me that should the class action be permitted to proceed and succeed, there is a possibility the unit owner could recover twice by virtue of the distribution scheme provided for in the Condominium Act. When the condominium corporation sues in respect of the common elements, the Act provides that the fruits of litigation will become an asset of the corporation and will be distributed to the unit owners according to their share in the common elements. Under the Act, benefits of such litigation cannot be restricted to those who have not benefited from the class action.

In addition, for the reasons above stated, I think there is a valid question as to whether or not the class as it is constituted in the statement of claim really constitutes the proper class with a common interest. It is submitted that the common interest is the common interest in the common elements as set out in the Condominium Act. A class action under Rule 75 cannot be brought for all these unit owners. However, such an action can be brought by the condominium corporation under s. 9(18) which will benefit all those who have an interest in the common elements. To permit Rule 75 to operate to exclude some members of a class which would otherwise benefit by s. 9(18) would frustrate the very purpose of the Rule. Lord Macnaghten explains the history of the rule in Duke of Bedford v. Ellis, supra, at p. 8:

The old rule in the Court of Chancery was very simple and perfectly well understood. Under the old practice the Court required the presence of all parties interested in the matter in suit, in order that a final end might be made of the controversy. But when the parties were so numerous that you never could "come at justice," to use an expression in one of the older cases, if everybody interested was made a party, the rule was not allowed to stand in the way. It was originally a rule of convenience: for the sake of convenience it was relaxed.

So the rule permitting class actions was developed to permit a more convenient way of bringing all parties having the same interest before the Court at the same time. I cannot help but agree with the comments of Henry, J., already quoted above, that the Legislature, anticipating the difficulties of bringing a class action under Rule 75 for all members of the condominium corporation, provided s. 9(18) of the Condominium Act as a remedy. It avoids the procedural difficulties of Rule 75 and allows the corporation in law to recover damages with respect to the common elements for the benefit of all members.

A somewhat similar situation exists under the Business Corporations Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 53. I refer to Farnham et al. v. Fingold et al., [1973] 2 O.R. 132, 33 D.L.R. (3d) 156, where the Court of Appeal of Ontario held that s. 99 of the Business Corporations Act (which permits a shareholder to maintain an action in a representative capacity for himself and all other shareholders of the corporation to bring an action for and on behalf of the corporation) supplants the common law right to bring such a class action and consequently the procedures provided for in s. 99 must be adhered to. Thus the derivative right at common law enunciated in the case of Foss v. Harbottle (1843), 2 Hare, 461, 67 E.R. 189, cannot be maintained apart from s. 99. It is stated by Jessup, J.A., at p. 135 O.R., p. 159 D.L.R.:

However, in my opinion, the very broad language of s. 99(1) embraces all causes of action under any statute or in law or in equity, that a shareholder may sue for on behalf of a corporation. All forms of derivative actions purporting to be brought on behalf of and for the benefit of the corporation come within it, and therefore s-s. (2) applies to all such actions.

Consequently, it was held that s. 99(2) requiring a shareholder to apply to the Court for leave to commence the representative action could not be avoided by bringing an action under the common law rule. Similarly, I hold that s. 9(18) of the Condominium Act takes precedence over Rule 75 and that the condominium corporation is the only proper party to bring an action in respect of the common elements.

With respect to the damages to individual units, I find myself completely in agreement with the Singular Investments decision. It is alleged that the walls and floors of the individual units have been damaged because of water seepage. It appears this is a clear case where individual assessment of damages would be required, and there is no authority in Ontario that a class action will lie in such a case. This is not a case where damages to the individual units can be assessed on a global scale and where each member of the class can share the sum on a pro rata basis. Neither have the damages been standardized to reflect a general depreciation for each of the individual units as was done to avoid individual assessments in Naken et al. v. General Motors of Canada Ltd. et al., a decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal, released October 12, 1978, 21 O.R. (2d) 780, 92 D.L.R. (3d) 100, 7 C.P.C. 209 and 8 C.P.C. 232.

Accordingly, the application will be allowed and the statement of claim will be struck out with costs to the defendants in any event of the cause. Application allowed.

Beau Rivage Appartements, Appellant, and Her Majesty the Queen, Respondent

[1994] T.C.J. No. 1137

Action No. 94-1111(GST)I Tax Court of Canada Halifax, Nova Scotia Kempo T.C.J. Heard: September 7, 1994 Judgment: December 2, 1994

Roland A. Deveau, for the Appellant. Peter Leslie, for the Respondent.

JUDGMENT:-- The appeal from the assessment of goods and services tax made under the Excise Tax Act, notice of which is dated September 18, 1992 and bears number 1200887 is dismissed in accordance with the attached Reasons for Judgment.

REASONS FOR JUDGMENT

[para1] KEMPO T.C.J.:-- This informal procedure appeal was launched from an assessment made by the Minister of National Revenue (the "Minister") dated September 18, 1992 with respect to the appellant's goods and services tax ("GST") liability under the provisions of the Excise Tax Act (the "Act") for the period April 1, 1992 to June 30, 1992 in the amount of $4,311.31 which included tax on a self-supply respecting a newly constructed four-unit complex.

[para2] The core issue, simply put, was whether this complex, at the time of its substantial completion, was "intended to be registered" as a condominium within the meaning of subsection 123(1) of the Act. If so the self-supply provisions, which require the appellant to remit GST deemed collected from itself on the self-supply, would not apply.

[para3] The only witness who testified for the appellant was Mr. Hector Thibault. No witnesses were called for the respondent.

[para4] Mr. Thibault was a principal shareholder in St. Mary's Bay Construction Ltd. (hereafter called "St. Mary's Co.") and was experienced in residential construction in the Digby County area of Nova Scotia.

[para5] The appellant was formed as a partnership in 1991 by St. Mary's Co. and a Julien Comeau to build and operate a four-unit apartment building in Church Point, Digby County, Nova Scotia. Apparently Mr. Comeau owned the local building supply store. At all material times the appellant was registered under Part IX of the Act.

[para6] As a preliminary matter, a number of factual items assumed by the Minister were not seriously challenged by the appellant's counsel. These items were neither raised at trial nor addressed in the appellant's written submissions of fact and law which were forwarded to counsel and to the court following conclusion of the evidence. These facts were pleaded in the respondent's Reply to the appellant's Notice of Appeal as follows:

3. In so assessing the Appellant's tax liability, the Minister relied, inter alia, upon the facts admitted above and the following assumptions of facts:

- (a) The Appellant is a partnership and at all relevant times it was registered under Part IX of the Excise Tax Act (the "Act");
- (b) The Appellant contracted with St. Mary's Bay Construction Limited to construct a four-unit apartment complex (the "complex"), Nova Scotia;
- (c) St. Mary's Bay Construction Limited is related to the Appellant as it is a partner in the Appellant;
- (d) The complex was substantially completed on May 1, 1992;
- (e) Two of the apartment units were leased to residential tenants on a long term basis on May 15 and June 1, 1992, respectively and they were occupied at the time of the lease;
- (f) In order to be a condominium in the Province of Nova Scotia the complex must be registered by the Registrar of Condominiums pursuant to the Condominium Act of Nova Scotia and this had not been done as of January 15, 1993;
- (g) The fair market value of the complex as of the date of substantial completion was $215,000.00;
- (h) The Appellant claimed an input tax credit in the amount of $13,717.29 which was calculated as 7% of $195,961.00 (the Appellant's total expenditures on the complex, including land). The proper calculation of the input tax credit is as follows:

Total expenditures $195,961.00 Less: cost of land 27,000.00 ----- Net expenditures $168,961.00

Input tax credit (net expenditures times tax fraction of 7/107) $ 11,053.52

The cost of the land did not include a payment on account of tax and, consequently, the Appellant is not entitled to an input tax credit in relation to it.

3. The complex has never been registered as a condominium and continues to be used as a rental property by the Appellant.

[para7] In addition to the above, the following facts emerged from the evidence:

August, 1991 - plans were completed for the project as a four-unit apartment building;

September, 1991 - construction began by St. Mary's Co. under Mr. Thibault's direction;

October, 1991 - an American, Mr. Fougere, while visiting in the area, said he would be interested in buying one of the units in the form of a condominium. In response to this particular interest, and being of the opinion that a condominium development would be a good short-term business venture, the appellant decided to switch the nature of the project.

Mr. Thibault had no experience in condominium construction relative to its legal or structural requirements. Apparently condominiums were unknown in the vicinity. He took several steps to educate himself as to construction requirements and directed his solicitor to make inquiries as to the legalities. In the meantime construction continued as an apartment complex with changes being implemented as Mr. Thibault felt were necessary. Adjustments were made to result in four identically sized units with added amenities. The local building inspector was relied upon for advice as to condominium requirements.

February, 1992 - Building plans were redrafted by a professional to meet condominium specifications as more detailed blueprints were required. Except for minor revisions, the plans for the proposed units were substantially the same as the plans for the apartments.

March, 1992 - A construction finance loan of $100,000.00 was obtained with a mortgage given as collateral security. The construction was originally financed via partnership contributions.

April 2, 1992 - A "Condominium open house" for the 11th and 12th of April was advertised in the local paper.

Late April 1992 - Substantial completion of the project occurred. Condominium inspection officials attended the site for final inspection. Mr. Thibault then learned (for the first time) that the building did not meet the requirements of the fire code; thus the Fire Marshall's approval to register the plan as a condominium was refused. The estimate to meet these requirements amounted to approximately $20,000.00. If they had been known during the construction stage, the compliance amount would not have exceeded $5,000.00.

Mr. Thibault testified that the appellant was financially unable to do these renovations at this time and so, in order to improve the cash flow required to pay for the project, a decision was made to rent the units for a year or two and then do the necessary renovations.

May 15, 1992 - one unit was occupied and rented (no written lease was tendered in evidence).

June 1, 1992 - a second unit was occupied and rented (no written lease was provided);

- a further sum of $23,750.00 was borrowed from the Royal Bank and a mortgage of $123,750.00 was registered June 12, 1992. These additional funds went elsewhere and were not utilized in an attempt to remedy the fire code deficiencies.

September, 1992 - the other two units were rented.

November 25, 1992- An arbitration agreement was entered into respecting possible municipal liability for failure of one of its building inspectors to advise the appellant concerning fire code requirements and the Fire Marshall's approval.

January 15, 1993- A comprehensive arbitration report and ruling (exhibit A-1) was issued which found carelessness on both parties. The arbitrator held that responsibility for the situation be apportioned equally and that accordingly the Municipality was liable for damages to Mr. Thibault in the amount of $7,350.00.

September 7, 1994 (date of trial) - the fire code deficiencies were still outstanding and the project was not registered as a condominium.

[para8] Mr. Thibault was firm in his evidence that the project was intended to be a condominium onwards from October of 1991 and that it was at that time that a decision was made to convert a long-term investment into a short-term project.

[para9] Financing was via a builder's mortgage plus partnership equity. Apparently the land was provided by St. Mary's Co. and some building materials were provided by Mr. Comeau.

[para10] With respect to the appellant's attitude respecting the fire code requirements, Mr. Thibault's testimony was thusly:

On Direct Examination

A. The renovations would have been more than we could have stood.

Q. Okay. Do you know approximately how much it would have been?

A. Around twenty thousand bucks.

Q. So your decision was made to rent the units.

A. Yeah.

Q. Did you have an idea of when you felt you would be able to do those renovations?

A. No. No, we didn't.

Q. No. What was your intention in relation to them?

A. My -- basically -- my intention was basically to collect a little bit of rent, a year or two's rent, and then do the renovations.

Q. Was the option of not renting the units a possibility, an option?

A. No.

Q. And why wasn't it?

A. It was purely a business decision. We had no choice. We had to start making payments.

[T. p. 17, l. 25; p. 18, l. 18 to 19.]

On cross-examination

Q. So what did your other partners say when you said, "Well, we have to spend twenty thousand dollars ($20,000.00) in order to get this registered as condominium"?

A. I -- to tell you what he basically said, you know, "Let's ..." -- like I said before, "Let's try to gather a bit of money first and then change them then."

[...]

Q. Okay. Of course we know that it's never been registered as a condominium, has it?

A. No. No, it's never been. The intent was there but it's never been.

Q. Okay. Why hasn't it ever been registered?

A. It's never been because we need the approval from the Fire Marshall.

Q. And am I correct that you haven't done the changes?

A. No, we haven't. Q. Okay. Why?

A. The cost. Too -- I mean, it's too costly.

Q. Um-hmm.

A. We're up to the limit now in -- you know.

[para11] Respecting the extra borrowing of $23,750.00 in late May of 1992, Mr. Thibault's evidence on cross-examination was:

Q. What did you do with the twenty-three thousand extra dollars that you borrowed in June?

A. We -- what did we do. We --

Q. I mean, that was enough money to make all the changes that were necessary to convert this building into condominiums. A. Yeah, but that's not what it was used for.

Q. No, I know that. I was just wondering ---

A. I mean, it was used for overruns, it was used for a little bit of landscaping, a little bit of road. We ran out of water. We had to dig another well and that's what I presume that it was used for.

[para12] No business plans or projections were provided as to how the anticipated rental income would provide the needed cash to pay for the required renovations or where else these funds would likely come from within the reasonably foreseeable future. Paragraph 7 of the appellant's notice of appeal provides that "the rental income in this case has been minimal when considered in light of the size of the project and the expenses incurred by the appellant". On its face this admission points away from the rental income as being the future funding source for the fire code deficiencies.

Positions of the Parties

[para13] Appellant's counsel approached the issue in a three-fold way while respondent's counsel described it in a singular manner.

For the respondent:

Question: Whether at the time of substantial completion of the building, the appellant "intended" to register the building as a condominium.

[para14] The self-supply rules apply if no such intention existed. Subjectively expressed intent is not sufficient; actual steps and conduct operate as a better indicator of the true nature and existence of the purported intent; Pierce Investment Corp. v. M.N.R., 74 D.T.C. 6608 (FCTD) at 6612. Intention extends beyond simple contemplation; Cunliffe v. Goodman (1950), 1 All E.R. 720 (C.A.) at 724. A mere desire to have the project registered as a condominium does not translate into an intention.

[para16] Alternatively, if the project was a residential condominium unit, the subsection 191(1) self-supply rule of the Act ought to be applied to the two units leased before June 30, 1992.

For the appellant:

Questions: 1. Despite the subsection 191(2) provisions for residential condominium units, does subsection 168(5) respecting an unregistered condominium unit continue to be in effect provided the builder has a continuing intention to register the complex as a condominium?

[para17] The self-supply rules are intended to eliminate any advantage which may be gained by a builder as compared to a person who has purchased a newly constructed complex; therefore these rules are intended to catch any builder who purposefully fails or refuses to register the complex as a condominium. That is not the case here. The appellant had a bona fide intention throughout the period under review to register the complex as a condominium, and to this day it continues to hold that intention. Accordingly, GST should be paid only on the actual sale of the individual units after their registration as a condominium.

2. If the intention of a builder to develop and register a project as a condominium is frustrated by outside factors, how long does subsection 168(5) continue to supersede the effect of the subsection 191(2) self-supply provisions?

[para18] So long as the builder continues with the intent to register within a reasonable time, application of the self-supply rules would be held in abeyance. If these rules are applied too quickly, and not in accord with the true circumstances, an unfair burden is suffered by the taxpayer.

3. Did the appellant have an intention to develop and register a condominium and, if so, as of June 30, 1992, were there frustrating events sufficient to terminate their intentions and activate the self-supply rules?

[para19] The facts in evidence support a finding that the appellant had intended to develop and register a condominium project which was frustrated as of June 30, 1992 due to their financial inability to make the necessary changes in order to conform with the fire code requirements. The decision was to rent for cash flow and then to do the required renovations, which gives credence to the appellant's stated intentions to take the project to its intended registration. The decision was a business decision in response to the economic realities it was then facing. Any ambiguities within the Act's provisions ought to take these kinds of situations into account as well as the reality that a construction budget would exclude a self-supply GST cost in circumstances where a condominium complex was intended to be built with the expectation that such a tax would be collected from a purchaser and paid on the occasion of the sale of each unit.

Analysis

[para20] A builder of a "multiple unit residential complex" (which by definition excludes a condominium complex) is deemed, pursuant to subsection 191(3) of the Act, to have made a supply to itself on the later of the day of substantial completion of the project and the day on which a unit of the project is leased for occupancy. The effect of this provision and subsection 221(1) of the Act is to require the appellant to remit GST deemed collected on itself on the self-supply.

[para21] A "condominium complex" is defined by subsection 123(1) to be "... a residential complex that contains more than one residential condominium unit". In turn, the term "residential condominium unit" is defined by subsection 123(1) to be a "... residential complex that is, or is intended to be, a bounded space in a building designated or described as a separate unit on a registered condominium or strata lot plan or description, or a similar plan or description registered under the laws of a province, and includes any interest in land pertaining to ownership of the unit".

[para22] The essential problem in this appeal is due to the ambiguity of the phrase "is intended to be". Its resolution ought to arise out of application of the general principles of statutory interpretation in construing the particular provisions of the Act raised in this appeal. They should be reflected upon as a whole having regard to their intent, object and spirit and what it is they actually accomplish; Stubart Investments Limited v. The Queen, 84 D.T.C. 6305 (S.C.C.). The approach to be employed ought to be functional, purposeful or teleological: Québec (Communauté urbaine) v. Corp. Notre-Dame de Bon-Secours (September 30, 1994, file no. 23014 - S.C.C.) and not results oriented: Tennant v. The Queen, 94 D.T.C. 6505 (F.C.A.), nor purely mechanical: The Queen v. Swantje (September 26, 1994, A-144-94, F.C.A.).

[para23] As the three month period under review to which the GST liability has been attached ended on 30 June 1992, it is the latter date to which the appellant's intentions are to be focused. To find otherwise would, in my opinion, be unworkable. Self-Supply Rules

[para24] The Minister assessed the appellant for taxes owing on the deemed self-supply of a multiple unit residential complex under subsection 191(3) of the Act. This provision states:

191(3) For the purposes of this Part, where

(a) the construction or substantial renovation of a multiple unit residential complex is substantially completed,

(b) the builder of the complex

(i) gives possession of any residential unit in the complex to a particular person under a lease, licence or similar arrangement entered into for the purpose of its occupancy by an individual as a place of residence and the particular person is not a purchaser under an agreement of purchase and sale of the complex, or

(ii) ..., and

(c) the builder, the particular person or an individual who is a tenant or licensee of the particular person is the first individual to occupy a residential unit in the complex as a place of residence after substantial completion of the construction or renovation,

the builder shall be deemed

(d) to have made and received, at the later of the time the construction or substantial renovation is substantially completed and the time possession of the unit is so given to the particular person or the unit is so occupied by the builder, a taxable supply by way of sale of the complex, and

(e) to have paid as a recipient and to have collected as a supplier, at the later of those time, tax in respect of the supply calculated on the fair market value of the complex at the later of those times.

[para25] As noted earlier, "multiple unit residential complex" excludes a condominium complex. Prima facie then the appellant's situation comes within this provision: the project was substantially completed on 1 May 1992; the appellant leased the units to residential tenants who were not purchasers under an agreement of purchase and sale; and these tenants were the first individuals to occupy the units as a place of residence. Therefore, the appellant is statutorily deemed to have made and received a taxable supply by way of sale, and to have paid and collected GST in respect of the supply.

[para26] However the appellant submitted that if the self-supply rules are to apply, the proper one is subsection 191(2) and not 191(3) relied upon by the Minister because the former deals specifically with the self-supply of a "residential condominium unit". As noted earlier, this phrase is defined by subsection 123(1) which is repeated for greater clarity and convenience:

123(1) In section 121, this Part and Schedules V, VI and VII,

"residential condominium unit" means a residential complex that is, or is intended to be, a bounded space in a building designated or described as a separate unit on a registered condominium or strata lot plan or description, or a similar plan or description registered under the laws of a province, and includes any interest in land pertaining to ownership of the unit; [emphasis added]

[para27] Subsection 191(2) of the Act is directed to a situation where the builder of a condominium unit gives possession of the unit under an agreement of purchase and sale. It reads:

191(2) For the purposes of this Part, where

- (a) the construction or substantial renovation of a residential condominium unit is substantially completed,
- (b) the builder of the unit gives possession of the unit to a particular person who is the purchaser under an agreement of purchase and sale of the unit at a time when the condominium complex in which the unit is situated is not registered as a condominium,
- (c) the particular person or an individual who is a tenant or licensee of the particular person is the first individual to occupy the unit as a place of residence after substantial completion of the construction or renovation, and
- (d) the agreement of purchase and sale is at any time terminated (otherwise than by performance of the agreement) and another agreement of purchase and sale of the unit between the builder and the particular person is not entered into at that time, the builder shall be deemed

- (e) to have made and received, at the time the agreement is terminated, a taxable supply by way of sale of the unit, and
- (f) except where possession of the unit was transferred to the particular person before 1991, to have paid as a recipient and to have collected as a supplier, at that time, tax in respect of the supply calculated on the fair market value of the unit at that time.

[para28] No ambiguity exists facially within subsection 191(2); the unit must be characterized as a condominium unit and the occupant must be a purchaser pursuant to an agreement of purchase and sale. This provision's latter requirement is not the appellant's situation on June 30th, 1992 and the former is the subject issue raised respecting this appeal. In effect the appellant's interpretation is that GST liability should be held in abeyance while its intention to register the project as a condominium remains under serious and active consideration and then, once done, the GST would be payable on the occasion of the sale of each unit.

[para29] The first matter to be examined therefore is whether the two units in the appellant's project that were rented by June 30, 1992 may each be characterized as a residential condominium unit within the provisions of subsection 191(2) and as defined by subsection 123(1) supra.

[para30] In my opinion, the appellant has established it had the requisite intention to build condominiums in the fall of 1991. Its solicitor was instructed in October 1991 to initiate proceedings to have the project registered; blueprints for the project were redrawn containing more detail in order to comply with legislative condominium requirements; an advertisement in the local newspaper announced the project as a condominium; and condominium officials visited the complex in the spring of 1992. The issue, however, is whether the requisite intention existed on June 30, 1992.

[para31] In the spring of 1992 it became apparent to the appellant that the project did not meet fire code specifications which were required for registration. The necessary renovations would cost nearly $20,000. Mr. Thibault testified that the appellant could not afford these renovations; thus, it was decided to "collect a little bit of rent, a year or two's rent, and then do the renovations". He said it was to this end that one unit was rented in May 1992 and another in June 1992. The remaining units were rented in September 1992. Facially at least this tends to show the appellant had technically abandoned its intention to proceed with the registration of the condominiums until money was raised to do the renovations. In other words, on June 30th, 1992, the appellant did not intend the residential complex to be "a bounded space designated or described as a separate unit on a registered condominium plan"; rather, it intended to rent the residential complex out as a multiple unit residential complex until such times as it could afford to do the renovations.

[para32] This may be too strict an approach to be brought to the situation because the phrase "intended to be", when given its ordinary meaning, does signify contemplation or an intention to do something at some time in the future. However in my opinion the scheme of the GST provisions, upon being viewed in totality, augurs against such a broad and open-ended meaning to be assigned to that phrase.

[para33] The object and purpose of section 191 of the Act is to ensure GST liability attaches to newly constructed or substantially renovated residential premises based on its fair market value once they are rented or occupied because any subsequent sale would generally be GST exempt as used housing. Accordingly it may reasonably be inferred that the phrase being interpreted requires more than a mere contemplation, desire or wish or a simple willing of the happening of a future event. Lord Asquith in a landlord/tenant situation in the case of Cunliffe v. Goodman (1950), 1 All E.R. 720, (C.A) observed at page 724:

[...] An "intention", to my mind, connotes a state of affairs which the party "intending" - I will call him X. - does more than merely contemplate. It connotes a state of affairs which, on the contrary, he decides, so far as in him lies, to bring about, and which, in point of possibility, he has a reasonable prospect of being able to bring about by his own act of volition. X. cannot, with any due regard to the English language, be said to "intend" a result which is wholly beyond the control of his will. [...]

If there is a sufficiently formidable succession of fences to be surmounted before the result X. aims at can be achieved, it may well be unmeaning to say that X. "intended" that result. ... This leads me to the second point bearing on the existence in this case of "intention" as opposed to mere contemplation. Not merely is the term "intention" unsatisfied if the person professing it has too many hurdles to overcome or too little control of events; it is equally inappropriate if at the material date that person is in effect not deciding to proceed but feeling his way and reserving his decision until he shall be in possession of financial data sufficient to enable him to determine whether the project will be commercially worthwhile. A purpose so qualified and suspended does not, in my view, amount to an "intention" or "decision" within the principle. It is mere contemplation until the materials necessary to a decision on the commercial merits are available and have resulted in such a decision. ...

[para34] Having regard to the object and purpose of the applicable provisions of the Act, I am of the opinion that the phrase "intended to be" for the subsection 123(1) definitional meaning of the phrase "residential condominium unit" connotes:

- a firm, fixed and settled intention (as distinct from a provisional one) which is not likely to be changed;
- objectively meeting the test of having reasonable prospects of bringing the stated intention into fruition or fulfilment within a reasonable time;
- a decision made being beyond the zones of contemplation and conditional dependence on future events.

[para35] In the case at bar the appellant has not shown that it was capable of carrying out its intent within a reasonable time from June 30, 1992. At best the business decision made was then conditional or provisional, being tied into whether there would be sufficient cash flow from the rentals. One does not know if lack of market strength was a factor in the decision to defer, and the answer given respecting the deployment of the $23,750.00 in funds received during June of 1992 elsewhere than toward the rectification of the fire code requirements was vague and unsatisfactory.

[para36] I do not agree that the principles underlying matters of commercial "frustration" would apply here because the fire code requirements would not meet the tests of having been unforeseeable and uncontrollable. In this respect, hardship, inconvenience, or extra expense are not in themselves sufficient. The appellant's situation was more akin to commercial impracticability on June 30th, 1992. When analyzed objectively the decision to register the project as a condominium sometime in the future was made on a financial wait-and-see basis with rentals to be taken in the meantime; this situation still exists. Clearly the ability to bring the intended course of action into fruition was and remained conditional and depended heavily on the appellant's future financial capabilities. As noted earlier, no evidence was tendered on this subject.

[para37] The appellant submitted further that subsection 168(5) of the Act should be taken into account with respect to the situation as a whole. Section 168 of the Act deals with the timing of GST payments on a taxable supply. The general rule, under subsection 168(1), is that GST is payable on the earlier of the day on which consideration is paid and the day on which consideration becomes due. However there are a number of specific exceptions to this rule. An exception for the sale of real property occurs in subsection 168(5) of the Act thusly:

168(5) Notwithstanding subsections (1) and (2), tax under this Division in respect of a taxable supply of real property by way of sale is payable

(a) in the case of a supply of a residential condominium unit where possession of the unit is transferred, after 1990 and before the condominium complex in which the unit is situated is registered as a condominium, to the recipient under the agreement for the supply, on the earlier of the day ownership of the unit is transferred to the recipient and the day that is sixty days after the day the condominium complex is registered as a condominium; and

(b) in any other case, on the earlier of the day ownership of the property is transferred to the recipient and the day possession of the property is transferred to the recipient under the agreement for the supply.

[para38] Subsection 165(5) applies to the payment of GST in respect of a taxable supply of real property by way of sale. The term "sale" is defined in subsection 123(1) as follows: "sale", in respect of property, includes any transfer of the ownership of the property and a transfer of the possession of the property under an agreement to transfer ownership of the property;

A sale involves the transfer of both ownership and possession of the property. In the case of a lease or rental of real property there is no transfer of ownership of the property; thus there is no "sale". Additionally this provision is of no assistance to the appellant in view of my determination that the two units rented before June 30th, 1992 were not residential condominium units.

Decision

[para39] For the reasons given, and regrettably for the appellant, the appeal is dismissed.

Gary Grimme, Plaintiff (Defendant by Counter Claim), and Dorothee Kasierski, Defendant (Plaintiff by Counter Claim), and Hans Kasierski, Defendant by Counter Claim

Action No. 48842/90 Ontario Court of Justice - General Division Toronto, Ontario Hayes J. February 14, 1991

Milton J. Bernstein, for the Plaintiff (Defendant by Counter Claim). Paul S. Pellman, for the Defendant (Plaintiff by Counter Claim). HAYES J.:-- In this matter the plaintiff was a personal friend of the defendant and her husband the defendant by counter-claim. The plaintiff on or about June 20, 1989 purchased from the defendant's husband, Hans Kasierski, by way of an assignment, Hans Kasierski's right to purchase a condominium namely Suite 504 - 251 Queen's Quay West, Toronto.

Hans Kasierski had acquired this right by way of an assignment from Al Scott dated May, 11, 1987 for the sum of $325,000.00 with an initial deposit of $19,500.00 and a Letter of Credit for $19,500.00 which would become due when the purchaser was able to receive title by a duly executed deed or grant.

The right to purchase assigned by Scott was acquired by him by way of an Agreement of Purchase and Sale dated August 29, 1984 with a developer Admiralty Hotel Group.

Hans Kasierski and his wife Dorothee Kasierski occupied the condominium under the occupation agreement on or about August 1987.

The plaintiff closed the purchase of the condominium unit as required by the Agreement of Purchase and Sale on June 28, 1989. The defendant was in possession at the time of the closing and she has refused to vacate the premises. The defendant was not asked to consent to the assignment from Hans Kasierski to the plaintiff and she refuses to consent.

The Honourable Madam Justice Arbour in November 28, 1989 upon hearing the application and counter-application and the evidence filed on behalf of the parties directed that there would be a trial of the issues and the parties were to produce and file a Statement of Claim and a Statement of Defence. The pleadings and her Order would constitute the record in this matter.

The court further ordered that service of the counter application was to be effected on the respondent Hans Kasierski by personal service on his solicitor Larry Todd of Holden, Murdoch & Finlay. Service was effected and the respondent Hans Kasierski has not filed any reply to the counter application. I am advised by counsel for the defendant that Hans Kasierski has been advised of the trial date by communicating that information to his solicitor Larry Todd. Hans Kasierski has not appeared at the trial and no one has attended to represent him. Therefore in view of the above notice in accordance with the Order and the failure of Hans Kasierski to respond and/or attend or be represented the trial of the issues proceeded in his absence.

In this action the plaintiff claims:

- (a) possession of the premises municipally known as Suite 504 - 251 Queen's Quay West, Toronto;
- (b) a declaration that the defendant herein is unlawfully occupying the said premises;
- (c) a declaration that the plaintiff is a sole owner of the said premises without any claim or lien thereon by the defendant, or in the alternative,
- (d) an order dispensing with the defendant's consent to the assignment of an Agreement of Purchase and Sale regarding the said premises;
- (e) damages for wrongful occupation of the said premises by the defendant;
- (f) an interim order requiring the defendant to pay to the plaintiff his costs for taxes, condominium maintenance fees, and mortgage payments, and utility payments for the said premises while the defendant has been in occupation thereof.
- (g) the plaintiff's costs of these proceedings.

The defendant requests dismissal of the action and counter-claims for a declaration that she is lawfully in possession, a declaration setting aside and declaring void the assignment between her husband and the plaintiff, and a declaration that the defendant is entitled to a one-half interest in the condominium and other relief as set out in the counter-claim.

The parties have filed an agreed Statement of Facts and on the basis of those admissions and the viva voce evidence the court finds the facts to be as follows:

1. Hans and Dorothee Kasierski were married on the 23rd day of May, 1966.
2. Hans and Dorothee Kasierski separated on or about the 19th of March, 1988. At the time of the separation they were residing at 251 Queen's Quay West, Suite 504, Toronto. Counsel have agreed that this condominium was matrimonial property.
3. In 1973 Hans and Dorothee Kasierski purchased the property at 130 Glenrose Avenue, Toronto, as joint tenants. Their solicitor was Harold Wolfe.
4. In 1987 the property at Glenrose Avenue was sold for $540,000.00. Hans Kasierski did not tell his wife that he had listed the property for sale. Their solicitor was Harold Wolfe.
5. From the proceeds of the sale of the Glenrose Avenue property $301,000.00 was placed in Treasury Bills at the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce. These Treasury Bills were subsequently used as security for a business loan obtained by Hans Kasierski for the operation of his business, a car dealership.

6. Dorothee Kasierski was aware of this loan arrangement and she attended at the bank to execute documents after she had had independent legal advice with respect to the effect of the transaction on their place of residence (the condominium) and her liability in respect of the transaction.

7. Dorothee Kasierski admitted in cross-examination that Mr. Feldman (who gave her independent legal advice with respect to the security to the bank with the Treasury Bills) told her that the bank could come and take her home. She has stated that she knew it was a business loan of her husband, that she would be liable and that they were pledging the Treasury Bills to the bank.

8. The defendant Hans Kasierski signed an Agreement of Purchase and Sale for the above condominium unit on May 12, 1987 with Al Scott for $325,000.00 with a cash deposit of $19,500.00 and a Letter of Credit for $19,500.00. 9. Hans and Dorothee Kasierski took occupancy of the above-mentioned condominium in or about the month of August 1987. The Agreement of Purchase and Sale with Al Scott only names Hans Kasierski as the purchaser. The defendant is not a party to the agreement. There is no evidence that the condominium was to be held as a joint tenancy.

Hans Kasierski was having financial problems in his business and on or about November 1987 Dorothee Kasierski was told by her husband that he was in arrears in respect of the payment of occupation rent for the condominium. The arrears of occupation rent paid by the plaintiff on closing amounted to $21,921.44 which had accrued at the rate of approximately $2,551.00 per month.

10. The defendant admitted in cross-examination that she knew if the deal with Al Scott didn't close they would lose their condominium home.

11. The plaintiff was aware that the condominium was being occupied by Hans and Dorothee Kasierski as their home, and that she was the sole occupant of the condominium at the time of the assignment from Hans Kasierski.

12. Harold Wolfe acted as a solicitor for Hans Kasierski on the proposed purchase of the condominium, he was the solicitor for the plaintiff and Hans Kasierski on the assignment to the plaintiff, and he acted for the plaintiff in the purchase of the condominium.

13. The plaintiff had conversations with Dorothee Kasierski on a number of occasions prior to the closing of the purchase of the condominium and prior to the assignment at which time he advised her of the possible difficulty of her husband being unable to close the condominium deal. The defendant, Dorothee Kasierski, maintained in her evidence that she thought the Treasury Bills would be available to purchase the condominium and that the bank would take a mortgage on the condominium as security for the business loan of her husband.

14. Hans Kasierski first approached the plaintiff on June 16, 1989 to purchase the assignment of the condo right of purchase as he was without funds to close. In the meantime Hans Kasierski had listed the condominium for sale without consulting his wife, but she was aware its the listing as she co-operated by allowing people into see the condominium.

The plaintiff was of the opinion that Hans Kasierski had made some unwise business, decisions. Hans Kasierski on a previous occasion came to the plaintiff on short notice for a loan of approximately $250,000.00 for his business. The plaintiff arranged the funds for Kasierski. In addition Hans Kasierski had previously entered into an agreement to purchase another condominium and also purchased a boat. The plaintiff had advised the defendant of her husband's serious financial problems and this would include the condominium. A few days before the closing date for the purchase of the condominium Hans Kasierski approached the plaintiff again about purchasing his interest in the condominium for the same price as he had paid.

15. The plaintiff agreed and an assignment was drawn up by Harold Wolfe representing both parties. In addition, the plaintiff signed an acknowledgment that the defendant was in possession and he would have to take his own steps to have her removed from the condominium.

The court accepts the evidence of the plaintiff that he was aware that the defendant was in possession at the time he authorized the closing of the purchase, but he was not aware of any problems with respect to the provisions of the Family Law Act and he had no idea it was a "matrimonial home". The acknowledgment signed by the plaintiff drafted by Harold B. Wolfe and directed to Harold B. Wolfe, indicates Mrs. Kasierski is in possession and it will be his (the plaintiff's) responsibility to obtain possession after closing, but it makes no reference to any problems which might arise by reason of the provisions of the Family Law Act. Reference to the Family Law Act was in Mr. Wolfe's reporting letter to the plaintiff of August 28, 1989.

16. The defendant was not told by her husband of the assignment of the right to purchase the condominium to the plaintiff, nor was she told by the plaintiff, the bank, or the lawyer.

17. The defendant knew that her husband was in arrears in respect of the occupation rent, that the condominium deal was to close on June 28 from the material placed under her door from the vendor and from what she learned through her employment with the condominium corporation. She was also aware that her husband was in financial difficulty and had not paid the occupancy rent since November of 1988. She did not make enquiries of her husband, the bank, or the lawyer. She maintains throughout her evidence that her husband looked after those things. She made no enquiries about the closing from April 1989 to June 28, 1989 when the transaction closed. This was at a time when she knew that if the deal didn't close they would lose their condominium home.

18. The defendant admitted in cross-examination that the bank took all of the money after the condominium deal was closed by the plaintiff, and as her husband owed approximately $400,000.00 to the bank, they demanded money from her, but she has now settled with the bank.

19. When asked how she would close the transaction if she were restored to her position as of June 28, her answer was that somebody would help her. No evidence has been led on behalf of the defendant which would disclose any realistic possibility of her having available to her the resources by way of mortgage or otherwise to purchase the condominium. In addition she was not a party to the assignment from Scott.

20. The parties agree that the property had been listed by Hans Kasierski for $595,000.00 and thereafter $459,000.00. In addition it is admitted that an offer was made to purchase the property for $525,000.00 near the closing date. It is agreed that presently the property is valued at between $425,000.00 and $450,000.00.

21. The defendant has continued to reside in the condominium and has not paid any rent, hydro, taxes, or heat, and prior to the closing date her husband was in arrears of occupation rent in the amount of $21,921.41.

Re: Matrimonial Home

The parties agree that the condominium was a matrimonial home of Hans Kasierski and Dorothee Kasierski within the provisions of Part II of the Family Law Act.

They were occupying the premises under the terms of an occupancy agreement dated August 29, 1984 between Al Scott and Admiralty Point Hotel, and an Agreement of Purchase and Sale between Hans Kasierski. and Al Scott dated May 12, 1987 with the purchase price from Scott being $325,000.00. In addition Hans Kasierski acquired the rights of Al Scott under the Agreement of Purchase and Sale between Scott and the Admiralty Hotel Group dated August 29, 1984.

The relationship between the vendor and purchaser in the purchase of a condominium has been determined by the Divisional Court in Re W.B. Sullivan Construction Limited and Barker et al. (1977), 14 O.R. (2d) 529. Judgment was rendered by Cory, J. concurred in by Reid, J., O'Leary, J. dissenting, and leave to appeal was refused by the Ontario Court of Appeal and again by the Supreme Court of Canada.

In this matter the Divisional Court ruled that the provisions of the Residential Premises Rent Review Act, 1975, applied to the relationship between vendor and purchaser of a condominium where the purchaser was in possession under an occupation agreement.

In the judgment of Cory, J., as he then was, it was stated at p. 547 and following quote:

"It would appear that the proposed purchaser of a condominium unit cannot prior to registration, acquire a beneficial interest in the lands upon which the unit is situated. Nor does the proposed purchaser become cestui que trust for the vendor for the period prior to registration. The proposed purchaser is thus in a substantially different position from the purchaser of any other interest in real property: Irvine v. Macaulay (1897), 24 O.A.R. 446 at pp. 450-451

It is quite correct to say in the ordinary situation, that the purchaser of the real property who goes into possession prior to closing, will be called upon in the usual course of events to pay interest on the unpaid balance of the purchase monies to the date of closing. In such a situation, the purchaser has resort to the equitable remedy of specific performance to force the completion of the transaction. A purchaser of the proposed condominium unit does not have a similar equitable right and does not have the remedy of specific performance available to him. It is clear that the completion of the proposed purchase is dependent upon the registration of certain documentation and the actions of entities that are not parties to the contract. The requirements of registration are essential and cannot be waived by either party, and thus specific performance could not be awarded.

The consideration for occupation by a purchaser of a proposed condominium unit is governed by the contract, in this case by Clause or Section 21. Again, it should be noted that the consideration for occupation is termed a 'rental payment' and is not to be applied upon the purchase price.

It would appear that in this situation there are two relationships that exist between the parties to the contract - that of vendor and purchaser, and also that of landlord and tenant.

Prior to the consummation of the sale agreement, there is a hiatus wherein the existing or dominant relationship can only be that of landlord and tenant. For a significant number of months money is paid that is termed 'the rent' or 'occupancy rent' which is not applicable to the sale price. There is a provision for the termination of the agreement and all relationships between the parties. To all intents and purposes, the respondent occupiers of the premises can be nothing but monthly tenants during this period.

At the time of the assignment of the right to purchase the condominium from Hans Kasierski to the plaintiff, Hans Kasierski stated in the assignment dated June 20, 1989 that he was unable to close the purchase with Al Scott.

In addition Hans Kasierski was also in default for occupation rent in the amount of approximately $21,900.00.

The defendant has expressed a hope that someone might have helped her to purchase the condominium, but no evidence has been called to support that proposition. It is clearly an unrealistic position and in addition it is to be observed that she is not a party to the agreement to purchase the condominium. As a result of the above mentioned inability of Hans Kasierski to close the purchase and in addition his default in occupation rent, his interest and that of the defendant in the matrimonial home would have been extinguished.

Sale Of Matrimonial Home

Hans Kasierski listed the condominium for sale at $595,000.00 as disclosed by the listing information filed as an exhibit in this action, and the offering price was reduced to $559,000.00 by a subsequent listing agreement.

After attempting to persuade the plaintiff to purchase his interest in the condominium on two occasions, Hans Kasierski made an assignment, of his right to purchase the condominium to the plaintiff by an Assignment Agreement dated June 20, 1989. This was at a time when all parties knew the closing date for the purchase was June 28, 1989.

The agreement did not provide for any increase in the purchase price over and above that which was to have been paid by Hans Kasierski namely $325,000.00 plus any amounts for occupation rent and other charges which became the liability of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff paid on closing the purchase of the condominium (including legal fees of $2,750.00), a total of $355,949.40.

The parties have agreed that an offer was made by another person to purchase the property for the sum of $525,000.00 on or around the closing date.

Therefore Hans Kasierski disposed of the matrimonial home for an amount approximately $170,000.00 less than the value thereof (subject to the deduction of any costs of sale, arrears of occupation rent, and other adjustments properly referable to the sale).

Status Of Assignment From Kasierski To Grimme

The assignment of the right to purchase the condominium from Kasierski to Grimme dated June 20, 1989, was not consented to by the defendant.

The plaintiff signed an acknowledgment to Harold B. Wolfe (who was the solicitor for both Grimme and Kasierski in this matter) which stated among other things that:

"I further acknowledge that the property is presently occupied by Mrs. Hans Kasierski and that I will not be receiving vacant possession on closing and that it is my full responsibility to obtain vacant possession of the premises after closing proceeding with court action for possession at my own expense."

The plaintiff having admitted that the property was a matrimonial home and having acknowledged that the defendant was in possession testified that Harold Wolfe did not advise him of the family law problems and that he discovered them afterwards. Harold Wolfe wrote a reporting letter to the plaintiff dated August 28, 1989 indicating that title was subject to, "any claim under the Family Law Act which Dorothee Kasierski may be able to advance." No specific mention was made in the acknowledgment drafted by Mr. Wolfe of the potential problems under the Family Law Act.

There is an allegation in the pleadings that the plaintiff and the defendant's husband conspired each with the other to injure and harm the defendant in that they kept the defendant from getting her share of the equity of the condominium unit.

The court has reviewed all of the evidence and documents filed. The above allegation is not supported by the evidence. The plaintiff declined to purchase the condominium when it was first offered to him by Hans Kasierski.

The plaintiff has indicated that he agreed to purchase from Hans Kasierski when he came to him within a few days of the date for the closing of the transaction as at that time he had decided to occupy the unit himself until another condominium unit he had purchased was completed.

The Family Law Act provides as follows:

"S. 19-(1) Both spouses have an equal right to possession of a matrimonial home.

-(2) When only one of the spouses has an interest in a matrimonial home the other spouse's right of possession,

(a) is personal against the first spouse;"

"S. 21-(1) No spouse shall dispose of or encumber an interest in a matrimonial home unless,

(a) the other spouse joins in the instrument or consents to the transaction;"

A transaction disposing of a matrimonial home by the spouse having title without the consent of a non-titled spouse is not void but merely liable to be set aside (See Bank of Montreal v. Norton (1983), 44 O.R. (2d) 39 and Re Kozub and Timko 45 O.R. (2d) 558 (Ont. C.A.)).

Sec. 19(2) of the Family Law Act provides when only one spouse has an interest in a matrimonial home, the other spouse's right of possession, is personal as against the first spouse. The court can either authorize individual transactions or release the property from the provisions of the application of Part II of the Family Law Act (Sec Rocha v. Rocha (1981), 23 R.F.L. (2d) 366 (Ont. H.C.)).

The defendant by an Order of Master Cork dated July 7, 1989 obtained exclusive possession of the condominium unit. This Order was made at a time when the plaintiff had closed the purchase of the condominium unit and title had been transferred from the vendor Admiral Hotel Group to the plaintiff.

Prior to the closing of the transaction Hans Kasierski was a month to month tenant (who was in arrears of occupation rent to the extent of approximately $20,000.00) and he was the assignee of a right to purchase the condominium unit under Agreement of Purchase and Sale between Al Scott and the Admiral Hotel Group. Upon the evidence it is clear Hans Kasierski was without funds to close the purchase and could not pay the occupation rent. In addition the defendant did not have any financial ability to complete the purchase if she had wished to continue to occupy the matrimonial home.

Conclusion In all of the circumstances there will be an order authorizing the transaction between the plaintiff and Hans Kasierski by way of the Assignment Agreement dated June 20, 1989 and there will be an order dispensing with any consent that might have been required of the defendant to the Assignment.

There will be a declaration that the plaintiff is the sole owner and entitled to vacant possession of the premises and the defendant is directed to vacate the premises on or before 30 days from the date of entry of this judgment. In default of vacating the premises within that time a Writ of Possession may issue to remove the defendant from the premises.

The order of Master Cork dated July 7, 1989 granting the defendant exclusive possession will be set aside.

The plaintiff's claim for a declaration setting aside and declaring void the assignment between the plaintiff and her husband is not allowed.

The plaintiff claims damages for wrongful occupation by the defendant. The plaintiff at the time of the purchase signed an acknowledgment that he was not receiving vacant possession and it was his full responsibility to obtain vacant possession proceeding with court action at his own expense.

In these circumstances the plaintiff's claim for damages for wrongful occupation is dismissed.

The defendant in her counter-claim by way of alternative relief claims damages against the plaintiff and her husband for the difference between the purchase price (claimed to be $325,000.00) and the value of the condominium on June 28, 1989.

The act of selling the property was that of the husband and I do not find any evidence to support a claim for damages against the plaintiff.

The husband as the assignee of the right to purchase the condominium must not dispose of that interest (which was matrimonial property) for a price which would adversely affect the value of the defendant's interest therein in any determination of net family property under Part I of the Family Law Act.

If the value of the matrimonial property that is, the condominium, on June 28, 1989 was more than that for which it was sold to the plaintiffs the court directs that the defendant Dorothee Kasierski shall have judgment against Hans Kasierski for damages in the amount of 50% of the net credit he would have received had the sale been made at that price.

Therefore there will be an order for a reference to the Master on the counter-claim to:

(a) determine the value of the condominium unit on June 28, 1989; the Master may wish to consider that the parties have agreed there was an offer to purchase the property for $525,000.00 at approximately the closing date of June 28, 1989. There is also an admission that the property has a present value of between $425,000.00 and $450,000.00;

(b) if the property had been sold at that time determine the net proceeds of the sale which would have accrued to Hans Kasierski;

(c) in the determination of the net credit there should, among other things, be deducted the occupation rent owed by Hans Kasierski on June 28, 1989, and any other costs or deductions that the Master considers appropriate;

(d) if there is a net credit in favour of Hans Kasierski, if the property had been sold at the value determined by the Master, the Master is to determine 50% of the amount of the net credit.

Upon the net credit having been determined judgment will issue against the husband in favour of the wife, Dorothee Kasierski, for damages in the amount of 50% of the net credit.

The defendant will have her costs of the counter-claim and the reference to the Master against Hans Kasierski on a solicitor-client basis.

In view of the plaintiff's understanding of the basis on which he purchased the property as set out in his acknowledgment to Harold Wolfe, there will be no costs of his action against the defendant.

If the master determines that there would be a net credit as referred to above there will be prejudgment interest on the judgment in favour of Dorothee Kasierski at the rate provided in the Courts of Justice Act from June 20, 1989 (the date of the assignment from Hans Kasierski to the plaintiff). There will be post judgment interest at the rate provided for from the date of this order.

Carleton Condominium Corporation No. 109 v. Tartan Development Corporation et al.*

22 O.R. (3d) 718

Action No. 16389/90 and 71229/93

Ontario Court (General Division), Sedgwick J. March 8, 1995

MOTION under Rule 21 for the determination of questions of law. James Davidson, for plaintiffs.

Jeremy Wright, for defendants, Tartan Development Corp. and Tibor M. Gatszegi.

SEDGWICK J.: -- This motion is brought jointly pursuant to Rule 21 of the Rules of Civil Procedure for the determination of certain questions of law raised by the statement of claim issued on March 8, 1990, as amended.

The plaintiff ("CCC 109") is a condominium corporation to which the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.26, applies. CCC 109 came into existence upon registration of a declaration and description on May 9, 1977. It is a residential condominium including 100 low-rise dwelling units in 11 separate "blocks" or buildings and the related common elements (the "Condominium").

The defendant Tartan Development Corporation ("Tartan") is an Ontario corporation which was the declarant of CCC 109 and the developer and vendor of the units and related common elements in the Condominium. The defendant Tibor Gatszegi ("Gatszegi") was the architect for the Condominium. He was an employee and vice-president of Tartan.

The defendant R.J. Nicol Construction (1975) Ltd. was the builder of the Condominium. It is not a party to this motion. It is bankrupt.

In the statement of claim, CCC 109 alleges deficiencies in the construction of the Condominium on behalf of itself and all owners in the Condominium and seeks damages against the defendants for breach of express or implied warranties as to construction of the Condominium and for negligence in design, construction and supervision of construction of the Condominium.

The parties have requested the court to determine the following questions of law:

1(a) Has the enactment of the Ontario New Home Warranties Plan Act terminated the common law implied warranties of fitness for new homes in Ontario? 2(a) In order for a condominium corporation to assert claims based upon these common law implied warranties, must the corporation establish that, as of the date of issuance of the statement of claim, at least one of the unit owners in the condominium was an "original purchaser"? For the purpose of this question, an "original purchaser" is a person who entered into an agreement of purchase and sale before construction was complete.

(b) Further, in the case of a condominium property, is construction "complete" for this purpose if the unit described in the agreement of purchase and sale is complete, or is construction complete only when the unit and all of the common elements appurtenant to the unit are also complete?

3. Can the condominium corporation concurrently pursue a claim in tort (i.e. based upon negligent design, construction or supervision of construction) as against the developer/declarant, employees of the developer/ declarant, builder, architect or others involved in the original construction of the condominium?

4. What is the limitation period and commencement date of same applicable to any such claims in tort or for breach of warranty brought by a condominium corporation?

Question (1)

At common law, certain warranties are implied by law in favour of the purchaser of a residence which is not completely constructed when the purchaser agrees to buy it. These include warranties that the residence will be completed in a workmanlike manner and will be fit for habitation: Carleton Condominium Corp. No. 11 v. Shenkman Corp. (1985), 49 O.R. (2d) 194, 14 D.L.R. (4th) 571 (H.C.J.).

In 1976, the Ontario legislature enacted the Ontario New Home Warranties Plan Act, now R.S.O. 1990, c. O.31. Under s. 13 of the Act, statutory warranties (quite similar in effect) were introduced for the benefit of "owners" of "homes" against "vendors", all terms as defined elsewhere in the Act. Subsection (6) of section 13 of the Act reads: 13(6) The warranties set out in subsection (1) apply despite any agreement or waiver to the contrary and are in addition to any other rights the owner may have and to any other warranty agreed upon.

By the enactment of the statutory warranties, did the Ontario legislature intend to take away the common law rights of purchasers of uncompleted residences to rely on implied warranties?

I do not think so. In my view, the right to rely on the implied common law warranties is expressly preserved by the words "and in addition to any other rights the owner may have" in s. 13(6) of the Act.

Section 13 of the Act must be viewed in the context of the entire Act which, among other things, established a guarantee fund to provide compensation for owners of homes for breach of the statutory warranties, for ready access to the fund by owners and which extended the benefit of the statutory warranties to owners of new homes (not protected by the common law implied warranties). Therefore, the answer to Question 1 is that the common law warranties remain available to purchasers of uncompleted residences in accordance with the cases.

Question 2(a)

Question 2 is in two parts. The first part (Question 2(a)) is whether in asserting a claim based on the common law implied warranties, the condominium corporation must establish that at least one of the owners of condominium units was an "original purchaser", i.e., a person who entered into an agreement of purchase and sale to purchase the unit before completion of construction.

In my view, the answer to Question 2(a) is yes. Someone must be entitled to sue the defendants for breach of the common law implied warranties at the time the statement of claim was issued by the plaintiff CCC 109. That someone must have been an "original purchaser" as defined by the parties for purposes of this motion. The right of CCC 109, as a condominium corporation to enforce these warranties under s. 14(1) of the Condominium Act on behalf of unit owners is derivative, not original.

My answer is based on a reading of ss. 14(1) and 41(8) (formerly R.S.O. 1970, c. 77, s. 9(18)) of the Condominium Act and the persuasive reasoning of Krever J. (as he then was) in the Shenkman case, supra, subsequently applied by Rosenberg J. in Waterloo North Condominium Corp. No. 64 v. Domlife Realty Ltd. (1989), 70 O.R. (2d) 210 (H.C.J.).

Section 41(8) of the Condominium Act reads:

41(8) All warranties given with respect to work and materials furnished to the property shall enure to the benefit of all unit owners from time to time and to the corporation.

Counsel for the defendants submitted that the application of this subsection should be governed by the section of which it is part, and which is otherwise concerned only with repair and maintenance obligations after completion of the Condominium (relying on inferences drawn from general provisions of the Act, including ss. 2(4) and 4(1)).

I do not agree with him. The wording of s. 41(8) is not so restricted. In my view, its purpose is to extend generally to all unit-holders and to the condominium corporation, the benefit of warranties given to any one or more of them with respect to work and materials furnished to the property. The previous judicial history of s. 41(8) as s. 9(18) appears to me to support that interpretation.

Question 2(b)

The second part of Question 2 (Question 2(b)) is whether for the purposes of Question 2(a), construction is "complete" when the unit of the "original purchaser" is complete or when the unit and all the common elements appurtenant to the unit are complete.

Counsel for the plaintiff says that the condominium project consists of units and common elements, referring to the general definitions of "common elements", "property" and "unit" in s. 1(1) of the Condominium Act. He then says that the owners are tenants in common of the common elements; and that an undivided interest in the common elements is appurtenant to each unit; and that the ownership of a unit shall not be separated from the ownership of the common interest (s-ss. 7(1), (2) and (5)). It would follow, he says, that until the common elements which are appurtenant to each unit are complete, no unit (including any unit owned by an "original purchaser") is complete.

Counsel for the defendants referred me to several passages from the judgment of Dickson J. (as he then was) in Fraser-Reid v. Droumtsekas, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 720, 103 D.L.R. (3d) 385, and to s. 15 of the Ontario New Home Warranties Plan Act, which prescribes when the statutory warranties take effect and which deems the condominium corporation to be the owner of the common elements for that purpose. However, s. 15 applies only to the statutory warranties under that Act. The Fraser-Reid case concerns the application of the common law implied warranties to the purchase of a newly completed house and the judgment of Dickson J. is not directed to their application in a condominium setting. These raise entirely different issues.

Counsel did not refer me to any direct authority on this point. However, I agree with counsel for the plaintiff. In my view, for purposes of the implied common law warranties, construction of any particular unit in a condominium is not complete until the common elements appurtenant to the unit are complete. That interpretation is consistent with the scheme of shared ownership and mutual rights and obligations upon which the Condominium Act is based.

Question (3)

Counsel informed me that they have agreed that the plaintiff may concurrently pursue claims in tort and breach of warranty, provided the defendants can be shown to owe a duty of care to the plaintiff on the facts of this case.

Question (4)

The final question is as to the applicable limitation periods for the plaintiff's claims for breach of warranty and negligence and as to the commencement date of the limitation periods.

Section 45(1)(g) of the Limitations Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. L.15, expressly provides a limitation period of six years for actions both in contract and tort. In my view, the plaintiff's claims for breach of warranty and negligence are subject to the six-year limitation period provided by this subsection. Under the Act, the limitation period starts to run when the cause of action arises. The cause of action arises when it is complete. It is complete when damages occur as a result of the alleged breach of contract or duty.

In Consumers Glass Co. v. Foundation Co. of Canada (1985), 51 O.R. (2d) 385 at p. 398, 20 D.L.R. (4th) 126, the Ontario Court of Appeal (Dubin J.A., as he then was) stated that in cases based on breach of a duty to take care, "a cause of action does not arise, and time does not begin to run for the purposes of the Limitations Act, until such time as the plaintiff discovers or ought reasonably to have discovered the facts with respect to which the remedy is being sought, whether the issue arises in contract or tort".

Counsel for the defendant submits that I should modify the application of this general rule by applying (or adopting) the shorter limitation periods for breach of statutory warranties under the Ontario New Home Warranties Plan Act. I do not see how that is possible in view of the express provisions of s. 45(1)(g) of the Limitations Act.

He also submitted that as to the claim for breach of warranty, the limitation period runs from the date of purchase. The case cited in para. 15 of his factum, upon which I assume he relies, Schwebel v. Telekes, [1967] 1 O.R. 541, 61 D.L.R. (2d) 470 (C.A.), was expressly overruled in the Consumers Glass case, which I must now adopt as the ruling authority in Ontario.

Accordingly, the applicable limitation period in Ontario for claims based on breach of warranty and negligence is six years after the cause of action (including actionable damages) is complete and the plaintiff discovers or ought reasonably to have discovered the facts with respect to which the remedy is being sought.

As requested by counsel on this motion, the costs of this motion are reserved to the trial judge.

SUPPLEMENTARY REASONS FOR JUDGMENT -- April 3, 1995

SEDGWICK J.: -- Reasons for judgment were released on March 8, 1995, responding to certain questions of law which the court was asked to determine upon a motion brought jointly pursuant to Rule 21 of the Rules of Civil Procedure.

On March 10, 1995, counsel jointly asked for an opportunity to canvass the answer to Question 2(a) set out in my reasons for judgment (pp. 721-22 ante) in order to clarify a point which was of particular concern to them. Further argument was heard in Ottawa motions court on March 31, 1995, brief written reasons to follow.

In my reasons for judgment, dated March 8, 1995, I answered in the affirmative, Question 2(a) posed by the parties. Question 2(a) read as follows:

In order for a condominium corporation to assert claims based upon these common law implied warranties, must the corporation establish that, as of the date of issuance of the statement of claim, at least one of the unit owners in the condominium was an "original purchaser"? For the purpose of this question, an "original purchaser" is a person who entered into an agreement of purchase and sale before construction was completed.

In the circumstances to which the parties wish to apply my answer to Question 2(a), it is insufficient because it does not specifically distinguish between two situations:

(1) an original purchaser as defined by the parties in Question 2(a) remains a unit owner on the date on which the statement of claim is issued by the condominium corporation; and

(2) an original purchaser is no longer a unit owner on that date.

I intended to deal with both situations in my reasons for judgment, dated March 8, 1995, because I think they lead to the same result.

In the situation where the original purchaser is no longer a unit owner on the date on which the statement of claim is issued by the condominium corporation, the successor in title of the original purchaser is entitled to the benefit of warranties (including, in my view, any implied common law warranties) to which the original purchaser was entitled, pursuant to s. 41(8) of the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.26.

It is, therefore, immaterial in my view, whether any original purchaser remains a unit owner on the date on which the condominium corporation issued the statement of claim. It is sufficient if at that date it can be shown by the plaintiff that there was a former unit-owner who was an original purchaser as the parties have defined the term in Question 2(a).

I think this follows from an analysis of the applicable provisions of the Condominium Act and the cases to which I have been referred by counsel.

In an action brought by a condominium corporation under s. 14 (formerly R.S.O. 1970, c. 77, s. 9(18)) of the Condominium Act to enforce the contractual rights of unit owners under a contract, express or implied, to which the corporation itself is not a party, one or more of the unit owners must be shown to have been a party to the contract sought to be enforced by the corporation.

In the context of an action brought by a condominium corporation to enforce the common law warranties implied in favour of purchasers of uncompleted residences or units, including appurtenant common elements, this would mean that one or more unit-owners must be shown to have been a party to an agreement of purchase and sale of a unit entered into with the developer prior to the completion of construction of the unit, including appurtenant common elements.

Section 41(8) of the Condominium Act provides that these common law implied warranties would enure to the benefit of "all unit owners from time to time". If, therefore, one or more unit owners were shown to have been a party to an agreement of purchase and sale of a unit entered into with the developer prior to completion of construction of the unit, including appurtenant common elements, the rights of such owner(s) to enforce the common law implied warranties in respect of uncompleted units, including appurtenant common elements, would pass to his or their successors in title to the unit(s).

If these "threshold" requirements have been met, the condominium corporation would be entitled to enforce these contractual rights of unit holders and to recover damages on behalf of all current unit holders, not just those who have, or whose predecessors in title had, contractual privity with the developer.

It would not be necessary for any original unit-owner having contractual privity with the developer to remain as a unit owner on the date the statement of claim was issued by the condominium corporation, since the benefit of his original rights against the developer would have passed to his successor(s) in title.

In my view, it is the contractual rights that must be in existence on the date on which the statement of claim is issued, whether or not the rights are then exercisable by an original purchaser or by his successor(s) in title. The defendants are protected from delayed claims under the Limitations Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. L.15.

According to counsel, support of this view as to this aspect of the "threshold" issue may be inferred from comments of Rosenberg J. in Waterloo North Condominium Corp. No. 64 v. Domlife Realty Ltd. (1989), 70 O.R. (2d) 210 (H.C.J.) at p. 220; non-support, from comments of Krever J. (as he then was) in Carleton Condominium Corp. No. 11 v. Shenkman Corp. (1985), 49 O.R. (2d) 194 at pp. 208-09, 14 D.L.R. (4th) 571 (H.C.J.). However, there does not appear to be any reported decision in Ontario in which this aspect of the "threshold" issue has been fully canvassed. In neither of these cases was the effect of s. 41(8) of the Condominium Act considered, although the provision has been part of the law of Ontario since the Condominium Act, 1978, S.O. 1978, c. 84 .

Assuming that s. 41(8) has only the limited application within the context of s. 41 of the Act, for which counsel for the defendants contends, and which was rejected in the reasons for judgment dated March 8, 1995, the rights of an original unit-owner to enforce the common law warranties implied in favour of the purchaser of an uncompleted residence would, in my opinion, also be enforceable by his successors in title, just as they would be if he had agreed to purchase a single- family residence.

As requested by counsel, the costs of this motion are reserved to the trial judge.

These supplementary reasons for judgment are to be considered part of the reasons for judgment, dated March 8, 1995. For appeal and other purposes, the entire reasons for judgment are considered to be issued on this date.

Order accordingly.

500 Glencairn Limited, Plaintiff, and Freda Farkas, George Farkas and Roman Gofman, Defendants Action No. 51347/90

Ontario Court of Justice - General Division Toronto, Ontario Then J. January 31, 1994.

Richard Storrey, for the Plaintiff. Martin Banach, for the Defendants.

[para1] THEN J.:-- This is an action for damages by the plaintiff for an alleged breach of an agreement of purchase and sale made by the defendant Freda Farkas said to be acting as trustee or agent on behalf of the defendants, George Farkas and Roman Gofman, whereby the plaintiff, 500 Glencairn Limited on June 13, 1988 agreed to sell and the defendant Freda Farkas on June 12, 1988 agreed to purchase Unit 310 at 500 Glencairn Avenue along with two parking units for a purchase price of $391,900.00 subject to adjustments.

Background

[para2] The plaintiff is the developer and vendor of units in a condominium development located at 500 Glencairn which is comprised of 40 residential units, 60 parking units and a commercial use component. The defendant Freda Farkas resides in Toronto and is the spouse of her co-defendant George Farkas who is a chartered accountant also residing in Toronto. The remaining defendant is one Roman Gofman who is a real estate agent and also resides in Toronto. It is common ground that the defendants received a disclosure statement which is exhibit 1, Tab 5 in this proceeding and did not purport to rescind the agreement of purchase and sale as a result.

[para3] The defendants obtained interim possession of Unit 310 on October 4, 1989 pursuant to the agreement of purchase and sale. The defendants also assumed the obligation pursuant to the agreement of purchase and sale to make interim occupancy payments to the plaintiff. These payments commenced on October 4, 1989 and in respect of these payments the defendants provided a series of 12 post-dated cheques to the plaintiff in the sum of $3,913.49. The cheques payable November 1, 1989 up to and including February 1, 1990 were cleared but the defendant Gofman caused payment to be stopped with respect to the March 1, 1990 payment and thereafter.

[para4] On April 18, 1990, the declaration and the description for the condominium development was registered and accordingly notice was given to the defendants that final or title closing under the agreement of purchase and sale would take place on May 11, 1990. The defendants advised that title would be taken in the name of Freda Farkas and Roman Gofman.

[para5] On May 11, 1990, the defendants took the position that the agreement of purchase and sale could be and was thereby being rescinded by reason of alleged material amendments to the disclosure documentation provided upon the execution of the agreement of purchase and sale. The alleged material amendments to the disclosure documentation were said to be contained in the reciprocal agreement registered by the plaintiff on April 18, 1990. The closing which was to take place on May 11, 1990 did not occur.

The Facts

[para6] The defendants takes the position that the reciprocal agreement (exhibit 1, Tab 22) constitutes a material amendment to the disclosure statement and that accordingly the defendant is entitled to rescind the agreement of purchase and sale in accordance with s. 52 of the Condominium Act as that section is explained by the Ontario Court of Appeal in Abdool v. Somerset Place Developments of Georgetown Ltd. (1993), 10 O.R. (3d) 120. The specific provisions of the reciprocal agreement (exhibit 1, Tab 22) in comparison with the initial disclosure document (exhibit 1, Tab 5) will be referred to extensively in due course. For present purposes it will be sufficient to express my agreement with the plaintiff's submission that after reading the disclosure documents, any reasonable purchaser would have known the following:

- (a) that there was a commercial component to the project,
- (b) that the physical location of the commercial component and other items were shown on the plans which were part of the disclosure documents,
- (c) that the commercial development would own and have access to certain parking spaces in the underground parking garage and that access to those spaces would be over certain portions of the condominium building,
- (d) that the property would be subject to various easements, rights of way and/or licenses relating to the operation of the residential and commercial components,
- (e) that the easements, rights of way and licenses would be more particularly described by reference plans and the condominium plans,
- (f) that the condominium corporation would be entering into a reciprocal agreement which would deal with all necessary matters relating to the sharing of certain facilities,
- (g) that the reciprocal agreement would deal with matters in addition to matters of access and easements,
- (h) that the reciprocal agreement would provide that the condominium corporation would be responsible for the maintenance, replacement, repair and operation of the shared facilities,
- (i) that the reciprocal agreement would specifically provide for proportions in which the condominium corporation and the owner of the commercial development would share in the cost of the maintenance, replacement, repair and operation of the shared facilities, and
- (j) that the actual proportion of expenses to be borne by the condominium corporation and the commercial development were not set out in the disclosure documents but would be set out later in the reciprocal agreement.

[para7] In addition, Mr. Ezer, the president of the plaintiff and its majority shareholder, gave uncontradicted evidence that the financial burden on the condominium corporation regarding their share of the expenses of the shared facilities is relatively insignificant and more specifically Mr. Ezer testified that the purchaser of Unit 410, which is identical in all respects to Unit 310 but one floor higher, completed his sale and that the financial burden as disclosed in the disclosure statement was exactly the same regardless of the subsequent allocation of costs of the shared facilities in the reciprocal agreement.

[para8] Mr. Farkas, who was the only one of the defendants to testify at trial, acknowledged at trial that when he subsequently received the reciprocal agreement, shortly before the time set for final closing, he and his solicitors poured over the agreement looking for anything in it to use as a vehicle to avoid continuing on with the agreement of purchase and sale. This position was identical to the one taken by the defendant on discovery.

[para9] Both at trial and on discovery, the defendant indicated that his reason for purchasing Unit 310 was to resell the unit at a profit. The defendant Gofman on his discovery stated that one of the reasons why the defendants did not close in May of 1990, was that they could not resell the unit at a profit having attempted to do so from January 1990 until March 1990 and having dropped the asking price for the unit some $72,000 from that which had been agreed by them in the agreement of purchase and sale.

[para10] Moreover, at trial Mr. Farkas stated that he had, during the time that he purchased Unit 310, also purchased two other condominium units. In his evidence upon discovery, the defendant Farkas stated that he had purchased only one other condominium unit. Having regard to all of the evidence, I am prepared to find as a fact that Mr. Farkas was a speculator in real estate. Mr. Farkas also testified that he wished to rescind the agreement of purchase and sale with respect to Unit 310 because of the quality of the building. Not only is the evidence of Mr. Farkas as to his involvement in the purchase of condominium units at the time of his purchase of Unit 310 somewhat contradictory, but, in September 1989 the evidence discloses that both Mr. Farkas and Mr. Gofman attended to inspect Unit 310 prior to interim closing and that the defendant Gofman signed the purchaser's certificate acknowledging that he had inspected the unit and that the deficiencies were of a minor nature and specifically noted and corrected. There was no indication by the defendants of any substantial complaint regarding the building or the unit. On all of the evidence, I do not accept the evidence of Mr. Farkas that the motivation behind his desire to rescind the agreement of purchase and sale pertains to the poor quality of the building or the unit.

[para11] Mr. Farkas on discovery also conceded that although he was claiming that the allocation of the shared facilities as set out in the reciprocal agreement constituted a material amendment he had no idea as to what his financial burden was going to be with respect to the shared facilities at the time he received the disclosure documents and that he was not really interested in that issue. Indeed he acknowledged that he had not even read that part of the disclosure statement dealing with reciprocal agreement which provided the description of the shared facilities.

[para12] Further, Mr. Farkas acknowledged that he knew that there was to be a commercial component to the building and that some arrangements would have to be entered between the condominium corporation and the owner of the commercial space regarding certain matters. These arrangements would have to include matters such as parking and access to common facilities as between the condominium corporation and the commercial development. He knew that there would have to be a sharing of expenses.

[para13] Mr. Farkas indicated that he knew that if he had any problems, questions or concerns regarding the disclosure statement he could those 10 days regarding the commercial development or the reciprocal agreement.

[para14] Mr. Farkas conceded in cross-examination that s. 20(g) of the agreement of purchase and sale obliged the defendants to take title subject to the reciprocal agreement.

[para15] Mr. Farkas also acknowledged that the defendants knew or should have known that the reciprocal agreement would deal with matters of mutual concern beyond matters such as access and easements.

The Issues

1. Does the reciprocal agreement constitute a "material amendment to the disclosure statement"?
2. Does the reciprocal agreement constitute an unpermitted encumbrance pursuant to the agreement of purchase and sale?
3. Can all of the defendants be held liable or is the plaintiff required to elect which of the defendants should be held liable?
4. (a) If the plaintiff had a duty to mitigate damages, did it discharge that duty?
(b) What is the proper way to assess the plaintiff's damages and as of what date should the damages be assessed? 5. What, if any, is the quantum of damages in this case?

1. Does the reciprocal agreement constitute a material amendment to the disclosure statement?

[para16] Section 52 of the Condominium Act provides as follows:

52(1) An agreement of purchase and sale entered into after the first day of June 1979 by a declarant or proposed declarant of a unit or proposed unit for residential purposes is not binding on the purchaser until the declarant or proposed declarant has delivered to the purchaser a copy of the current disclosure statement and all material amendments thereto.

(2) The purchaser, before receiving delivery of a deed to or transfer of the unit, may rescind the agreement of purchase and sale within 10 days after receiving the disclosure statement or, where there has been a material amendment thereto, within 10 days after receiving the material amendment.

[para17] In Abdool v. Somerset Place Developments of Georgetown Ltd., supra, Robins J.A. on behalf of the Court of Appeal at p. 149, has stated the test that the purchaser must satisfy before availing himself or herself of the right to rescind within 10 days after receiving the "material amendment" to the disclosure statement:

I view the term "material amendment" as broad enough to include any change that should be reflected in the disclosure statement and would not limit it to the correction of errors, omissions or defects as Borins J. does. Subject to that reservation, the basic thrust of these approaches is essentially the same: the declarant must deliver an amended disclosure statement if the change is likely to influence the decision of a purchaser to purchase the condominium unit.

In the interests of consistency, I would determine the materiality of a change or amendment to the originally-delivered disclosure statement by reference to a test similar to that which I formulated earlier to determine the materiality of an alleged defect in a disclosure statement. Would a reasonable purchaser regard the change or amendment as sufficiently important to his or her decision to purchase that, had the disclosure statement contained the new or amended information at the time it was delivered, the purchaser would not likely have one ahead with the transaction but would have rescinded the agreement within the ten-day period? If the answer to this question is in the affirmative, the developer is obliged to deliver an amendment to the disclosure statement and the purchaser has ten days from the date of delivery within which to rescind.

Amendments that substantially change a purchaser's anticipated use and enjoyment of the unit or the amenities associated therewith or that adversely affect the value of the unit, are, I would think, clearly material amendments that revive the rescission period. A reasonable purchaser could objectively assert that he or she would not have proceeded with the deal had this information been available at the time of the original disclosure statement. (emphasis added) [para18] It is the position of the defendant that certain features of the reciprocal agreement viewed both individually and cumulatively constitute material amendments to the disclosure documentation in the sense outlined by Robins J.A. in Abdool, supra, such that it was open to the defendant to invoke the right to rescind the agreement of purchase and sale set out in s. 52(2) of the Condominium Act and, the defendant having done so, the agreement of purchase and sale is at an end.

[para19] It will be convenient at this stage to set out both the defendants' and plaintiffs position with respect to certain of the impugned aspects of the reciprocal agreement in order to assess whether in the circumstances the defendant has met the test for rescission outlined in Abdool, supra.

[para20] It should be made clear that the summaries of the position of the parties which follow are gleaned from the written materials submitted to the court by counsel. Many of the matters referred to were significantly amplified in argument and in fairness to the excellent arguments advanced by both counsel in support of their respective position I wish to indicate that I have not overlooked the points raised in oral argument. However, in my view, the written materials have so succinctly captured the essence of the position of the parties on the crucial first issue that I find it unnecessary to elaborate further on the arguments of counsel or the facts of this action in order to come to a determination on the first issue.

(i) The defendants submit that Schedule C of the reciprocal agreement lists the easements and rights of way in favour of the commercial building. Schedule E of the reciprocal agreement lists the shared facilities that are owned by the condominium corporation which must be shared with the commercial units. However, it is the defendants' submission that it is impossible to determine easements, rights of way or shared facilities by looking only at the disclosure documentation without reference to Plan 66R-15797 and that accordingly the receipt by the defendants of the reciprocal agreement in conjunction with Plan 66R-15797 constitutes a significant material amendment to the disclosure documentation.

[para21] It is the plaintiff's submission that the plans which were part of the disclosure documentation do provide some detail as to the shared facilities and indeed a reasonable purchaser would not have expected anything more. Reference Plan 66R-15797 could not have been attached to the disclosure statement because that plan was not created until after the building was erected and the plan could be finalized. It is the plaintiff's submission that a reasonable purchaser would not have expected the detailed reference contained in Plan 66R-15797 to have been attached to the initial disclosure document.

(ii) The defendants submit that the allocation of the costs of the shared facilities is in itself material. It is the position of the defendants that the allocation came into being as well as the rationale for the allocation in November or December of 1989, in accordance with a letter from Fairfield Management which is contained at tab 13 of exhibit 1 and that this information should have been brought to the attention of the defendants by the plaintiff.

[para22] It is the plaintiff's position that the disclosure documents made it quite clear that the allocation of shared costs would be set out later. The defendants accepted this state of affairs and cannot now be heard to say that the failure to disclose the precise allocation is a matter so material that they can invoke their right to rescind now that the amount of allocation has been made known to them. The plaintiff submits that if the defendants thought that the allocation of such costs was material, they could and should have exercised their right to rescind within the original 10 day period after the receipt of the disclosure documentation. The plaintiff submits that in the circumstances, unless the allocation of shared costs is in itself unreasonable, the defendants ought not to be in a position to rescind the agreement of purchase and sale.

(iii) The defendants submit that the failure to include the costs that the condominium corporation had to pay for facilities owned by the commercial development in the budget statement is material.

[para23] The plaintiff submits that some of the costs are included in the budget statement which is part of the disclosure documentation, as for example, the maintenance item; but that given the relatively insignificant amounts involved in this item, it cannot be said that the failure to specifically include all of these costs would have caused a reasonable purchaser to rescind the agreement.

(iv) The defendants submit that it is material that the disclosure documentation and the budget statement did not disclose that the condominium corporation was responsible by virtue of s. 3.03(a) of the reciprocal agreement to replace, repair, maintain and operate the shared facilities and was also responsible for outlays which would be classified as capital in nature for shared facilities they did not own, the largest one of which was the outside parking lot. Moreover, the defendants submit that the budget statement failed to disclose that the condominium corporation would receive an administration fee of $12,000 per annum as set out in paragraph 3.03(n) of the reciprocal agreement and that the fee was non-reviewable over time.

[para24] It is the plaintiff's position that s. 3(e) of the disclosure statement does provide that the condominium corporation had the obligation to replace, repair, maintain and operate the shared facilities. The plaintiff submits that the word "replace" also clearly implies that an expense might be capital in nature. In the plaintiff's submission the fact that the budget statement failed to disclose that the condominium corporation would benefit by receiving a non-reviewable administration fee of $12,000 per year is irrelevant.

(v) The defendants submit that s. 3.03 of the reciprocal agreement places various burdens on the condominium corporation as to reasonableness of repairs and obtaining quotations but if the condominium corporation fails in its duties as seen by the commercial development, the commercial development does not have the same obligation as to the reasonableness of repairs and quotations. The plaintiff submits that the condominium corporation has the right to take initiatives and do the repairs by virtue of s. 3(e) of the disclosure statement. The embellishment of that obligation and the corresponding obligations of the commercial development do not constitute a material amendment to what was disclosed in the disclosure documentation.

(vi) The defendants submit that the disclosure documentation fails to advise that pursuant to s. 5.01 of the reciprocal agreement, the condominium corporation may in circumstances be liable for 50% of the realty taxes notwithstanding that there is no commercial component to the taxes.

[para25] The plaintiff submits that the realty taxes with respect to the condominium corporation are assessed separately from the commercial component.

(vii) The defendants submit that the disclosure documentation and especially the budget statement failed to disclose that there would be cost sharing of joint insurance as set out in Article 6 of the reciprocal agreement. The defendants also submit the disclosure documentation fails to reveal that if there is a default for any reason by the condominium corporation, in addition to what one could consider would be the normal remedy of a lawsuit or arbitration, the commercial unit may register a lien as set out in s. 10 of the reciprocal agreement on the property of the condominium corporation. This, the defendants submit, would have the effect of having each owner personally liable up to their proportionate interest in the condominium as set out in s. 7 of the Condominium Act. This state of affairs, the defendants submit, could have some impact on refinancing or a sale. [para26] The plaintiff submits that s. 3(f) of the disclosure statement did say that the reciprocal agreement would provide "for certain arrangements between the condominium corporation and the owner of a commercial development with respect to matters of insurance". The plaintiff submits that the fact the disclosure statement did not expressly say that there would be a cost sharing of joint insurance would not, in the plaintiff's submission, be material to a reasonable purchaser. Moreover, s. 3(g) of the disclosure statement specified that each owner would agree to pay their share based upon the percentage allocation for common expenses set out in the declaration in respect of the lands and all amounts for which the condominium corporation was responsible under the reciprocal agreement. According to the plaintiff, there is no evidence that the omissions in the disclosure documentation complained of by the defendants would have any effect or impact on refinancing or a sale.

(viii) The defendants submit that the disclosure documentation failed to disclose that pursuant to s. 11 of the reciprocal agreement the purchaser must not only obtain a consent of a subsequent owner to be bound by the reciprocal agreement but all mortgagees, chargees and other encumbrances must also sign a consent. The defendants submit that this section has a substantial effect on the ability to obtain financing or being able to sell the property to one who needs financing.

[para27] The plaintiff submits that paragraph 3(g) of the disclosure documentation pointed out that the reciprocal agreement would provide that it will bind the owners from time to time of the residential units. According to the plaintiff, any mortgagee or chargee of a unit is an owner. It was also the evidence of Mr. Ezer that these stipulations have had no impact on purchasers being able to obtain financing.

(ix) The defendants submit that the disclosure documentation failed to disclose that pursuant to s. 11.06 of the reciprocal agreement, the commercial Unit can be relieved of all liability by any sale (as opposed to a sale at fair market value to a bona fide purchaser) which could lead to a situation that the commercial unit could sell the property to a shell company without assets and in a declining market so that the value of the mortgagees on the property would be greater than the value of the commercial property and thus effectively shifting the entire burden of costs onto the condominium corporation.

[para28] The submission of the plaintiff is that the reciprocal agreement binds all subsequent owners of the commercial development and that the argument advanced by the defendants is of a theoretical nature and is not material in the relevant sense.

(x) The defendants submit that the letter from Fairfield Management Limited (exhibit 1, tab 13) states that the surface parking lot is exclusively for the usage of the commercial tenants and their customers but goes on to state that it is expected that evening visitors as well as service vehicles will use the lot. The defendants accordingly submit that the condominium corporation is burdened with costs associated with the parking lot without correspondingly having a legal right to use the parking lot. It would therefore follow that the condominium corporation must pay for those items in schedule A "surface parking" of the agreement which they have no right to use.

[para29] The plaintiff submits that the condominium corporation has the right to use the parking lot by virtue of ss. 1.01(k), 3.01 and exhibit E of the reciprocal agreement. Moreover, as a matter of practicality Mr. Ezer testified that the residents and their visitors do use the parking lot.

(xi) The defendants submit that schedule E of the reciprocal agreement states under the heading pertaining to maintenance staff that the "site superintendent hired by the condominium corporation is to be responsible for the following duties relating to commercial space". This responsibility, it was submitted by the defendants, was not disclosed in the budget or the balance of the disclosure documentation and accordingly it is now apparent that the condominium corporation must pay 80% of the maintenance staff relating to the commercial development. This according to the defendants constitutes a material amendment.

[para30] The position of the plaintiff is that the budget in the disclosure documentation provided for amounts pertaining to maintenance staff. The reciprocal agreement provided for the basis of allocation and the Fairfield letter (exhibit 1, tab 13) sets out the basis for the allocation which the plaintiff submits is in itself a reasonable one. It is the plaintiff's submission that none of these matters would have been material to a reasonable purchaser and certainly on the facts of this case were of no material import to the defendants based on their admissions at trial and on discovery.

(xii) The defendants submit that 60 parking units at a percentage of .07 per unit is allocated pursuant to Schedule D (allocation of common expenses of the declaration). The other 9 parking units are owned by the commercial development. On the basis of the disclosure documentation, each parking spot owned by the condominium was therefore to pay .07% of the total of all common expenses. On the other hand, the defendants submit the percentage as set out in Schedule E of the reciprocal agreement as to the costs of the underground garage allocates only 12% of the garage costs to the commercial unit. The parking spots owned by the unit holders and the parking spots owned by the commercial unit at the end of the day do not end up paying the same costs for their parking spaces and in addition the disclosure statement states that there are 69 parking units and therefore on a strict allocation the residential complex has been overburdened by at least one parking space. [para31] The plaintiff submits that the commercial development lost one of the 9 parking spaces set out in the disclosure documentation as it had to be used for utilities and accordingly the final allocation was done on the basis of the final result, that is, 60 residential parking spots and 8 commercial spots. The ratio therefore is 60 to 8 which constituted the basis of Fairfield Management allocating 88% of the expenses to the residential complex and 12% of the expenses to the commercial development.

[para32] Based on all of the alleged discrepancies (and not just those which have been summarized) between the disclosure documentation and the reciprocal agreement, the defendant advances essentially two arguments.

[para33] First, the defendants submit that given its content the entire reciprocal agreement was material and that accordingly its very omission as part of the disclosure documentation rendered the disclosure documentation inadequate.

[para34] In answer to that argument, the plaintiff submits that there is nothing in the Condominium Act generally or in s. 52 specifically nor in the decision of the Court of Appeal in Abdool, supra, which mandates that any and all agreements which provide further clarification to the disclosure documents must be appended to the disclosure documents. It is Mr. Storrey's submission that the position being put forward by the defendants in essence is that notwithstanding the defendants obtained disclosure documentation which said that there would be a reciprocal agreement to be created later which would set out in addition to the disclosure documentation matters of relevance, the defendants would nevertheless be entitled to not rescind at that point in time even though they considered the lack of specificity in the disclosure documentation to be material, but were entitled to take that position later upon receipt of the reciprocal agreement. It is Mr. Storrey's position that that approach cannot be correct in law and ought to be rejected by this court.

[para35] I agree with the position taken by Mr. Storrey on this point. In my opinion, the reasonable purchaser was entitled to take the position, if he saw fit, that the original documentation was inadequate if he considered that there were material omissions within the meaning of Abdool, supra. However, the reasonable purchaser is not entitled upon receipt of the reciprocal agreement to which reference is made in the original documentation to take the position that in light of the further disclosure made in the reciprocal agreement that the original documentation is no longer adequate. I agree with Mr. Storrey that in this case on the basis of the original disclosure documentation as compared to the reciprocal agreement, the issue for this court is whether or not the reciprocal agreement constitutes a substantial or material amendment to the disclosure documentation within the meaning of Abdool, supra, so as to provide the reasonable purchaser with a right of rescission under s. 52(2) of the Condominium Act. That issue in turn in my opinion stands to be determined by examining those matters which the defendants claim have been substantially amended and it is to that issue which I now turn.

[para36] I agree with the defendants contention that some of the matters found in the reciprocal agreement were not specifically adverted to in the disclosure statement and that to that extent it may be said that the reciprocal agreement contains "amendments". However, the disclosure statement was not intended to cover each and every matter contained in the reciprocal agreement and does in my view, in any event, provide a summary of the significant features of the reciprocal agreement while specifying that the reciprocal agreement will embellish or amplify those matters adverted in the disclosure documentation. It would have been abundantly clear that the disclosure documentation would be amplified by the reciprocal agreement and that the purchaser was being asked to accept disclosure for the purposes of s. 52 of the Condominium Act on that basis. Moreover, in my opinion, I agree with the submission of the plaintiff that none of the matters raised by the defendants can properly be considered to be "material" in the sense outlined by the Court of Appeal in Abdool, supra, such that a reasonable purchaser would regard any of the alleged changes or amendments as sufficiently important that they may not have decided in the first instance to proceed with the purchase. I do not accept that any of the amendments or changes that the defendants have referred to in the reciprocal agreement would substantially change a purchaser's anticipated use and enjoyment of the unit or would adversely affect the value of the unit so as to entitle the purchaser to rescind.

[para37] Moreover, on the facts of this case, it would appear quite evident that the defendant Farkas did not view the disclosure statement to be of significance to his objective of reselling the unit at a profit. On the other hand, the evidence is clear that Mr. Farkas examined the reciprocal agreement very carefully in an attempt to rescind the agreement of purchase and sale by attempting to locate material amendments to the disclosure documentation. There appears little doubt that this enterprise was motivated by a substantial decline in the value of condominium units and not by any concern on the part of the purchaser that the reciprocal agreement had affected changes depriving the purchaser of substantial use or enjoyment of the property or had occasioned a loss of value in the property. It must be clearly understood that in the circumstances of this case whether Mr. Farkas was a speculator or not is irrelevant to a determination of the first issue if the reciprocal agreement constitutes a material amendment to the disclosure documentation. I have found that none of the matters contained in the reciprocal agreement constitute a "material amendment" within the tent posited by Robins J.A. in Abdool, supra.

2. Does the reciprocal agreement constitute an unpermitted encumbrance?

[para38] Of relevance to the resolution of this issue is s. 20 of the agreement of purchase and sale which reads as follows:

20. The purchaser agrees to accept title to the purchased units subject to each and every of the following:

...

(g) a reciprocal agreement with respect to the commercial development for access, easements and other matters of mutual concern provided the title is good and free from all encumbrances except as herein provided the purchaser agrees to accept title subject to all restrictions, easements, conditions or covenants that run with the land and subject to all rights, licenses and easements now registered or to be registered for the supply and installation of telephone services, electricity, gas, sewers, water, television and/or cable facilities and other usual services and further subject to any registered agreements and the terms of the condominium documents in their final registered form. ... (emphasis added)

[para39] On this point I accept the defendants reliance upon the decision of the Divisional Court in Valentini v. Reedco Wellington, 69 O.R. (2d) 346, as standing for the proposition that the word "encumbrance" has a broad meaning which entails making lands subject to a charge or liability and that an encumbrance imposes obligations and potential costs on an owner.

[para40] I do not however accept the defendants' submission that in the circumstances of this case the words "and other matters of mutual concern" as they are found in s. 20(g) of the agreement of purchase and sale ought to be construed pursuant to the ejusdem generis principle so that the encumbrances would be confined to such things as licenses and rights of way since these are within the same class of items as easements and access. Rather, on this issue, I accept the plaintiff's submission that when the agreement of purchase and sale is looked at in context, the ejusdem generis interpretation ought not to prevail. In my opinion, when properly viewed in the context of the entire agreement of purchase and sale, it would be evident to any reasonable purchaser that "other matters of mutual concern" referred to all necessary matters, including matters of cost, relating to the sharing of certain facilities between the condominium corporation and the owner of the commercial development. I am fortified in this interpretation by the evidence of Mr. Farkas who testified that the defendants knew or should have known that the reciprocal agreement was to deal with matters of mutual concern beyond matters such as access and easements. I am not persuaded that the reciprocal agreement is a document which confers unilateral benefits to the vendor only. Rather, I am prepared to find that, on balance, it deals with matters of mutual benefit to both the residential development and the commercial development including matters of costs and that it was these matters contained in the reciprocal agreement pertaining to the sharing of certain facilities between the residential and commercial development that were contemplated by the phrase "other matters of mutual concern" found in s. 20(g) of the agreement of purchase and sale.

3. Which of the defendants should be held liable?

[para41] It is the position of the defendants that because Mrs. Farkas signed as an agent of her principals, that is to say her husband, the defendant George Farkas, and Roman Gofman, the plaintiff must elect against which of the defendants to obtain judgment.

[para42] On this issue, in his evidence in chief, the defendant, Mr. George Farkas, made it quite clear that the true partners in the transaction were he and Mr. Gofman and that in signing the agreement of purchase and sale, his wife was doing so not only without knowledge, but also on behalf and under the direction of the defendant George Farkas. In such circumstances, I accept Trident Holdings Limited v. Danand Investments Limited et al. (1988), 64 O.R. (2d) 65, a decision of the Court of Appeal relied upon by the plaintiff, for the proposition that the principals directing the actions of a bare trustee are liable to third parties when the bare trustee is acting as an agent for those principals and under their direction. On the facts of this case, I am prepared to find that Mrs. Freda Farkas was acting as a bare trustee for her co-defendants and that as such the defendants George Farkas and Roman Gofman are liable notwithstanding that they did not sign the agreement of purchase and sale.

[para43] However, in respect of the liability of Mrs. Farkas, the plaintiff also relies upon the proposition that a bare trustee if held to be acting as an agent for other beneficiaries can also be liable where the agent also benefits as a principal in the transaction. In support of this proposition, the plaintiff relies upon Dolly Varden Mines Limited (N.P.L.) v. Sunshine Exploration Limited et al. (1967), 64 D.L.R. (2d) 283 where at pp. 295-297 the following is found:

It is, of course, clear that Sunshine Ex. did act in this matter as an agent of Sunshine Ex. did act in this matter as an agent of Sunshine but that does not mean it could not be liable as a principal if in fact it did act as a principal, and if the documents disclose an intention that it should so act, and be liable as a principal. ... From these cases it appears that an agent may be liable under a contract in place of or in addition to its principal and the question of his liability will depend in any given case upon a construction of the documents. ...

Furthermore, Sunshine is also liable for the performance of the covenants of the operator jointly and severally with Sunshine Ex. and as a guarantor of the covenants of Sunshine Ex. Such liability arises as far as Sunshine is concerned from the agency agreement which is executed by all of the parties and in so far as any variation was made in the terms of the principal agreement... (emphasis added)

[para44] On the facts of this case, the plaintiff submits that the defendant Freda Farkas was also going to directly benefit by this transaction by her taking title to a 50% undivided interest as tenant in common with Mr. Gofman and in addition she personally undertook the obligation to pay interim occupancy charges (ex. 1, tab 8).

[para45] In my opinion, the taking of title and the agreement to accept personal liability to pay the monthly occupancy charges is inconsistent with the defendant Mrs. Farkas acting solely as a bare trustee by signing the agreement of purchase and sale on behalf of her principals. Rather, these actions are consistent with her receiving a direct benefit from the transaction as a principal to that transaction. Consequently, I agree with the submission made by the plaintiff that the defendant Freda Farkas can also be held liable with the co-defendants and that the plaintiff accordingly is not obliged to elect whether to take a judgment against Freda Farkas or judgment against her co-defendants, George Farkas and Roman Gofman.

4. If the plaintiff had a duty to mitigate damages, did it discharge that duty?

[para46] At this stage, the plaintiff has, prior to judgment elected, if successful, to obtain his remedy for breach of the agreement of purchase and sale by way of damages and has thereby abandoned his claim to specific performance. Moreover, the plaintiff has conceded that the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Asamera Oil Corp. v. Sea Oil & General Corp., [1979] 1 S.C.R. 633 is authority for the proposition that the mere assertion of a claim for specific performance does not oust the common law duty of the plaintiff to mitigate damages. The plaintiff does not seriously dispute that the plaintiff was required in this case to mitigate its damages and the action has properly proceeded on the footing that the plaintiff was required to mitigate damages as a matter of law.

[para47] The nature of the duty on the plaintiff to mitigate damages and the corresponding onus on the defendant to demonstrate that the plaintiff has not taken reasonable steps to discharge that duty has been set out by the Supreme Court of Canada in Dobson v. Winton and Robbins Limited, [1959] S.C.R. 775 as follows at p. 783:

In a common law action there is a duty upon the plaintiff to mitigate his damages and whether the course taken is a reasonable one is a question of fact; (Mayne on Damages, 11th Edition, pp. 147-8).

It is difficult to understand what more the plaintiff could have done in this case and he did adduce a considerable volume of evidence showing a reasonable attempt to mitigate his damages and, having done so, it is for the defendant to show that those steps were not such as a reasonable man would have taken in mitigating his damages and in disposing of the property; (Mayne on Damages, 11th Edition, p. 150).

[para48] In seeking to discharge the onus upon it to demonstrate an absence of mitigation on the part of the plaintiff, the defendant advances several specific omissions on the part of the plaintiff which the defendants submit are incompatible with any reasonable attempt at mitigation. In this respect the defendants submit that:

(a) the plaintiff failed to place the unit on an MLS listing until August 27, 1991; (b) the plaintiff failed to advertise the unit; (c) the plaintiff refused to deal with any inquiries in regard to the unit referring the matter to the defendants who at all times and in their Statement of Defence had stated that the agreement was at an end; (d) the plaintiff failed to sell the property in the late summer and early fall of 1990; and (e) the plaintiff failed to rent the property.

[para49] While I am prepared to acknowledge that Unit 310 was not listed on MLS until August 27, 1991, I am not prepared to find that this fact assists the plaintiff in establishing a lack of mitigation. In coming to this conclusion I have examined Ex. 3 which the plaintiff has filed in order to demonstrate the efforts he made to either rent or sell all of the units in the project. I accept the evidence of the plaintiff that prior to August 1991 he exposed all of the units including 310 to prospective purchasers through the listing broker, Royal LePage. In this respect, I accept Mr. Ezer's evidence that from time to time he listed two or three units in order to attract purchasers to the building and that he instructed the agents to show all of the units in the building, including 310, as available for either rent or sale. I am prepared to find that the fact that an offer to rent 310 was received in September 1990 and that an offer to purchase in December 1990 supports the evidence of Mr. Ezer. I am further prepared to find that Mr. Ezer made reasonable efforts to both rent and sell Unit 310 prior to August 31, 1991. The fact of listing in August of 1991 does not in my opinion detract from the reasonableness of the steps to sell or rent Unit 310 prior to that date.

[para50] With respect to the issue of advertising, Mr. Ezer testified that given the close proximity of the project to synagogues and in view of certain features of the project including Sabbath elevators, effort was made to reach the Orthodox Jewish community through advertising in the Canadian Jewish News as well as in other newspapers and other media both prior to and after May 1990 which is the date when the agreement for the defendants' purchase of Unit 310 was to have closed. I am prepared to find on the basis of the evidence of Mr. Ezer which is uncontradicted and which is confirmed by Exhibit 3, tab 6 and tab 10, that Royal LePage engaged in extensive advertising with respect to the units in the project and that Mr. Ezer also engaged in some advertising on his own. The defendant has not shown a failure to mitigate because of a failure to advertise.

[para51] The defendant submits that in refusing to deal with inquiries with respect to either the rental or sale of Unit 310 and further in referring such inquiries to the defendant, the plaintiff acted unreasonably in failing thereby to mitigate his damages. I do not accept this submission. The plaintiff was entitled to pursue its remedies by way of specific performance and could not unilaterally either rent or sell the unit without forfeiting its right to specific performance. While I appreciate that the defendant in turn had the right to insist that the agreement was at an end, I cannot accept that the plaintiff, by referring prospective purchasers or renters to the defendant, failed to mitigate his damages. On the contrary, in my opinion, the plaintiff acted reasonably in the circumstances by referring inquiries to the defendant. Such action was all that the plaintiff could reasonably do by way of mitigation and still preserve his right to specific performance. It should be noted that the defendant did not respond to either communication with respect to an offer to rent or an offer to sell. It is unfortunate that the offer to rent made on September 12, 1990 could not have been effected on a without prejudice basis as was the rental from March to November 1992. In my opinion, it was not incumbent upon the plaintiff to take the initiative to do so; by communicating the offer to rent in September 1990 and the offer to purchase in December 1990 the plaintiff took steps which were reasonable in the circumstances.

[para52] The defendant next submits that the plaintiff ought to have sold the unit for $175,000 in the late summer and early fall of 1990. I accept the submission of the plaintiff that to do so would not have been compatible with mitigation but on the contrary would have been clearly improvident.

[para53] It should be noted that the defendant agreed to purchase the unit for $391,900 but, prior to closing, the defendants themselves listed the unit for sale for $357,000 in January 1990 and subsequently reduced the listing price to $319,500 in March of 1990. It is obvious that the market was in a period of rapid decline and as was conceded by Mr. Farkas at trial, there were no purchasers in early 1990 or at the time of the alleged breach in May 1990.

[para54] I accept the evidence of Mr. Ezer who testified that Unit 404 which was sold in October of 1990 for $270,000 when the extra parking space is factored out was comparable to Unit 310 when allowance is made for the respective size and locations of the units. I accordingly accept the evidence of Mr. Ezer that the offer of $175,000 made for the purchase of Unit 310 was inordinately low and that it would have been improvident for the plaintiff to have accepted the offer. I accordingly find that the failure by the plaintiff to accept the offer does not constitute a failure to mitigate damages but on the contrary was a reasonable course of action in the circumstances. [para55] I moreover am prepared to find that the action of the plaintiff in communicating the offer to the defendant was a reasonable step compatible with mitigation in the circumstances. There were no further offers to purchase Unit 310 and in the context of the sale of only 3 of the units in the project between May 1990 and November 1992. I cannot say that the plaintiff acted unreasonably in refusing to sell the unit for $175,000 in October 1990.

[para56] Finally, the defendant takes issue with the failure of the plaintiff to rent the unit in September 1990. I have already found that it was not unreasonable for the plaintiff not to unilaterally accept the offer made to rent the unit in September of 1990 because to have done so would have caused the plaintiff to lose the right to specific performance which the plaintiff was entitled to maintain. In my opinion, the plaintiff acted reasonably in communicating the offer to rent to the defendant and thereby reasonably discharged its obligation to mitigate the damages in all of the circumstances.

[para57] On all of the evidence, I cannot find that any of the alleged failings of the plaintiff viewed either individually or cumulatively assist the defendant in demonstrating that the plaintiff has failed to discharge his obligation to mitigate his damages. In the circumstances, I find that the plaintiff has taken all reasonable steps to mitigate his damages.

4. (b) What is the proper way to assess the plaintiff's damages and as of what date should the damages be assessed?

[para58] The defendant submits that damages ought to be assessed at the date of breach. The plaintiff however submits that in circumstances when the real estate market is declining the defendants ought not to be permitted to "cap" their liability but rather damages ought to be assessed at the date of trial in conformity with the principle that the plaintiff be put in the same position it would have been in if the breach had not occurred. I accept the position of the plaintiff which in my opinion is supported by the decision of Eberle J. in Victoria Queen Investments Ltd. v. The Savarin Ltd. (1979), R.P.R. 32. I accept as apt to the circumstances of this case what was stated by Eberle J. at p. 41-42:

There is an issue as to whether the second date is the appropriate date or not. The traditional date for assessing damages of this kind has been the date of breach. That would, in my view, be the end of June or early part of July 1976. There is no evidence of the value of the property at that time; though, from the evidence, I would conclude that it was worth more then than it was towards the end of 1977.

In support of its claim the defendant relies on the Pressure Concrete case, which I have referred to, which applied the date of assessment of damages, namely the trial, as the date on which to take the market value and therefore the Court ascertained the difference between that market value and the contract price.

There is another line of authority exemplified recently by the 100 Main Street case, supra, in which the date of assessment was not taken but the date of the breach.

It appears to me that the distinction between those two cases is whether or not the party in the position of the plaintiff has kept the contract alive following its breach or repudiation by the opposite party; i.e., kept it alive, as by asserting a claim for specific performance. That was done in the Pressure Concrete case; it was done in this case; it was not done in the 100 Main Street case.

In my view I should follow the Pressure Concrete case. It seems to me that not to do so would be to leave the defendant vendor, who counterclaims for damages, at the risk of the decline in value of the property after the date of the breach, and that to do so would not give the defendant proper compensation in damages, according to the principle that the damages should put that party in the position it would have been in if there had not been any breach of the contract.

[para59] In my opinion, it is appropriate to assess damages at the date of trial in the circumstances of this case.

5. What is the quantum of damages?

[para60] The plaintiff has filed as exhibit 5 in this proceeding a schedule of damages and a revised schedule of damages. The Revised Schedule of Damages is reproduced below:

REVISED SCHEDULE OF DAMAGES

Damages

Purchase Price	$391,900.00	Occupancy Costs (etc.)	125,246.40	-----	$517,146.40	Less Deposits	97,975.00	-----
419,171.40	Less Interest on deposits (see attachment)	23,387.58	-----	395,783.82	Less Value today	207,321.26	-----
188,462.56	Add Real Estate brokerage fee to sell (5% of value today)	10,366.06	-----	198,828.62	Less Rental income
($1,250 per month from May 1, 1992 to Nov. 1, 1992 = 6 x $1,250)	7,500.00	-----		Total damages	$191,328.62

[para61] In my view, the general approach taken by the plaintiff to the calculation of damages is correct. However, I differ with the plaintiff as to the quantum of total damages as well as the quantum of some of the items involved in the calculations for reasons which I will outline.

[para62] In view of my finding that the Reciprocal Agreement does not constitute a "material amendment" to the disclosure documentation the defendant is not entitled to rescind the agreement of purchase and sale.

[para63] The purchase price is correctly taken from the agreement of purchase and sale to be $391,900.00 and I am prepared to confirm this figure in the revised schedule of damages as properly due to the plaintiff with respect to the purchase price of Unit 310. [para64] The amount of $125,246.40 with respect to occupancy costs is derived by the plaintiff by calculating $3,913.95 per month by 32 months representing the time period from March 1, 1990 to November 1, 1992. The monthly amount for occupancy cost was agreed to by the parties to commence from the period of interim closing in October 1989. The defendants honoured their obligation by means of postdated cheques which were cashed by the plaintiff until the defendants ordered payment to be stopped in March 1990 on the basis that such payments were illegal "phantom mortgages". That argument has been formally abandoned. In my view, the defendants have been entitled to possession of Unit 310 from March 1990 to November 1992 and have been liable for the occupancy costs throughout this period. I confirm that $125,246.40 is properly and correctly due to the plaintiff with respect to occupancy costs.

[para65] From this total amount of $517,146.40 must be deducted $97,975.00 which constitutes deposits made by the defendants in respect of the agreement of purchase and sale.

[para66] Also to be deducted is the amount of $23,387.58 which constitutes interest on the deposits mandated by section 53 of the Condominium Act. The calculations of the amount is appended to the revised schedule of damages and the defendant takes no issue with it. I confirm that $23,387.58 is properly deducted.

[para67] Also to be deducted is the value of the condominium unit today. The plaintiff has suggested four methods to calculate the amount value of Unit 310. The first is based on the sale of Unit 503 for $165,000 in October 1992. Since the unit is 1,000 sq. ft. the plaintiff calculates that it was sold for $165 a sq. ft. and that accordingly Unit 310 is worth (165 x 1,250 sq. ft.) $206,250.00.

[para68] The first calculation does not take into account the two parking spaces allotted to Unit 310 and the second method which does take the parking spaces into account determines that the unit is worth $213,750.00.

[para69] The third method is based on the sale in February 1992 of Unit 410 which is identical to Unit 310 and also has two parking spaces. The price for Unit 410 was $220,000.00.

[para70] The fourth method is based on the current listing of Unit 201 at $225,000. This unit is identical in size and parking amenities to 310.

[para71] The amount claimed by the plaintiff in the revised schedule of damages appears to be based on a calculation of current value by means of the first method, i.e. $165 per sq. ft. While this method is based on current data, units 503 and 310 are not comparable either in size or location. In my view, this assessment of current value is too low bearing in mind that Unit 310 is bigger and has a preferable location as a corner unit with a southerly view.

[para73] I prefer to base the current value of Unit 310 on the third suggested method, i.e., on the purchase price of Unit 410.

[para74] While the estimate of current value of Unit 310 based on the purchase price of Unit 410 is less current than some of the other comparables, that estimate nevertheless is based on what a purchaser was willing to pay for an identical unit. In my view, the current value of Unit 310 is most fairly based on the purchase price of Unit 410 and accordingly I am prepared to deduct $220,000 as indicative of the current value of the unit.

[para75] It follows that the brokerage fee to sell the unit, which I agree ought to be included will be calculated at 5% of $220,000.

[para76] Finally, I accept that the rental income from May 1, 1992 to November 1, 1992 in the amount of $7,500 as calculated in Ex. 5 ought also to be deducted.

[para77] I have accordingly proposed a schedule of damages as follows:

Damages

Purchase Price	$391,900.00	Occupancy Costs (etc.)	125,246.40	-----	17,146.40	Less Deposits	97,975.00	-----
	419,171.40	Less Interest on deposits	23,387.58	-----	395,783.82	Less Value today	220,000.00	-----
							175,783.82	Add Real
		Estate brokerage fee to sell (5% of value today)	11,000.00	-----	186,783.82	Less Rental income ($1,250 per month from May 1, 1992 to Nov. 1, 1992 = 6 x $1,250)	7,500.00	-----
								Total Damages
								$179,283.82

[para78] There shall be judgment for the plaintiff in the amount of $179,283.82 with costs of the action.

[para79] There shall be an order for pre-judgment and post-judgment interest in accordance with the Courts of Justice Act.

Strata Plan 1261 v. 360204 B.C. Ltd.

Between The Owners, Strata Plan 1261, plaintiff, and 360204 B.C. Ltd. and Alan Wilson, defendants

[1995] B.C.J. No. 2761

Vancouver Registry No. C953575

British Columbia Supreme Court Vancouver, British Columbia (In Chambers) Thackray J. Heard: October 23 and 24 and November 29, 1995. Judgment: filed December 22, 1995.

Counsel: F.E. Verhoeven and E.G. Wong, for the plaintiff. B.A. Meckling, for the defendant, 360204 B.C. Ltd.

[para1] THACKRAY J.-- The plaintiff applied pursuant to Rule 18A of the Rules of Court for an order that a Parking Garage Agreement relating to a condominium project is void. The motion asks for a declaration voiding the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant 360204 B.C. Ltd. (the "defendant"), dated July 14, 1989 and described as an "Exclusive Use Agreement for Residential Parking Stalls (the "agreement").

[para2] By way of relief the plaintiff asked for an accounting of all money received by the defendant, an order for occupational rent, interest and costs and an interlocutory injunction against the collecting of further rent by the defendant.

A. BACKGROUND

[para3] The plaintiff Strata Corporation came into existence pursuant to Section 13 of the Condominium Act R.S.B.C. 1979, c.61 (the "Act") on March 15, 1983.

[para4] The defendant was a wholly owned subsidiary of Mastercraft Development Corporation (now called XMDC Corporation) which in turn was one of the Mastercraft Group ("Mastercraft"). At all material times the directors were Mr. John Greenberg, Mr. Bruce Greenberg and the defendant Mr. Alan Wilson.

[para5] The building to which Strata Plan 1261 relates is known as The Ocean Terrace Landmark located in Sidney, British Columbia. There are 83 residential suites and 14 commercial premises. There are 101 parking spaces in the building all of which are designated on the Strata Plan as "limited common property" and "limited for the use of strata lots 15 to 97". That is, for the residential suites.

[para6] In 1988 Orange Elk Industries Ltd. owned the residential units which were leased to a variety of tenants and investors. T-West Estates Ltd. owned all of the commercial units. Orange Elk and T-West held their titles to the units on behalf of T-West Estates Limited Partnership. Mastercraft, through Mastercraft Investments Corporation ("M.I.C"), negotiated a purchase of the building. Two sale agreements dated October 4, 1988 were entered into, one of which pertained to all the residential units.

[para7] Mastercraft intended to market the residential units through Ocean Terrace Landmark Partnership (the "partnership") which was created by Mastercraft. Mastercraft assigned its rights in the residential units sale agreement to the partnership by way of an agreement dated May 14, 1989. Forty four of the units were conveyed to the partnership. The remaining 39 were conveyed directly from Orange Elk to individual purchasers.

[para8] The partnership marketed the residential units with the aid of an Offering Memorandum dated May 15, 1989. It provided, in part, as follows:

"The purchase of Condominium Units offered hereby does not include title to a parking space but residents of the Condominium Units will have the right to lease a parking space on a month to month basis at prevailing market rents, currently $30 per month per space. The Condominium Corporation manages and administers these parking spaces and will lease them at nominal rent to Mastercraft Investments Corporation for a term of 3 years, which term shall be extended on the same basis upon receipt of all required government approvals.

[para9] The 39 direct purchasers entered into a Purchase Agreement dated May 16, 1989 which provided as follows:

The Purchaser acknowledges and agrees that the parking stalls located in the building may be leased by the Vendor from the strata corporation for a three (3) year term from July 15, 1989 and the Vendor may sub-lease any parking stall to any person at and for a price to be agreed upon between the Vendor and such person. The Purchaser acknowledges that no interest of any nature whatsoever in any parking stall is included in the purchase price of the condominium unit purchased by the purchaser pursuant to this Agreement and that at the end of the said three (3) year lease the Vendor may apply to have any parking stalls designated as separate strata lots. The Purchaser shall do all things necessary to permit such designation and the transfer of title to and use of the said parking stall to the Vendor by the Strata Corporation.

[para10] This agreement further acknowledged that the purchaser was not to be a tenant but rather was buying for investment purposes.

[para11] On July 14, 1989 the transaction completed. The residential units were transferred from Orange Elk to the partnership and its trustee 360203. The defendant says that as part of the closing the plaintiff entered into a Condominium Management Agreement that retained M.I.C. as its condominium manager with authority to act in its name. The defendant Wilson carried out M.I.C.'s duties under this agreement.

[para12] The parking garage agreement provides that the defendant, in consideration of $10, has a "contractual licence for the exclusive use and enjoyment of all of the parking stalls ... in the building ... for 99 years." The defendant Wilson signed the agreement and affixed the common seal of the plaintiff. From July, 1989 to March, 1993 he was the senior property manager of Mastercraft. Mr. Wilson deposed that as such he was responsible for the administration and management of the plaintiff's affairs and of the building. Further, that in the closing of the sale of the building to Mastercraft he was appointed by M.I.C. "to carry out its duties".

[para13] Mr. Wilson further deposed that "in conjunction with the closing" the partnership, 360203 and the defendant "appointed me as their duly authorized representative and agent to act on their behalf in connection with the management of the Strata Corporation's affairs and the Landmark Building." Mr. Wilson said that he executed the parking garage agreement "on behalf of the Strata Corporation."

[para14] Mr. Bruce C. Greenberg, a director of the defendant, executed the agreement on behalf of the defendant. He deposed that Mr. Wilson executed the parking agreement on behalf of the plaintiff at the direction of and as the representative of the partnership, 360203 and the defendant. Further, that M.I.C. appointed Mr. Wilson as its representative responsible for carrying out its duties under a Rental Management Agreement which provided that the agent may enter into contracts and agreements in the name of and on behalf of The Owner as may be necessary in the performance of such duties.

[para15] The first meeting of the owners of the Strata Corporation was held on May 18, 1990. Minutes of an Annual General Meeting of that date indicate that Mr. Wilson was elected as a director.

[para17] In accordance with s.101 of the Act each residential unit's share of the common property, including the parking garage, is assessed and taxed together with each strata lot. The owners of the units thereby pay the property taxes on the unit and the common property. The plaintiff pays the maintenance expenses and insurance premiums on all of the common property as required by s. 54 of the Act.

[para18] All 83 residential units were sold by February, 1990. Many of the original investors have sold their residential units. Twenty two are still owned by the original investors. Fourteen of these continue to participate in a rental pool and have their tenants pay parking fees to the defendant.

[para19] In a letter dated May 6, 1993 the plaintiff notified the defendant that it wished a termination of the agreement. Following a preamble, Mr. Newton, Council Chairman, said:

Thus, the Strata Council proposes that the owners and company agree to terminate the contract, and further agree that the Strata Council would, in this event, not seek to recover rents that have already been paid.

[para20] In a letter dated June 2, 1993 the defendant's solicitors declined the proposal. The letter said that the defendant had "made full disclosure of the existence of the Agreement to original purchasers of strata lots in the development." Reference was then made to the wording in the Offering Memorandum of May 15, 1989.

[para21] This was the first challenge by residential unit owners residing in the building, or tenants or investors, regarding the monthly rental charges for parking. The defendant submitted as follows:

The Strata Corporation seeks to set aside an agreement which it and 360204 performed for 4 years without a hint of controversy and recover monies it expressly permitted 360204 to collect with full knowledge of its options. This, it cannot do.

[para22] The plaintiff contends that the parking garage agreement was kept under wraps by the defendant. The defendant submits that "parking arrangements" were "a notorious fact." (Defence counsel said that he used the word "notorious" to mean "well known".)

[para23] On September 16, 1993, at an Extraordinary General Meeting, the plaintiff passed a special resolution that reads, in part, as follows:

Resolved September 16, 1993, as a Special Resolution, that the Council, in its discretion, pursue the termination of the [parking garage] contract ... on behalf of the owners of strata lots 15 to 97, and that such action may include cancellation of the contract under section 17 of the Condominium Act, or whatever action the Council deems advisable ... Only the owners of strata lots 15 to 97 may vote on this resolution.

[para24] The last sentence may explain why the defendant did not receive notice of the meeting.

[para25] On October 26, 1993 the plaintiff's then solicitors wrote to the defendants' solicitors. The letter contains the opinion that the parking garage agreement is invalid. The letter goes on to detail the "difficulties" that the agreement faced relative to the Act. It reads in part as follows:

1. Section 17 [of the Act] says that a contract entered into by a strata corporation which provides for control, management or administration of the common property (which includes limited common property) shall be limited to matters affecting security and maintenance. This Agreement certainly affects the control of the common property in question, however, it is not limited to security and maintenance. As it purports to deal with exclusive use of the common property, it appears to be ultra vires.

2. The Agreement purports to deal with the common property separately from the strata lots of the owner, which is contrary to the principles of the Condominium Act.

3. The Agreement may be in breach of the general duty owed to act in the best interests of the strata lot owners, and for their benefit.

4. The Agreement purports to amend the strata plan that was registered in the Land Title Office. In that plan, the owner-developer designated the limited common property in question for the use of the owners of strata lots 15 to 97. Such a designation cannot be changed without the appropriate resolution of the owners registered in the Land Title Office. We refer you to Section 53(6) which says that "a resolution ... removing, adding to or altering the designation ... has no effect after May 17, 1978 unless a copy of the resolution is filed in the Land Title Office."

5. Section 58 requires a unanimous resolution to amend a designation of limited common property. It does not appear that the proper procedure was followed in this case.

6. Section 17 of the Condominium Act also states that a contract providing for the control, management and administration of the common property may, by special resolution of the corporation, be cancelled on three months notice.

[para26] Immediately following this the letter advises of the special resolution cancelling the agreement and gives "formal notice" under s. 17 of the Act of the cancellation as of January 31, 1994. The letter concludes as follows:

We have given instructions to the Regional Group to remit all funds owing under this contract to you up to and including the time of termination.

[para27] By a letter dated April 26, 1995 the plaintiff advised the defendant that if the parking agreement was still in existence it had been breached by the defendant. The alleged breach was in renting parking stalls to persons who were neither owners or tenants of the residential units.

B. ISSUES

[para28] The plaintiff submitted that the parking garage agreement:

(a) is void in that:

(i) It is contrary to numerous provisions of the Act; and

(ii) There is no authority on behalf of the Strata

Corporation to enter into it; or

(b) alternatively, the parking garage agreement has been terminated.

[para29] The defendant submitted that the letter of October 26, 1993 led it to believe that the plaintiff was abandoning its position that the agreement was invalid, especially in that the rent continued to be paid to the defendant. This letter is indeed a mixture of notification of a void contract and notice of a cancelled contract. However, I will not disallow the plaintiff from asserting a void contract simply because of this letter.

[para30] The defendant submitted that there is no need for the Court to decide upon the alleged breaches of the Act. It bases this upon the suggestion that for the Court to interfere in this matter would be unjustified judicial interference with a commercial transaction.

[para31] The defendant says that even if the Court finds that the agreement is a lease, as submitted by the plaintiff, it should not release the plaintiff from a commercial arrangement acted on by both parties. It said that "To do so would frustrate the business intent of the transaction and result in the unjust enrichment of the Strata Corporation and its constituent Owners at the expense of 360204."

[para32] The defendant relies upon the words of the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal in Condominium Plan No. 86-S-36901 (Owners) v. Remail Construction (1981) Inc. (1992) 84 D.L.R. (4th) 6 (Sask. C.A.):

The judge took too narrow a view of the common law and the provisions of the [Condominium Property] Act. The common law developed by adapting to new situations as they arose, and the common law must adapt to accommodate condominium regimes. Similarly, the provisions of the Act must be interpreted in light of the realities of what actually happens in relationships between developers, purchasers and condominium corporations.

[para33] The defendant further contends that even if there are contraventions of the Act the agreement is not automatically void. It said that "Our courts will be slow to set aside a commercial agreement simply on the basis that it may infringe governing legislation if such a result frustrates the commercial intent of the parties." It takes this from Dodge v. Eisenmann (1985), 23 D.L.R. (4th) 711 (B.C.C.A.) at 721-722:

"I think this to be a case where it cannot be said that the whole object of the contract was to violate the regulation. I do not think there was any intention to do so. To hold otherwise would be to fail to give to the agreement the commercial effect which the parties intended. Illegal contracts are not enforced as a matter of public policy. There is nothing in this contract, or in the circumstances of this case, upon which to base a conclusion that this arrangement offended public policy.

[para34] The defendant's submission is that the Strata Corporation entered a contract for the benefit of its members for which there was consideration. This, according to the defendant, is acknowledged in the Purchase Agreement of May 16, 1989 that provides as follows:

The Purchaser acknowledges that no interest of any nature whatsoever in any parking stall is included in the purchase price of the condominium unit ...

[para35] Further, the defendant points out, the definition of "revenues" in the Offering Memorandum reads:

Revenues shall mean all rents, receipts, payments and other charges payable by tenants or otherwise in connection with the Unit (which, for greater certainty, excludes any rental payments for parking spaces).

[para36] I agree with the general assertions of the defendant regarding judicial interference in commercial bargains. As was said by Madam Justice Southin in Wolf Mountain Coal Limited Partnership v. Netherlands Pacific Mining Co. Inc. (1988), 31 B.C.L.R. (2d) 16 (S.C.):

An essential purpose of written instruments is the prevention or, at least, easy resolution, of differences. The legal system does not well serve the important commercial interests of the province if it plays fast and loose with the law of contract.

[para37] However, the courts must intervene in a commercial transaction if there are elements that are illegal, contrary to public policy or contrary to relevant statutory provisions. For instance, if the agreement is a lease and thereby divests the owners of equity contrary to the Act, the Court might have to "interfere". As was said in Dodge, supra, "Illegal contracts are not enforced as a matter of public policy."

[para38] The concept of limited judicial intervention is simply a principle designed to remind the courts that they should proceed cautiously in becoming involved in commercial transactions. I will therefore proceed to consider the various breaches alleged by the plaintiff.

1. Rental of Parking Stalls to Non-Residents

[para39] The plaintiff alleges that the parking garage agreement was terminated by the plaintiff effective April 26, 1995 as a result of the defendant's breach in renting parking spaces to persons who were neither residential owners or residential tenants in the building. It says that the agreement makes no provision for assigning or sub-contracting the defendant's rights to "any other party".

[para40] The defendant rented parking spaces to some of its commercial tenants and to others who had no direct connection with the building. The agreement provides that the defendant may assign or sub-contract its rights to the exclusive use of the parking stalls "to such owner ... as the Company [defendant] may in its sole discretion determine." It also states that the plaintiff will not interfere with "any assignee or sub-contractors use and enjoyment of any of the Parking Stalls."

[para41] While the agreement is silent as to whether or not an assignment or sub-contract of rights may be made to other than owners, the essence of the agreement suggests that it was not meant to be as restrictive as suggested by the plaintiff. The preamble states that the plaintiff "has determined to grant to the Company a contractual licence for the exclusive use and enjoyment of all of the parking stalls ...". This is repeated in the body of the agreement which further provides that the exclusive use shall be for 99 years.

[para42] Furthermore, I am of the opinion that if such rentals are a breach of the agreement they are not fundamental to the contract. Therefore, they do not operate as a repudiation of the contract by the defendant nor allow the plaintiff to terminate the contract.

2. Section 17

[para43] The plaintiff submits that the agreement was terminated by the plaintiff effective January 31, 1994 pursuant to section 17 of the Act. This section reads as follows:

A contract entered into by a strata corporation providing for the control, management and administration of the common property, common facilities or the assets of the strata corporation shall be limited to matters affecting the security and maintenance of the common property, common facilities or the assets of the strata corporation and, without either party to the contract incurring any liability for breach,

- (a) may be cancelled on 3 months' notice at the option and discretion of the owners, by special resolution of the corporation; or
- (b) may be cancelled on 3 months' notice by the management company or manager.

[para44] I am of the opinion that the failure of the plaintiff to give to the defendant notice of the extraordinary general meeting is fatal to its claim under this section. The purported special resolution of September 16, 1993 is of no force or effect.

[para45] Further, section 17 is intended to permit strata corporations to cancel agreements with management companies. The section is not designed to give strata corporations a method of backing out of commercial contracts.

3. Sections 5 and 12

[para46] Section 5 requires that areas such as garages and parking spaces "shall not be designated as separate strata lots but shall be included as part of the strata lot or as part of the common property." Pursuant to section 4 the strata plan shall show the approximate square footage of each strata lot, including the spaces referred to in section 5.

[para47] Section 12.(1) provides that the common property, common facilities and other assets of the strata corporation "shall be held by the owners as tenants in common in shares proportional to the unit entitlement of their strata lots." Section 12.(2) provides that "a share in common property, [and] common facilities ... shall not be dealt with separately from the strata lot of the owner." Section 12.(3) states that the Registrar of Land Titles "shall show on every indefeasible title for a strata lot the owner's share in the common property created by that plan."

[para48] The Act makes it clear that common property is an integral part of the strata and cannot be separated from it except in accordance with the Act. The defendant says that there is no extinguishment, separation, alienation or disposition of the plaintiff's proprietary interest in the parking stalls: "This is why there is nothing on the title." It says that section 12.(2) provides only that "a share" in the common property shall not be dealt with separately. It interprets this as being no more than a bar to an owner selling a share in the common property separate from an interest in the strata lot.

[para49] This, the defendant says, "does not prevent the valid grant of contractual rights over the common property" and refers to sections 20.(1), 57 and 58 of the Act which provide for the disposition of common property. The defendant thereby submits that section 12 does no more than recognize the special nature of condominium schemes and that an owner holds title to both the strata lot and the common property and that a sale of the strata lot will transfer the interest in the common property as well.

[para50] In my opinion the agreement alters the extent of the common property over which an owner has rights. Indeed, Mr. Greenberg, a director of the defendant, deposed that purchasers "had no rights to the Parking Stalls." The plaintiff contends that this is not in keeping with the legislative intention as articulated by Dennis J. Pavlich in Condominium Law in British Columbia, Butterworths, 1983, p.3:

What is innovative is the comprehensive nature of the statutory law that gives effect to a condominium title. Besides introducing a novel means of subdividing land, the [Act] gave birth to a unique property-law regime in British Columbia. It did so by formally legislating a title which, broadly speaking, consists of an estate ... in respect of a described part of a building ... coupled inextricably with an undivided interest as a tenant in common in respect of the remaining ("common") areas (either in the form of land, air space, facilities or buildings). Under s. 12(2) it is made clear that an owner cannot separate these two interests and deal with them individually.

[para51] The concept of the common areas being "coupled inextricably" with the title to the strata lots is undoubtedly correct. However, that principle must be taken in conjunction with those sections of the Act that specifically provide for the disposition of common property. Consequently, the common property is capable of disposition provided it is not "designated as a separate strata lot" and provided, of course, that the disposition is done in accordance with the Act.

[para52] The principle of "inextricably linked", if applied to section 5, would suggest that the removal of the parking garage would not save the agreement from being in breach of that section. The agreement, being either a lease or a licence affecting a portion of the common property in a manner tantamount to a lease, does not comply with the "all-inclusive" legislative intent envisaged by section 5.

[para53] Furthermore, the original sale purchase agreements provided that the purchaser agreed to purchase a strata lot "together with an interest in the common property in proportion to the unit entitlement of the Strata Lot as shown on Form 1." The "proportionality" no longer conforms to the entitlement as described in the Land Title Office.

[para54] However, the defendant says that if the proper procedure had been followed the parking garage could have been legally carved out from the rest of the common property. The defendant concedes that "Strata Plan 1261 has not been amended to remove the designation of limited common property for the parking garage." It says that the defendant's "ability to rectify any [such] deficiencies with respect to parking arrangements at the Landmark Building has long since passed."

[para55] The plaintiff concedes that "Pursuant to Section 57(1) and Section 58, the designation of limited common property could have been removed, and the strata plan amended accordingly" Consequently, in that the parties agree that the garage could have been severed from the common property, I will not base this judgment upon my view that soundness of the "inextricably linked" principle produces a breach of section 5.

4. Is the Agreement a Lease or a Licence? [para56] The plaintiff contends that the agreement is a lease of a part of the property and thereby a disposition thereof. It grants to the defendant the exclusive use and enjoyment of the parking garage for a period of 99 years. The owners continue to pay taxes, insurance and maintenance costs but have been divested of the usual rights of owners.

[para57] The defendant submits that the agreement has few of the features of a lease and is not a lease. The defendant says that it "has no right to regulate access to the garage, has no provision for monthly rent, is not permitted to make improvements or alter the garage and has none of the remedial rights available to lessees." Its only recourse for a breach or wrongful revocation would be to sue for damages.

[para58] Furthermore, the defendant points out, the owners pay the taxes on the garage and pay for maintenance to protect it from deterioration. This, it says, supports its contention that the agreement is but a licence and does not dispose of common property.

[para59] There is no doubt but that the words of the agreement purport to make it a licence. The preamble states that the plaintiff "has determined to grant to the Company a contractual licence for the exclusive use and enjoyment of all of the parking stalls ...". Paragraph 1 states as follows:

The Strata Corporation hereby grants to the Company a contractual licence to the exclusive use and enjoyment of the Parking Stalls for a period of Ninety-Nine (99) years ..."

[para60] The question is whether or not these are just words or are matters of substance. The words that are used are not determinative of the issue. In Megarry & Wade's The Law of Real Property, 5th ed., 1984, the authors state at page 623:

The distinction [between licences and leases] is thus governed by the situation created by the parties rather than by their expressed intentions.

[para61] The plaintiff relies upon Brockville v. Dobbie & Ritchie [1929] 3 D.L.R. 583 (Ont.S.C., Appellate Div.). The trial judge said that the documents did not have the ear-marks of a lease. He then listed the "ear-marks" which included an exclusive right to possession. That is, the right to exclude all other persons from the property. On appeal the Court said at page 590:

The test of whether a document is a lease appears to depend on whether it confers a right of exclusive occupation. It is not, however, a question of words but of substance. If the effect of the instrument is to give the holder an exclusive right of occupation of the land, though subject to certain reservations or to a restriction of the purposes for which it may be used, it is in law a demise of the land itself." Glenwood Lbr. Co. v. Phillips, [1904] A.C. 405, at p. 408.

[para62] The threshold question is whether a grant of exclusive use amounts to the granting of property rights. In Reilly v. Booth (1890), 44 Ch. D. 12 (C.A.), Lopes L.J. stated at page 26:

In the deed of 1839 certain parcels are conveyed to Wimbush which beyond all question he takes absolutely, and then follow these important words: 'Together with the exclusive use of the said gateway into Oxford Street ...'. Now what passed in respect of this gateway? ... I think ownership passed. The exclusive use of a piece of land, I take it, beyond all question passes the property or ownership in that land ...

[para63] A similar result occurred in R. v. N.T.C. Smokehouse (25 June 1993), Vanc. Reg. No. CA011962 (B.C.C.A.). One of the questions the Court faced was whether a certain section of legislation gave the band "exclusive use and enjoyment" of all fishing privileges in the river fronting the reservation. The Court held that the section granted the Band an interest in land with regard to the river.

[para64] In The Owners: Condominium Plan Number 752-1207 v. Terrace Corporation (Construction) Ltd. (1980) 14 Alta. L.R. (2d) 24 (Q.B.), appeal at (1983) 43 A.R. 386, the facts are strikingly similar to the case at bar. The agreement in that case was for 46 parking stalls for 99 years. It appears that it was not contested but that the agreement was a lease.

[para65] In North American Life Assurance Co. v. Canada Mortgage and Housing Corp. (30 September 1994), Q.B. No 1672 (Sask. Q.B.), the Court agreed that the grant of "exclusive use and enjoyment" of one-half of the parking stalls in a condominium tower was a lease.

[para66] It can be seen that the courts have traditionally been concerned with the substance of a contract, not the form. In my opinion the parking garage agreement passed property rights in the parking stalls to the defendant. Hence, it must follow that the agreement is a lease.

[para67] In contrast, which helps to distinguish between a lease and a licence, the contracts granting use of the parking stalls to those who rented from the defendant are licences.

5. Sections 20 and 58

[para68] Section 20.(1) of the Act reads:

The owners may, by special resolution, direct the strata corporation to dispose of all or part of its common property or assets, and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, may direct the strata corporation to grant an easement or a restrictive covenant burdening the common property included in the strata plan.

[para69] Pursuant to subsections of section 20 a proper instrument must be executed and, if presented in a land title office for registration, shall be accompanied by a sealed certificate that the appropriate resolution was passed.

[para70] Sections 57.(1)(c) and 58 of the Act are as follows:

57.(1) A strata plan may be amended to ... (c) remove a designation of limited common property designated on the strata plan;

58. The owners may, by special resolution, direct the strata corporation to amend the strata plan under section 57.(1)(c).

[para71] In my opinion the agreement is a lease. However, even if I am wrong in so classifying the agreement, it is nevertheless a disposition. In either case it requires a special resolution pursuant to section 20.(1) of the Act. The agreement also removes the designation of "limited common property" as shown on Strata Plan 1261. Section 58 of the Act requires a "unanimous resolution" of the owners to effect such a change in designation. This was not done and is a breach of the requirements of the Act.

6. Section 130

[para72] Section 130 of the Act provides that the common seal of a strata corporation shall not be used except by authority of the council and in the presence of at least two council members who shall sign every instrument to which the seal is affixed. The plaintiff contends that Mr. Wilson was not authorized to use the seal or to sign the agreement on behalf of the plaintiff.

[para73] The plaintiff relies upon the following words of Osler J. in York Condominium Corporation No. 162 v. Noldon Investments Ltd. (1977), 1 R.P.R. 236 (Ont. H.C.J.):

In the circumstances attendant upon the formation of a condominium, however, at a time when the developers are the sole members of the board of the condominium and are in a position essentially to contract with themselves and to subcontract to other related corporations, it is essential in the interest of the non-developer owners, present and future, that contracts of such a nature be attended by the proper formalities and made available to interested members of the public as required by the Act.

[para74] Mr. Justice Osler found the formalities were not complied with and, therefore, declared a contract ultra vires.

[para75] The defendant does not take issue with plaintiff's position that the seal of the plaintiff was not affixed in accordance with the Act. Rather, the defendant says that "Mr. Wilson possessed all the necessary authority under the Condominium Management Agreement, Rental Management Agreement and as the appointed representative of the owners to execute the agreement."

[para76] The matter of the use of the seal is not a significant issue. The significant issue is whether or not Mr. Wilson had the authority to sign the agreement on behalf of the plaintiff.

[para77] The plaintiff stated as follows in his brief:

Wilson was not authorized by the Strata Council to use the Strata Corporation's common seal or to sign the Parking Garage Agreement on behalf of the Strata Corporation. In fact, there was no Strata Council in place at the time the Parking Garage Agreement was signed on July 14, 1989. There is no record of any resolution of the Strata Corporation or of the Strata Council before or after July 14, 1989 authorizing Wilson to sign the Parking Garage Agreement. For all these reasons, the Parking Garage Agreement is void.

[para78] Deposition evidence was filed in support of the above information and submissions.

[para79] The defendant referred to affidavit evidence and documents to support its submission that Mr. Wilson had the authority to sign the agreement on behalf of the plaintiff. The defendant says that at the Closing on July 4, 1989 the plaintiff "engaged M.I.C. as its condominium manager and agent to manage all aspects of its affairs with full authority to act in its name (the "Condominium Management Agreement"). Further, that Mr. Wilson carried out M.I.C.'s duties under this agreement.

[para80] Mr. Greenberg deposed in his affidavit that the Strata Corporation engaged M.I.C. by way of a "Condominium Management Agreement" as its condominium manager and agent to manage all aspects of the Closing. He said that Mr. Wilson executed the Parking Garage Agreement on behalf of the Strata Corporation in this capacity "as well".

[para81] With reference to the Condominium Management Agreement, Mr. Greenberg referred to the Offering Memorandum that provides that "The Condominium Corporation has entered into a management agreement with the Condominium Manager to manage the common property of the strata plan for a 5 year term." It further states:

Pursuant to the Condominium management agreement, the Condominium Manager will be entitled to act in the name of the Condominium Corporation as may be necessary for the performance of the Condominium Corporation's duties under the Condominium Act and the by-laws.

[para82] However, the plaintiff is not a party to the Offering Memorandum.

[para83] Mr. Wilson deposed that from July, 1989 to March, 1993 he was the senior property manager of Mastercraft "responsible for the administration of the Plaintiff's affairs". Further, that M.I.C. was "engaged" by the plaintiff as its condominium manager with respect to "all aspects of its affairs" and that M.I.C. "appointed me as their duly authorized representative and agent" regarding the building.

[para84] In his affidavit Mr. Wilson said that he executed the agreement "on behalf of the Strata Corporation." He deposed that as well as his authority under the Condominium Management Agreement he "was also responsible for managing the Residential Units on behalf of the Investors pursuant to the rental management agreement."

[para85] Mr. Greenberg alluded to authority allegedly given to Mr. Wilson under the "Rental Management Agreement." He said that M.I.C. appointed Mr. Wilson as its representative to carry out its duties under this Agreement which provided that Mr. Wilson may enter into contracts in the name of the Strata Corporation.

[para86] The Rental Management Agreement is attached as a Schedule to the Agreement(s) of Purchase and Sale. The Agreements are between Ocean Terrace Landmark Partnership as vendor and individual owners. The Schedule, entitled Optional Rental Management Agreement, is between the individual owner and M.I.C. as agent. It provides as follows:

2.1 The Owner [individual owner] hereby engages and appoints the agent to be its sole and exclusive representative and managing agent to manage for and on behalf of the Owner and within the provision of this Agreement the Unit and to act on behalf of the Owner in carrying out the duties as hereinafter set out and subject to the provisions of this Agreement to enter into such contracts and agreements in the name of and on behalf of the owner as may be necessary in the performance of such duties.

[para87] In spite of all of the references to the authority of Mr. Wilson under the Condominium Management Agreement, it was not until Mr. R. Todd, a member of the Strata Corporation since 1993 and on the Strata Council since January 1995, said that "In searching the files of the Strata Corporation, I did not find any such agreement" that the defendant conceded that there is no such agreement.

[para88] These agreements and alleged agreements call to mind the words of Osler J. in York Condominium, supra, regarding the care which must be exercised by developers in the early stages of a development and at a time when they are contracting with themselves. In the case at bar it is not possible to find a line of authority to Mr. Wilson.

[para89] The defendant says that any defects in Mr. Wilson's appointment are cured by section 122.(3) of the Act which reads as follows:

All acts done in good faith by the council are, notwithstanding it is afterwards discovered that there was some defect in the appointment or continuance in office of a member of the council, as valid as if the member had been duly appointed or had duly continued in office.

[para90] We are not concerned here simply with some "defect in the appointment" of Mr. Wilson. Section 122.(3) can have no application to the situation which has been discussed in this segment of the reasons.

[para91] I find that Mr. Wilson was not authorized to contract on behalf of the owners.

7. Sections 14 and 116.(a)

[para92] Section 14 provides that the Strata Corporation is responsible for the enforcement of the bylaws, and the control, management and administration of the common property, common facilities and assets of the Strata Corporation.

[para93] The plaintiff contends that the parking garage agreement is contrary to these sections by surrendering control, management and administration of the parking garage to the defendant. The defendant countered that the plaintiff did not abandon its "responsibility" for the common property. Rather, it expressly granted rights over the parking. This, according to the defendant, is authorized by section 121 of the Act. Section 121.(c) provides that the council may delegate to members "those of its powers and duties it thinks proper".

[para94] What was done by the plaintiff in this regard was an abdication of some of its responsibility to manage the common property. However, this is probably acceptable within the Act provided it is done in accordance with the provisions of section 116.(a). Section 116.(a) states that the strata corporation shall control, manage and administer the common property for the benefit of all owners.

[para95] The plaintiff says that the surrendering of management and control by way of the agreement was not for the benefit of all of the owners but for the exclusive benefit of the defendant and Mastercraft: "The Strata Corporation may not abandon its obligations to control, manage and administer the common property: see Jacklin and others v. Proprietors of Strata Plan No. 2795 (1975), 15 N.S.W.L.R. 15 (Equity Division)".

[para97] The defendant thereby says as follows:

Each investor knew they were acquiring no rights to the parking and had engaged M.I.C. as their agent with complete authority to act in their name and the name of the Strata Corporation. M.I.C., through Mr. Wilson, did no more than carry out the commercial intent of the Landmark Offering on behalf of the investors and the Strata Corporation. The investors expected they too would benefit from their investment in the Landmark Building and presumably did so. If subsequent purchasers have any complaint it lies with the investors from whom they purchased.

[para98] The plaintiff contends that Mr. Wilson signed the agreement on behalf of the defendant and Mastercraft and not on behalf of the plaintiff. It says that this is contrary to section 116.(a) in that it gave preference to the interests of the defendant owner over that of the other owners. It was not, therefore, for the benefit of all owners.

[para99] In Hill v. Strata Plan NW 2477 Owners (1991), 57 B.C.L.R. (2d) 263 (C.A.) the Court held that an owner/developer did not have the power to grant exclusive use of two parking stalls to an owner. Proudfoot J.A. said that such a private agreement "lends itself to no end of arrangements being made with potential purchasers." For instance, one owner being given exclusive use of the "clubhouse or swimming pool". The Court saw this as giving one owner a "benefit at the expense of the other owners."

[para100] Madam Justice Proudfoot said that the decision in York Condominium Corp. No. 167 v. Newrey Holdings Ltd. (1981), 122 D.L.R. (3d) 280 (Ont. C.A.) was "of assistance". In that case each owner was entitled to one parking space and to "such additional parking space as may be purchased ...". The trial judge held that the Corporation was free to dispose of the additional parking spaces and retain the proceeds. Proudfoot J.A. said at page 466:

In my view, the respondent developer could not, either before or after the registration of the declaration, deal with any part of the common elements so as to defeat the unit purchasers' equitable interests in them.

I do not think the position of the owner-developer remains unchanged after he starts to sell units. I think that at that point he has committed the character of the project to that of condominium under the Act and [the strata plan]. I think he has also placed himself in a fiduciary relationship to the unit purchasers not only with respect to their units but also with respect to the interests appurtenant thereto. He therefore holds the property in trust for the unit purchasers, present and prospective, and for the condominium corporation which will come into being upon registration of the declaration. I believe he is under a duty to protect the interests of all unit owners, present and prospective, and cannot put his own interests in conflict with theirs even although he himself continues to be an owner as long as any units remain unsold.

[para101] In Carleton, supra, the Court distinguished York on the basis that in Carlton certain declarations were filed with respect to the common property. They provided that the owners had full use, occupancy and enjoyment of the common property subject to certain exceptions. The declarations set out descriptions of the various areas of common property which included one indoor parking space to be allocated to each of the 169 units.

[para102] Another declaration set out an exception. It declared that Mastercraft was entitled to the exclusive use of the balance of the parking spaces, which were 54 in number and outside. The effect of this declaration was to remove the outdoor parking from the inside parking which was limited common property.

[para103] Carleton did not disturb the principles enunciated in York. In my opinion the two principles set forth in York and adopted in Hill are applicable. First, once the strata plan is registered, the owner/developer has committed itself to the arrangement within it. Second, the developer is under an obligation to the individual buyers not to allow its self-interest to interfere with the interests of those present and future purchasers.

[para104] The second principle from York prevents, in my view, the owner/developer from utilizing its control (or domination) of the Strata Corporation in its infancy to better its position at the expense of future owners. It is prevented from entering into transactions with itself for its benefit as developer but to its detriment as owner. [para105] This was the position adopted in Remai Construction, supra. Sherstobitoff J.A., writing for the Court, referred to York, supra, as providing a "framework of principle". He suggested that he was adopting the definition of "condominium" to mean, among other things, that no one should be in a position to put his economic interests above the interests of the group so far as joint ownership, management or enjoyment of the property is concerned. [para106] In Remai the Court rejected the submission that legislative differences between Saskatchewan and Ontario made York inapplicable. It used a fiduciary duty analysis to enforce compliance with the spirit of the condominium legislation. The Court cited with approval the words of Wilson J.A. in York regarding the fiduciary duty of the developer to protect the interests of all unit owners, "past and prospective". Sherstobitoff J.A. went on to say at page 22:

Because of the close connection between the three companies that constitute the developer and their participation in the construction, development, operation and financing of the condominium, we conclude that the fiduciary duty extended to each of these companies and not merely to one or two of them.

[para107] It can be seen that the Court was not prepared to limit the fiduciary duties to one specific company among the development consortium. I accept this principle to apply in the case at bar to reach Mastercraft.

[para108] In Terrace Corporation, supra, the Zeiters were officers and employees of the defendant corporation. They, as the Board of Management of the plaintiff, agreed to lease 46 parking stalls to the defendant for 99 years. They also signed the agreement on behalf of the defendant. The trial judge suggested that trustee-like obligations are imposed on a developer with regard to common property once it enters into contracts for sale to individual owners.

[para109] On appeal the trial decision was approved as was the decision in York. In fact, it extends the York decision by stating that the fiduciary relationship exists even before the condominium plan is registered.

[para110] In The Owners, Strata Plan No. 1229 v. Trivantor Investments International Ltd., [1995] B.C.J. No. 557 (14 March 1995), Vict. Reg. No. 91 2714 (B.C.S.C.) Owen-Flood J. adopted Remai Construction and Terrace Corporation as the law in this province.

[para111] There is one other arm to this concept of fiduciary duty. That is the fiduciary duty of Mr. Wilson. The defendants have admitted that Mr. Wilson carried out the closing duties of M.I.C and that at the same time he was the agent of the Strata Corporation. Mr. Wilson executed the agreement on behalf of the Strata Corporation "at the direction of and as the representative of the" defendant.

[para112] The potential for conflict is obvious. Duties of loyalty are a principal fiduciary duty owed by an agent to his principal. In Terrace Corporation, supra, the trial judge said that the Zeiter's "were in conflict of interest when they literally purported to deal with themselves and are in breach of trust, having demonstrably failed to act in the best interests of the plaintiff corporation, and for this reason that lease must be set aside."

[para113] On appeal this breach of duty was upheld by Stevenson J.A. on behalf of the Court. He started his analysis at page 390 as follows:

On the face of it the lease of common property by the Zeiters, nominees and principals of Terrace, to Terrace was in breach of their fiduciary duty. They were managers of the property ... and leased that property to the very corporation which appointed them managers.

[para114] The conduct of Mr. Wilson is a s. 116 breach and violates his fiduciary duty as agent of the plaintiff. Furthermore, what Mr. Wilson did was on the instructions of Mastercraft. Similarly, therefore, Mastercraft is in fiduciary breach of its duties.

[para115] Finally, I conclude that the agreement was not "in the best interests of all of the owners". Such "owners" include "prospective owners." At the very most the agreement could be only for the benefit of the original owners who, apparently, received a price advantage. The obvious advantage was to the defendant and Mastercraft. For $10 plus a purported price reduction, they received the rights to 101 parking spaces for 99 years.

[para116] No benefit can be seen to the individual unit owners. It can therefore be said that the agreement was for the exclusive benefit of the defendant/Mastercraft and is contrary to the provisions of section 116.(a).

C. ESTOPPEL

[para117] Regardless of the reasons for the agreement being void, if the finding that the agreement is void is correct, estoppel cannot apply. See Halsbury's Laws of England, Fourth Edition, "Corporations", para. 1334; Rayonier B.C. Ltd. v. New Westminster (City) (1961), 36 W.W.R. N.S. 433 at 446 (B.C.C.A.). However, in the event that I am found to be incorrect in finding the agreement void, I will consider the estoppel submissions of the defendant.

Knowledge of the Owners

[para118] The defendant says that all of the original investors knew and agreed that Mastercraft would charge fees for parking. This, combined with the lack of challenge from 1989 to 1994 results in the plaintiff being "estopped and precluded from relying on any purported infringement" of the Act.

[para119] The defendant submitted that the real estate agent most involved in these sales, Ms. Inez Loudon, "expressly advised each purchaser of the parking arrangements at the Landmark Building. It was a notorious fact."

[para120] Ms. Loudon deposed as follows: Between 1991 and 1994 she was involved in at least 20 sales of strata lots in the building. Usually she was the listing agent although sometimes she was only the selling agent. On March 4, 1991 she wrote to Mastercraft. In part, her letter reads: I would like confirmation regarding parking. Is there one parking stall per unit? If the purchaser would like a second parking stall, can he pay a monthly fee for one? Is there a specific parking stall designated for each unit?

[para121] In a letter dated March 11, 1991 Mr. Wilson, on behalf of Mastercraft, replied as follows:

... Further, the parking is owned by a separate company and there will be a monthly rental charge of $20 per stall and indeed the parking agreement could be a long term arrangement.

[para122] On October 16, 1995 counsel for the defendant wrote to Ms. Loudon, enclosed a copy of the agreement, and asked her a series of questions. Ms. Loudon replied in a letter dated October 18, 1995. The questions and answers are as follows:

Q. What did the vendor say to the purchaser or the real estate agent(s) (listing or selling) about parking privileges, if any at the Landmark building?

A. All discussions regarding parking were conducted with Mastercraft, not the vendors.

Q. What inquiries did you make and to whom did you make them respecting an owner's right to parking at the Landmark building?

A. All enquiries were made to Mastercraft direct. Enquiries centred around the # of stalls per unit and additional costs, if any for extra parking spots. See my letter dated March 4, 1991.

Q. Did you discuss an owner's right to parking at the Landmark building with Alan Wilson and, if so, what did he tell you?

A. Yes, see the letter from Alan Wilson to me dated March 11, 1991.

Q. Did Alan Wilson ever provide you with a copy of the Parking Agreement (copy enclosed)? A. No.

Q. Did Alan Wilson or Mastercraft provide you with written information concerning parking at the Landmark and, if so please describe the nature of that information and provide us with a copy of same.

A. See letter dated March 11,1991.

Q. What did you say to the purchaser respecting an owner's right to parking at the Landmark building?

A. There was an additional fee payable to Mastercraft for parking. Parking fees were noted on the Listing Contracts.

Q. What did the purchaser know, in your view, about an owner's right to parking when the interim agreement was executed?

A. I can only tell you what I told them, and that was that there was an additional amount for parking and that amount, at that time, was noted on the Listing Contract.

Q. If parking was discussed among the purchaser, vendor and real estate agents, why was no reference made to parking in most of the contracts?

A. No reference was made to parking in the Contracts because there was nothing registered on Title. The parking was "Limited Common Property. Limited for the use of Strata Lots 15 to 97."

[para123] In an affidavit sworn November 20, 1995 Ms. Loudon deposed as follows:

2. With respect to telling purchasers that there was an additional fee payable for parking ... these discussions took place on showings of the various suites to prospective purchasers. I was usually present for those showings. What I would tell prospective purchasers was that parking "was $25 per month extra". That was the amount of the parking being charged at the time. The resident manager, who was often present, would tell the buyer that the cheques were payable to Mastercraft, or, subsequent to that, the Regional Group. At those times, Mastercraft and subsequently the Regional Group, were the management company for the Strata Corporation. On each of these occasions, there was no further discussion about the matter, to the best of my recollection, until, approximately, last year, when the matter became litigious.

3. I did not advise purchasers that any company had a lease or license over the parking garage, as I did not know that. I was not aware that there was such an agreement. The first time I saw it was when it was sent to me by Mr. Meckling for the purposes of my first Affidavit.

[para124] The defendant alleges that the evidence of Mr. Peter Driessen, who purchased a unit in 1991, shows the level of knowledge possessed by purchasers, and presumably, by the plaintiff. The defendant's brief submitted as follows:

Indeed, the chairman of the Strata Corporation's Strata Council for 1993 and 1994 and current Council member, Peter Driessen, acquired Strata Lot 97 in the Landmark Building in July of 1991 with express notice of the Parking Garage Agreement.

[para125] Mr. Wilson deposed that "To my knowledge, all owners of Residential Units in the Landmark building, be they original investors or subsequent purchasers, knew that Mastercraft received fees for the use of the Parking Stalls." He then referred to a letter he wrote to Mr. Driessen, dated July 3, 1991. It reads:

Further to our conversation of today's date, I will confirm that the Vendor has deleted "vendor stipulates one parking space included" from the purchase contract enclosed.

Please initial and return fax.

As outlined, the parking garage is owned by a numbered company and as such, has a licence agreement for the residential component of the Landmark building.

This letter will confirm that the numbered company licencing the parking garage will enter into a separate agreement satisfactory to both parties.

As outlined, it may well be a seven year sub-licence agreement. payable at $20 per month, with the first two years rent free.

[para126] On that same date Mr. Wilson wrote to Mr. Driessen's solicitor. He enclosed a copy of the letter which he had sent to Mr. Driessen. To the solicitor he said:

Regarding this matter, Mr. John Greenburg (sic) and 360284 (sic) B.C. Ltd., the beneficial owner of the parking area, will be dealing with the same solicitor.

[para127] On October 16, 1995 Mr. Driessen was examined for discovery as a representative of the plaintiff. Mr. Driessen was referred to certain documents including the letter of July 3, 1991 written to him. Beginning at question 185 the transcript reads as follows:

Q. Okay. And those were sent to you on or about July 3, 1991; is that right?

A. Yes.

[Interjection by counsel]

Q. Mr. Driessen, prior to your execution of this agreement, whereby you purchased Strata Lot 97, you were aware that the numbered company controlled by Mastercraft had a licence to use the parking garage in the Landmark building; correct?

A. Precise. (sic)

Q. Let me put it this way. In the letter written to you from Mr. Wilson dated July 3, 1991, there's a reference to the condition in the contract that vendor stipulates one parking space included, was going to be crossed out, and he explained to you in his letter that parking garage in his words is owned by a numbered company and as such has a licence agreement for the residential component of the Landmark building. Prior to you executing the agreement whereby you acquired Strata Lot 97 --

A. On which date did I execute this? Q. I don't know, do you know?

A. On or about this date.

Q. Okay.

A. I was aware of it.

[Interjection by counsel.]

A. This is executed a few days before or a few days after.

Q. And to be clear, Mr. Driessen, you agreed to acquire Strata Lot 97 knowing that the numbered company held the rights to the parking; correct?

A. Knowing what was written in the letter, correct.

[para128] Mr. Wilson deposed on October 19, 1995 as follows:

... On numerous occasions I received inquiries over the telephone from real real (sic) estate agents acting on behalf of both vendors and purchasers of Residential Units in the Landmark Building respecting, inter alia, the entitlement of Landmark residents to parking. On every such occasion, I advised those persons of the Parking Garage Agreement and that 360204 would enter into individual agreements with Landmark residents for the use of Parking Stalls. I had several of these discussions with Inez Loudon, a real estate agent who was involved in a number of sales of Residential Units in the Landmark Building over the 1992 and 1993 period. In response to many of the inquiries, I would often fax particulars of the parking information to real estate agents.

[para129] Mr. Bruce Greenberg, a Director of the defendant since 1989 and a "principal" of 360203, M.I.C., and the Partnership, deposed on October 18, 1995 that:

... I assumed that the original Investors would advise subsequent purchasers of the parking arrangements at the Landmark Building and that they had no rights to the Parking Stalls. The complete lack of any inquiries or complaints from anyone gave me no reason to assume otherwise.

[para130] Counsel for the plaintiff attempted to speak with all of the present owners. In that many of them are infirm he spoke to only 21 of them and obtained evidence from nine. The affidavit evidence of these owners is consistent. Most of them purchased their units in 1993 or later. None of them were told about a 99 year "lease" and some did not know that they would have to pay for parking. From various sources other purchasers heard about the parking fee.

[para131] On January 26, 1993 a firm of solicitor's, apparently at the request of Mr. Wilson, forwarded to Mr. Mr. Wilson a copy of the parking garage agreement.

[para132] On January 29, 1993 four owners wrote to the Strata Council and requested, among other things, "a copy of all the legal agreements." On that same date Mr. Wilson, on the letterhead of The Mastercraft Group, wrote in reply. He informed the four owners that he was the "Council Chairperson on behalf of Strata Lots 1-97 Strata Plan 1261 and more specifically being a Director of the company that owns Strata Lots 1-15 and as such have knowledge that all the requested information is at the office of Mastercraft" in Richmond.

[para133] At a Council meeting of March 11, 1993 Mr. Wilson supplied to the Council a copy of the agreement. A Motion was then passed to set aside $1,000 for a legal opinion regarding the agreement.

[para134] The plaintiff's submission regarding the facts on this issue concludes as follows:

In summary, the existence of, and the terms of the Parking Garage Agreement, were far from a "notorious fact". The only person who had any information approaching actual knowledge was Mr. Driessen. He happens to have purchased directly from Mr. Bruce Greenberg, and as a result had more information than did others. He is the only purchaser who received any correspondence on the topic. However, not even Mr. Driessen was given a copy of the Parking Garage Agreement.

Defendant's submission [para135] The defendant says that through its actions and words the plaintiff is estopped from relying on any infringement of the Act: "From 1989 to 1994 the plaintiff led the defendant to believe that the agreement was valid and to this very day many owners do so conduct themselves" i.e by paying rent for parking. The defendant further submitted as follows:

The estoppel which arises against the Strata Corporation through its conduct over the 1989-1993 period is not impaired merely because certain current owners may have purchased from the original Investors without knowledge of the precise terms of the Parking Garage Agreement. The legal consequences which flow from a corporate entity's conduct and the knowledge it acquires over time cannot change or disappear simply because of a turnover in its members. Corporate accountability would be in a shambles and their contractual obligations fleeting were the law otherwise.

[para136] The defendant submits that the October 26, 1993 letter from the plaintiff's solicitors "which expressly permitted 360204 to collect fees under the Parking Garage Agreement typifies the Strata Corporation's conduct. The Strata Corporation lost its right to avoid the Parking Garage Agreement when it performed its obligations thereunder with knowledge of its rights."

[para137] As to knowledge of the agreement, the defendant says that Mr. Wilson knew of it, that "from at least May, 1990 onward, [he] was a member of the Strata Corporation's strata council and, consequently, in fact and in law, the Strata Corporation was entirely aware of the Parking Garage Agreement and its rights and obligations thereunder. The Strata Corporation cannot deny the express knowledge of the very persons designated to carry out its powers and duties (see section 118 Condominium Act)."

[para138] The defendant says that it "has lost the ability to have any ratifying resolutions (under sections 57.(1)(c) and 53.(1) of the Condominium Act, for example) passed now that only a handful of original Investors remain. The Strata Corporation cannot escape its unequivocal affirmation of the Parking Garage Agreement."

[para139] In support of this proposition the defendant cites Springer Development Corporation, Ltd. v. Rogers et al. (1987), 11 B.C.L.R. (2d) 145 at 154 (C.A.) wherein Mr. Justice Hutcheon said:

I think I am bound by the decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada in Bawlf Grain Co. [v. Ross (1917), 55 S.C.R. 232] and Dorsch [v. Freeholders Oil Co. Ltd. (1965), 52 D.L.R. (2d) 658] to conclude that a party may lose a right acquired to avoid a contract if thereafter the conduct of that party, with knowledge of the option, is consistent only with a contract that is valid and enforceable by both parties.

[para140] The defendant relies upon the decision in Litwin Construction (1973) Ltd. v. Pan et al (1988), 52 D.L.R. (4th) 459 (B.C.C.A). The test is set out at page 468:

"... has the party invoking the statute affirmed the contract unequivocally by his words or conduct in circumstances making it unfair or unjust for him now to resile from that contract?"

....

The underlying concept is that of unfairness or injustice and it is not essential to its application that there be knowledge, detriment, acquiescence or encouragement although their presence may serve to raise the unfairness or injustice to the level requiring the exercise of judgment. If the unfairness or injustice is very slight, then the principle would not be applied. If it is more than slight, then the principle may be applicable.

Plaintiff's submission

[para141] The plaintiff contends that estoppel cannot be applied because the agreement is ultra vires. Failing that, the plaintiff says that no estoppel can apply so as to permit violation of a statute: Maritime Electric Company v. General Dairies Ltd. (1937), 1 D.L.R. 609 (P.C.). Further, that estoppel cannot be used to permit occupation and use of common elements in violation of statutory duties of the condominium corporation or of owners: York Condominium Corp. No. 288 v. Harbour Square Commercial Inc. (1988), 49 R.P.R. 264 (Ont.D.C.) [para142] The plaintiff also referred to Litwin, supra, and in particular the test set out at page 468. It says that here, in distinction to Litwin, "there is not a single act of the Strata Corporation by which the Strata Corporation affirmed the contract."

Conclusions Regarding Estoppel

[para143] If I am correct that the agreement is void then at law there can be no application of the principle of estoppel. In the event that I am incorrect in that finding, I will deal with estoppel as a potential defence.

[para144] With respect to "knowledge", what Ms. Loudon knew is relevant only with respect to what she informed prospective purchasers. In her letter of March 4, 1991 to Mastercraft she tried to uncover some information about the parking. Mr. Wilson replied that the "parking is owned by a separate company" and there was a charge to owners for parking.

[para145] Ms. Loudon did not pursue the matter further. This failure cannot be attributed to the plaintiff. I accept her evidence that she did not know of any lease, licence or arrangement regarding the property other than what she was told by Mr. Wilson. In that regard she was misinformed.

[para146] Mr. Wilson's deposition that to his knowledge "all owners of Residential Units in the Landmark building, be they original Investors or subsequent purchasers, knew that Mastercraft received fees for the use of the Parking Stalls" is quite remarkable. In his letter to Ms. Loudon he said that the garage was "owned by a separate company"; in his letter to Mr. Driessen he said that "the parking garage is owned by a numbered company"; and to Mr. Driessen's lawyer he wrote that "Mr. John Greenburg and 360284 B.C. Ltd., the beneficial owner of the parking area ...".

[para147] This detracts from the defendant's position that Ms. Loudon "expressly advised each purchaser of the parking arrangements at the Landmark Building. It was a notorious fact". (Mr. Meckling said that the use of the word "notorious" was meant to mean "well known".)

[para148] The defendant alleged that the level of knowledge of Mr. Driessen shows the level of knowledge of purchasers. On his examination for discovery he said that what he knew was what was written to him by Mr. Wilson. That was that the garage was owned by a numbered company which had "a licence agreement for the residential component".

[para149] This falls far short of satisfactory evidence that even Mr. Driessen had the correct information, much less that what he knew was "a notorious fact." Nor is there any value in the deposition of Mr. Greenberg that he "assumed that the original Investors would advise subsequent purchasers of the parking arrangements at the Landmark building and that they had no rights to the Parking Stalls."

[para150] I am of the opinion that the evidence of the present owners as gathered by the plaintiff represents much better evidence as to the general state of knowledge by owners.

[para151] It would further appear that the plaintiff did not have a copy of the agreement in its files. Indeed, even Mr. Wilson did not have a copy until early in 1993. He obtained a copy and in March 1993 supplied it to the Strata Council.

[para152] At about the same time four owners wrote to the Strata Council, c/o the Mastercraft Group, at an address in Richmond, B.C. The reply came from Mr. Wilson who informed them, in reply to their request for "all the legal agreements", that the documents were at the offices of Mastercraft, at the address to which the four owners had written. To the owners this must have been a particularly unhelpful and frustrating reply.

[para153] Also of interest in the letter from Mr. Wilson was how he described himself. That is, "Council Chairperson on behalf of Strata Lots 1-97 Strata Plan 1261 and more specifically being a Director of the company that owns Strata Lots 1-15." Mr. Wilson's knowledge does not attach to the plaintiff. As I held earlier, Mr. Wilson did not, in a real sense, represent the owners. His role was to facilitate the implementation of a transaction which, as Mr. Meckling volunteered, was designed to make money for Mastercraft.

[para154] Mr. Wilson not only did not absorb information so as to benefit the plaintiff but he left no "paper trail" to the agreement, failed to reveal it when inquiries were made, misrepresented the status of the garage and deposed to knowledge of owners that could not conceivably be true. The submissions of counsel for the defendants that Mr. Wilson's knowledge, as an agent of the plaintiff, is knowledge of the plaintiff, fails factually and legally.

[para155] The defence of estoppel only arises where it can be said that a party knew of its right to avert the contract but continued performance:

... a party may lose a right acquired to avoid a contract if thereafter the conduct of that party, with knowledge of the option, is consistent only with a contract that is valid and enforceable by both parties. Springer Development Corp. Ltd. v. Rogers (1987), 11 B.C.L.R. (2d) 145 (C.A.) at 154.

[para157] The classical definition of promissory estoppel is found in Halsbury's Laws of England at paragraph 1071, page 931. It incorporates the concept that the aggrieved party's conduct was "a clear and unequivocal promise or assurance which was intended to affect the legal relation ...". A modern definition is found in Mr. Justice Sopinka's judgment in Maracle Travellers Indemnity Co. of Canada (1991), 80 D.L.R. (4th) 652 (S.C.C.). At page 656 he states:

The principles of promissory estoppel are well settled. The party relying on the doctrine must establish that the other party has, by words or conduct, made a promise or assurance which was intended to affect their legal relationship and to be acted upon. Furthermore, the representee must establish that, in reliance on the representation, he acted on it or in some way changes his position.

[para158] Promissory estoppel is an equitable principle. One of the cornerstones of equity is that a person must come into it with "clean hands". It cannot be said that the defendant did so. As detailed in these reasons, it is at least partially as a result of the misrepresentation of Mastercraft and the defendants that the plaintiff was unaware of the true state of affairs and thereby of its potential rights.

[para159] Support for this position is found in Welch v. O'Brien Financial Corp (1992), 86 D.L.R. (4th) 155 (B.C.C.A.). The Court agreed with the trial judge that non-disclosure of material facts by the defendant can bar a claim for promissory estoppel which the defendant could otherwise have had against the plaintiff. The seriousness of the defendant's non-disclosure is to be weighed against the equities arising against the plaintiff. In the case at bar the seriousness of the defendants' non-disclosure vitiates any estoppel argument they may have had.

[para160] Furthermore, before the defendants would be entitled to a claim of estoppel, they would have to establish an alteration of their position to their detriment in reliance on the conduct of the plaintiff. This point was made by Esson C.J.S.C. in 32262 B.C. Ltd. v. Companions Restaurants Inc., [1995] B.C.J. No. 342 (17 Feb. 1995) Vanc. Reg. No. C932602 when he stated at page 17:

It follows that the defendants, not having established the necessary element of detriment, must fail on the estoppel issue.

[para161] The defendant, unlike the situation in Litwin, has done nothing in reliance upon the agreement. All it has done is accept the largesse.

[para162] The defence of estoppel fails.

[para163] For all of the reasons set forth in the various segments of these reasons the agreement is void.

D. RELIEF

[para164] The matter of relief will have to be spoken to at a time mutually convenient to all parties. Costs may also be spoken to at that time.

The judgment of the court is delivered by

ROBINS J.A.:-- These two appeals primarily concern the validity of what have come to be known in the residential condominium industry as "phantom mortgages". These are mortgages designed specifically to satisfy the requirements of s. 51(6) para. 1 of the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 84 (the Act) and thus enable condominium developers to charge purchasers who take possession of proposed condominium units before title can be transferred or conveyed a monthly occupancy fee that includes a mortgage interest component. To achieve this purpose, purchasers who would not otherwise be assuming or giving back a mortgage on final closing are required by their agreements of purchase and sale to give back a mortgage for the balance of the purchase price. Typically, the mortgage is made payable on demand after final closing of the transaction or is for a term of very brief duration, generally not exceeding 30 days. On final closing, purchasers are also required to deposit a certified cheque for the full amount owing on the mortgage or provide other satisfactory assurances that funds will be available to discharge the mortgage upon maturity.

Agreements of purchase and sale of residential condominium units have provided for mortgages of this nature since the early 1980s. The important question in these appeals is whether such mortgages validly effect their intended purpose and provide a lawful basis upon which an interest component may be included in the occupancy fee chargeable to purchasers during the period of their possession prior to final closing of the transaction of purchase and sale.

THE DISPUTED TRANSACTIONS

1. The Albrecht v. Opemoco Inc. appeal

The respondents in this appeal are purchasers of residential condominium units in Halton Condominium Corporation No. 164 in Burlington, Ontario. They acquired their respective units pursuant to the terms of agreements of purchase and sale entered into with the appellant Opemoco Inc. The appellant Brownstones IV Properties Inc. is the declarant of the condominium corporation and is the party that conveyed title to each of the respondents. For the purposes of this appeal, the two appellants may be referred to together as "the appellant" or "the vendor".

The "phantom mortgages" in issue were products of the agreements of purchase and sale entered into between the parties. These agreements were on the vendor's standard form and contained, inter alia, the following terms:

(a) The purchaser was obliged to take interim occupancy of his or her unit upon substantial completion of the unit notwithstanding that the condominium was not registered and title to the unit could not be conveyed. On the date of interim occupancy (the possession closing) the purchaser was required to pay the balance of the deposits then due and owing on the purchase price, which generally amounted in total to approximately 25 per cent of the purchase price.

(b) The interim occupancy of the unit was to be governed by the terms of an occupancy agreement, a copy of which was attached as a schedule to the agreement of purchase and sale. (c) The purchaser was obliged to elect either to assume a first mortgage or to give a vendor take-back mortgage (the VTB mortgage) on final or title closing, that is, on the date title to the unit was to be transferred to the purchaser. The VTB mortgage was to provide, inter alia, that the full amount of principal and accrued interest would be payable by the purchaser on the demand of the vendor; that the purchaser would have the right to prepay the outstanding principal balance together with accrued interest without notice or bonus; and that the interest rate payable thereon was to be equal to the rate per annum charged by the Toronto-Dominion Bank for three- year residential mortgages in effect at the date of interim occupancy.

(d) During the period of interim occupancy, each purchaser was obliged to pay to the vendor a monthly occupancy fee based on the total of the following:

- i. the amount of interest that the purchaser would have paid monthly in respect to the VTB mortgage which the purchaser was obliged to give on title closing in accordance with the agreement of purchase and sale (the mortgage interest component);
- ii. the amount reasonably estimated by the vendor on a monthly basis for municipal taxes attributable to the unit (the realty tax component); and,
- iii. the projected monthly common expense contribution for the unit (the common expense component).

(e) The vendor was under no obligation to complete the sale of the unit unless the purchaser deposited in escrow with the vendor's solicitor on or before the final closing date a certified cheque sufficient in amount to pay the entire principal balance of the mortgage. The certified cheque was to be applied by the vendor's solicitor to discharge the mortgage at any time after the closing upon demand by the vendor. If the purchaser failed to deposit the certified cheque on or before the title closing date, the purchaser was deemed to be in default of the agreement.

The purchasers in this appeal each agreed to a VTB mortgage payable on demand. These mortgages may be referred to as "phantom mortgages". It should perhaps be noted that the vendor was not prepared to accept any amendments to its standard form agreement and would not sell to a purchaser who did not agree to give back a mortgage of this nature. The respondents obtained possession of their respective units as they became ready for occupancy. Each of them then paid, without any objection, and throughout the entire period of their occupancy preceding final closing, a monthly occupancy fee consisting of a mortgage interest component based on the phantom mortgage, realty taxes and common expenses.

On title closing, each purchaser delivered to the vendor's solicitor a certified cheque in an amount sufficient to pay the entire principal sum secured by the mortgage. These cheques, however, were not deposited in escrow but, on the vendor's direction, were paid to the vendor directly and/or to the vendor's construction lender to obtain partial discharges of an existing blanket construction mortgage. The phantom mortgages were not registered on title, and in many cases were not fully or properly completed or in registrable form. Discharges of the mortgages were delivered on closing but they, likewise, were not registered.

In virtually all of the transactions, the funds needed to discharge the mortgage (i.e., to pay the full balance of the purchase price) were obtained by way of mortgage financing arranged by the purchaser with a third party source. In fact, the vendor referred the purchasers to a mortgage institution that was prepared to arrange mortgages on the units for purchasers who desired them. In a few cases, the purchaser was in a position to pay off the mortgage out of his or her own resources and no other mortgage was placed on title.

On March 30, 1989, after these transactions had been finally closed, the respondents brought this application seeking, among other items of relief which are no longer before the court, to recover the mortgage interest component of the monthly occupancy fees which they had paid prior to the final closing of their respective transactions. In the respondents' contention, the VTB mortgages called for in the agreements of purchase and sale were in contravention of the provisions of s. 51(6) para. 1 of the Condominium Act and, accordingly, did not constitute a proper legal basis for the inclusion of a mortgage interest component in their occupancy fee.

The matter was heard in weekly court by Rosenberg J. who, in carefully considered reasons now reported at (1989), 70 O.R. (2d) 151, 61 D.L.R. (4th) 594 [further proceedings at 70 O.R. (2d) 221, 62 D.L.R. (4th) 541], accepted the respondents' contention and ordered the appellants to repay, with interest, the mortgage interest component of the occupancy fees. The appellants now appeal to this court from that judgment.

2. The 797606 Ontario Ltd. v. Huang & Danczkay Ltd. appeal

The appellant in this appeal purchased six penthouse condominium units in September 1988, in a proposed condominium development constructed by the respondent Huang & Danczkay in the City of Toronto. The units were purchased as an investment with the intention that they would be leased and, later, resold at a profit. The transactions have not been completed and no final closing has taken place. Title to the property has been conveyed to 808868 Ontario Limited, a company related to the respondent Huang & Danczkay. For the purposes of this appeal, these respondents may be referred to together as "the respondent" or "the vendor".

The agreements of purchase and sale between the parties, like those in the Opemoco case, obligate the purchaser to take interim possession of the units at a time before the condominium is registered and title can be conveyed. The agreements also obligate the purchaser to give a VTB or phantom mortgage on final closing. The mortgage is to be for a term of 30 days from the date of final closing with the proviso that it will become immediately payable on the demand of the vendor. It is to bear interest at the Toronto-Dominion Bank's prime rate on the day 30 days prior to the date of occupancy plus one per cent. On final closing the purchaser is required to deposit in escrow with the vendor's solicitor a certified cheque sufficient in amount to pay the entire balance of the mortgage, and will be deemed in default of the agreement should it fail to do so. It is clear in this case, as it was in the Opemoco case, that, had the purchaser refused to agree to the take back mortgage, the vendor would not have entered into the agreement of purchase and sale.

The purchaser obtained interim possession of the six penthouse units in November 1988 and, until the commencement of these proceedings, paid a monthly occupancy fee consisting of a mortgage interest component based on the interest rate provided for in the phantom mortgage and a realty tax and common area expense component. As I indicated, these transactions have not yet been completed. In February 1990, the appellant brought this application for a determination of its rights as purchaser of the condominium units in question. By way of relief, it sought rescission of the agreements of purchase and sale on the ground that the respondent had failed to comply with the provisions of the Condominium Act with respect to timely registration of the project and timely sale of the remainder of the units in the building. In addition, the appellant sought, on the basis of the decision of Rosenberg J. in Opemoco, repayment of the mortgage interest included in the monthly payments and calculated by reference to the mortgages provided for in the agreements of purchase and sale. Carruthers J. dismissed the claim for rescission. I shall come later to the issues raised by the appeal from this order. With respect to the claim based on the Opemoco decision, Carruthers J. made no decision on the validity of the phantom mortgages. However, he ordered the monies in dispute to be paid into court to await final disposition of the Opemoco appeal. The phantom mortgage issues common to the two appeals were argued together and will be dealt with accordingly.

THE LEGISLATIVE BACKGROUND Under the Condominium Act, before title to a proposed unit can be transferred to a purchaser, a developer is obliged to register a declaration and description of the property. Registration, however, cannot be effected until the project has been substantially completed and all requisite governmental approvals have been obtained. The complexity of the registration process is such as to create an inevitable delay between the time that some or all of the units in a given project are completed and otherwise ready for occupancy and the time the developer is able to deliver a registrable transfer of title. The length of the delay depends on a variety of factors, and may be substantial. In order to generate income during this period, condominium developers usually seek to have purchasers take occupancy as soon as their units can be occupied. Agreements of purchase and sale are therefore generally structured, as are the agreements in these appeals, so as to provide for closing in two stages. The purchaser is first required or permitted to take possession on an interim basis when the unit is substantially complete and ready for occupancy (the possession closing), and the transaction is finally closed after registration has taken place and the vendor is able to transfer title (the title or final closing). The Act itself contemplates that purchasers of proposed residential condominium units may take possession of or occupy the unit before a deed or transfer can be delivered. It contains a number of provisions governing the relationship of the parties during the interim occupancy period. Our concern in this appeal is with s. 51(6) of the Act, which reads:

51(6) Where an agreement of purchase and sale entered into by a proposed declarant for a proposed unit for residential purposes permits or requires the purchaser to take possession of or occupy the unit before a deed or transfer of the unit acceptable for registration is delivered to him, the money paid in respect of such right or obligation to the proposed declarant shall be not greater, on a monthly basis, than the total of the following amounts:

1. The amount of interest that the purchaser would have paid, monthly, in respect of any mortgage or mortgages he is obligated to assume or give under the agreement of purchase and sale on delivery of a deed or transfer of the unit.
2. An amount reasonably estimated on a monthly basis for municipal taxes attributable to the proposed unit.
3. The projected monthly common expense contribution for that unit.

Section 51(6) thus places a ceiling on the monthly occupancy fee that a developer can lawfully charge a residential unit purchaser who takes possession of the condominium unit before title can be transferred. The ceiling is the aggregate of the monthly interest that the purchaser would have paid during the occupancy period under a mortgage to be assumed or given back under the agreement of purchase and sale plus a reasonable estimate of monthly taxes attributable to the unit and the projected monthly common expenses attributable to the unit.

The purpose and intent of s. 51(6) is manifested by its legislative history. The section was enacted in 1979 [Condominium Act, 1978, S.O. 1978, c. 84, s. 51] replacing s. 24a(6) of the Act. The former section was enacted in 1974 [S.O. 1974, c. 133, s. 14] as an amendment to the 1970 Act [Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 77], and provided:

24a(6) Where an agreement of purchase and sale entered into by a proposed declarant for a proposed unit for residential purposes permits or requires the purchaser to take possession of or occupy the unit before a deed or transfer of the unit acceptable for registration is delivered to him, the money paid in respect of such right or obligation to the proposed declarant shall be credited as payments of the purchase price unless the agreement states that the money or any part of it will not be so credited.

In contrast to s. 51(6), s. 24a(6) acknowledged that occupancy charges could validly be required but did not place any limit on the amount of such charges or specify the manner of their calculation. This absence of any statutory limit apparently resulted in some developers charging purchasers an unreasonable or excessive occupancy rent -- one which bore no relationship to their actual cost of carrying the units over the interim occupancy period. Section 51(6) was enacted to remedy this situation and protect purchasers from being exploited in this manner. The section was not intended to eliminate occupancy charges, but rather to limit those charges to the mortgage interest, realty tax and common expense components specified in paras. 1, 2 and 3 thereof.

Section 51(6) has the obvious effect of placing purchasers on possession closing in substantially the same economic position as they would have been in had title closing and possession closing been concurrent. At the same time, the section recognizes that developers can charge, and purchasers can be required to pay, a monthly fee which in some measure reflects the costs that the developer will incur while the purchaser has interim occupancy. In short, the section strikes a balance between developers and purchasers by, on the one hand, establishing a rental cap that affords purchasers protection from excessive charges and, on the other, allowing developers a fair rental income to reimburse them for the likely cost of carrying the unit until the date of final closing.

This brings me to para. 1 of s. 51(6) which is at the heart of the issue in this case. The mortgage interest component of the occupancy fee, which is almost invariably by far the largest of the three items enumerated in s. 51(6), is chargeable only in the case of a mortgage that the purchaser "is obligated to assume or give under the agreement of purchase and sale on delivery of a deed or transfer of the unit". Section 51(6) para. 1 does not deal with transactions in which the purchase price is paid in cash and no mortgage is to be assumed or given back by the purchaser on final closing. The reason for omitting those transactions and mandating that such purchasers be charged a lower occupancy fee than purchasers who assume or give back a mortgage is not readily apparent. Indeed, it is difficult to understand why the one class of purchasers should be afforded greater protection or be treated differently and more favourably than the other. No satisfactory reason for the distinction has been suggested by counsel or is to be found in the texts or articles to which the court has been referred. It would indeed appear, as Dupont J. suggested in Cadillac Fairview Corp. v. Allin (1979), 25 O.R. (2d) 73, 100 D.L.R. (3d) 344 (H.C.J.), at p. 76 O.R., p. 348 D.L.R. that the omission is simply the result of a "possible oversight on the part of the Legislature".

In any event, as s. 51(6) para. 1 is framed, it clearly produces inequitable results. Rosenberg J., in the court below, points this out at p. 155 O.R., p. 598 D.L.R., of his reasons where he details a number of examples designed to compare the occupancy fee payable by a purchaser who is not obligated to assume or give back a mortgage with the fee payable by a purchaser who is so obligated. The differences, as might be expected, are significant. Without repeating those examples, it is sufficient to note that a purchaser who arranges his or her financing by way of a third party mortgage to be registered on title closing cannot be required to pay the interest component for the occupancy period. Yet, a purchaser of, let us say, an identical unit who, pursuant to the agreement of purchase and sale, is obligated to assume or give back a mortgage in identical terms, can be charged the interest component. By reason of the wording of s. 51(6) para. 1, the all-cash purchaser is placed in a better economic position than he or she would have been in had possession closing coincided with title closing. The section, viewed realistically, confers a windfall on such purchasers. They enjoy the same benefits of possession and hold the same possessory rights as a purchaser who agrees to assume or give back a mortgage on final closing; and, moreover, the carrying costs incurred by the vendor during the interim occupancy period are manifestly the same regardless of whether the purchaser is an all-cash purchaser or not. Nonetheless, for whatever reason, s. 51(6) requires that these purchasers be treated differently and compels the vendor to accept a significantly lower occupancy rent from one class of purchasers than from another.

The adverse effect of s. 51(6) on the cash flow of a developer who allows a purchaser who is not assuming or giving back a mortgage under the agreement of purchase and sale pre-registration possession was commented upon by Dupont J. soon after s. 51(6) was enacted. In Cadillac Fairview, supra, a case which involved a question of the retroactivity of the section, he said at p. 76 O.R., pp. 347-48 D.L.R., of the reasons:

The present s. 51(6) is remedial in the sense that it restricts the occupation charge to the total of three particular amounts, as set out above. However, through possible oversight on the part of the Legislature, para. 1 of s. 51(6) speaks of: "The amount of interest that the purchaser would have paid, monthly, in respect of any mortgage or mortgages he is obligated to assume or give ..." (emphasis added) and makes no mention of sales where no mortgage is to be assumed. In such a case, the purchaser cannot obtain title to the premises until registration of the declaration is made, and the developer-vendor must go on paying mortgage interest in respect of the borrowed funds associated with the subject unit. The end result in such a case is a windfall gain to the cash purchaser if he is allowed to take possession prior to closing, and a serious and unexpected loss to the developer. (Emphasis original)

THE PHANTOM MORTGAGE CONCEPT

Section 51(6) evidently proved so financially detrimental to condominium developers that many of them refused to enter into transactions in which no mortgage was to be assumed or given back on final closing. Their response to this legislation was to restructure their agreements of purchase and sale in such a way as to satisfy the formal requirements of s. 51(6) para. 1 and thereby become entitled to include a mortgage interest component in the occupancy fee. To achieve this end, purchasers, in what would otherwise be all-cash transactions, were required under the terms of their agreements of purchase and sale to complete their transactions by giving back on final closing a form of mortgage that has become popularly known as a "phantom mortgage". This colourful appellation recognizes that these mortgages were to have only a passing existence and would disappear shortly, if not immediately, after final closing. They were patently not intended as a form of permanent financing.

Although there are a number of variations, agreements of purchase and sale providing for phantom mortgages normally require: (i) that the purchaser will have paid, by the date of possession, a deposit totalling, generally, no more than 25 per cent of the purchase price; (ii) that, on the date of final closing, the purchaser will give back a mortgage securing the unpaid balance of the purchase price; and, (iii) that, on the date of final closing, the purchaser will deliver a certified cheque to be held in escrow by the vendor's solicitor in an amount sufficient to pay the mortgage or will provide other assurances satisfactory to the vendor that the funds required to discharge the mortgage will be available to the vendor forthwith upon maturity of the mortgage. The mortgage may be structured as a demand mortgage or as one of brief duration, usually not more than 30 days. Demand will ordinarily be made contemporaneous with or very shortly after the final closing. Interest is normally provided for at the first mortgage rate prevailing on the date of possession.

It should perhaps be noted that s. 53(1) and s. 53(3) of the Condominium Act also impact on the cash flow of developers during the interim occupancy period and provide additional motivation for the use of phantom mortgages. Section 53(1) requires that all money received by or on behalf of a proposed declarant from a purchaser before the registration of the declaration, other than money paid as rent or as an occupancy charge, must be held in trust until the declarant is able to deliver a registrable deed to the purchaser. Section 53(3) obliges the declarant to pay interest, at a statutorily prescribed rate, on all monies received on account of the purchase price from the date the purchaser enters into possession to the date of final closing.

The mortgage provisions in the agreements of purchase and sale in the cases now under appeal are typical examples of the phantom mortgage concept that, as I have said, has now been in wide use in the condominium industry for many years. This concept, to repeat, was designed to fit the statutory requirements of s. 51(6) para. 1 and permit developers to include a mortgage interest component in the occupancy fee in transactions where this charge could not otherwise be made. The critical, and indeed far-reaching, question in this appeal is whether the concept validly succeeds in achieving its intended purpose.

THE DECISIONS UNDER APPEAL In the Opemoco decision, Rosenberg J. found that the mortgages in question were not fully and properly implemented. He also found that, because no monthly interest had actually been paid under the mortgages, "there is no amount of interest that the purchaser would have paid after receiving a deed or transfer as required by s. 51(6)" [p. 158 O.R., p. 601 D.L.R.; emphasis original]. He therefore held that the vendor was precluded from including an interest component in the occupancy fee. In his view, the impugned phantom mortgages were not really mortgages at all since the monies to be secured thereby were paid on final closing and no outstanding debt or obligation was secured at the time the mortgages were delivered to the mortgagee. He went on to conclude that even if the transactions had been fully and properly implemented, a phantom mortgage of the kind provided for in the appellant's agreements of purchase and sale was a sham and not within the spirit of the section.

In the learned judge's opinion, a vendor is entitled to charge an interest component pursuant to s. 51(6) para. 1 only if there is "some legitimate reason for the mortgage" and it is not just an attempt to charge a higher occupancy fee. Moreover, a vendor is not entitled to the benefit of s. 51(6) para. 1 if the mortgage performs no service for the purchaser and the vendor takes no risk and provides no real financing by creating it. For a VTB mortgage to comply with s. 51(6) para. 1, and, it follows, for a vendor to be entitled to charge an interest component in the occupancy fee, Rosenberg J. set the following test (p. 158 O.R., pp. 601-02 D.L.R.):

To comply with s. 51(6) there would have to be some legitimate reason for the mortgage, not just an attempt to charge an occupancy fee at a higher rate. For example, a vendor who arranges the first mortgages to be assumed by the purchasers will not only have the expense and trouble of arranging the mortgage but may have to give a covenant to the mortgagee. A vendor who takes back a mortgage on closing will have to find the financial resources to carry such a mortgage. The Act does not appear to limit the time of the vendor take-back mortgage. If, for example, a vendor took back a mortgage for one year in order to allow the purchaser to make his own long-term financing arrangements, that would appear to comply with the section.

A vendor who by providing for a "phantom mortgage" does not perform any service for the purchaser, nor does anything that is required by the purchaser, takes no risk and does not give any real financing, should not receive the benefit of the section.

DECISION

In determining the phantom mortgage issue in these two appeals, it is essential to bear in mind the purpose and effect of s. 51(6). It is common ground that this piece of legislation, as I noted earlier, was enacted, as a matter of consumer protection, to protect purchasers of proposed residential condominium units from excessive charges during the period of their interim occupancy. At the same time, the legislation recognizes that developers are entitled to receive an economic rent to assist them in defraying the costs which they ordinarily incur in carrying the condominium units over the interim occupancy period. By limiting the amount that purchasers can be required to pay to the items specified in s. 51(6), the effect of the section is to place purchasers in substantially the same position they would have been in had they obtained title contemporaneous with possession.

The purchase and sale agreements in question here, on their face, clearly fall within the express words of s. 51(6) para. 1 which, again, reads:

51(6) Where an agreement of purchase and sale entered into by a proposed declarant for a proposed unit for residential purposes permits or requires the purchaser to take possession of or occupy the unit before a deed or transfer of the unit acceptable for registration is delivered to him, the money paid in respect of such right or obligation to the proposed declarant shall be not greater, on a monthly basis, than the total of the following amounts:

1. The amount of interest that the purchaser would have paid, monthly, in respect of any mortgage or mortgages he is obligated to assume or give under the agreement of purchase and sale on delivery of a deed or transfer of the unit.

(Emphasis added)

In both cases on appeal, the purchasers were "obligated" to give a VTB "mortgage ... under the agreement of purchase and sale"; the VTB mortgage was to be given "on delivery of a deed or transfer of the unit"; and the mortgage interest component was to be calculated at no more than the amount of interest that "the purchaser would have paid, monthly" under the VTB mortgage.

Whether a mortgage interest component can properly be charged on the basis of these agreements, as I view s. 51(6) para. 1, is not dependent on the precise manner in which the contemplated transactions are eventually concluded. The section focuses on the obligation of the purchaser existing under the agreement of purchase and sale to give a mortgage upon transfer of title. Title may, of course, never be transferred; for one reason or another, the transaction may not be finally closed. The fact that no final closing takes place, as may be the case in Huang & Danczkay Ltd., or the fact that a transaction was not "fully or properly implemented" on final closing (in the sense that mortgages were not properly completed or registered), as was the case in Opemoco, is not determinative of the validity of the obligation to give the mortgage.

The finding that the Opemoco transactions were improperly implemented, in my opinion, cannot serve as a basis for distinguishing that case from Huang & Danczkay Ltd., where, if that transaction is finally closed, it may be assumed that the agreement of purchase and sale will be properly implemented. The phantom mortgage obligations arising out of the agreements of purchase and sale in both cases are, after all, essentially identical. That being so, it would be incongruous if the result in one case were to differ from that in the other solely because of a failure to complete the conveyancing arrangements in the manner contemplated by the parties under their contract. On the view I take of s. 51(6) para. 1, the vendor's right to collect, and the purchaser's obligation to pay, occupation rent must be determined, not on that basis, but by looking to the terms of the agreement of purchase and sale executed by the parties. The vendor's entitlement to charge and retain the mortgage interest component, and the purchaser's obligation to pay this sum, is dependent upon the validity of the obligations created under the agreement rather than upon what may or may not transpire later.

Rosenberg J. agreed that "not all phantom mortgages are necessarily in breach of the section" [p. 158 O.R., p. 601 D.L.R.]. However, the test he adopted to determine the validity of the obligation to give a mortgage on final closing for the purposes of s. 51(6) para. 1 is such that it is difficult to see how any VTB mortgage designed to allow a developer to include a mortgage interest component in an occupancy fee in a transaction where this component could not otherwise be included -- that, of course, being the purpose of a phantom mortgage -- can be in conformity with the section. To take his examples in the passage quoted above, both a mortgage arranged by the vendor to be assumed by the purchaser and a mortgage to be taken back for a term of one year to allow the purchaser to arrange definitive financing, provide forms of conventional financing and comply with the section. These, however, are not mortgages that fall within the phantom mortgage concept. Our concern in these appeals is with mortgages specifically designed to satisfy the requirements of s. 51(6) para. 1 for the purpose of entitling the vendor to collect an occupancy fee calculated on the same basis as the occupancy fee payable by a purchaser who is truly to assume or give back a conventional mortgage.

In prescribing the factors to be taken into account in calculating the maximum rent chargeable during the interim occupancy period, s. 51(6) does not establish any conditions or set any criteria for determining the validity of a mortgage to which the occupancy rental is to be referable. More particularly, the section does not require that the mortgage "perform a service" for a purchaser or provide a purchaser with "real financing". Similarly, the section does not fix any minimum term during which a mortgage, to qualify for the purposes of the section, must remain in existence. Nor does the section preclude the mortgage from being collaterally secured by way of a cash deposit or any other form of security. Section 51(6) is concerned, not with the reasons for, or general terms of, the mortgage, but only with its interest rate. The rental itself is predicated, not on the amount of interest actually paid, but on the amount the purchaser "would have paid" on any mortgage the purchaser is obligated to assume or give. In short, the interest rate implements the remedial purposes of the section and serves to provide the yardstick by which a fair and reasonable interim rental is to be measured.

The feature common to each of the agreements of purchase and sale in these appeals is the purchaser's obligation to give back a mortgage on final closing and, at the same time, to deposit with the vendor's solicitor a certified cheque in an amount sufficient to discharge the mortgage. On the basis of this obligation, the purchasers were permitted to take possession of their respective condominium units. They were not required, on obtaining possession, to pay the balance due on final closing, as a purchaser normally would in the case of a freehold purchase. Indeed, these purchasers would not likely be in a position to finance their purchase before they had a mortgageable interest in the units. By enabling them to go into possession on this basis, the phantom mortgage arrangements to which they agreed can be said to have operated to their benefit. As the learned author points out in Audrey Loeb, Condominium Law and Administration, 2nd ed. (Toronto: Carswell, 1989 looseleaf), at pp. 5-18.2 to 5-18.3:

... most purchasers do in fact receive a benefit from the phantom mortgage, in that they are not required to provide, on the occupancy closing, the cash necessary to complete the transaction. Most condominium purchasers are not all-cash purchasers and they would be unable to finance the closings of their transactions by conventional means if all the cash to close was required on the date of occupancy closing.

Moreover, the phantom mortgage provisions in question in the present cases operated in such a way as to put the purchasers in substantially the same monetary position as they would have been in had possession and title closing taken place at the same time. A purchaser who intended to pay the balance due on final closing out of his or her own funds, by virtue of the agreement to give back the phantom mortgage, retained those funds and had the benefit of them throughout the entire interim occupancy period. During this period, the purchaser, manifestly, was in a position to invest the funds and collect interest or obtain other income or benefits therefrom, and presumably did. On the other hand, a purchaser who intended to pay the balance due on final closing by means of a third party mortgage financing, as virtually all of the purchasers in these appeals did, by virtue of the phantom mortgage agreement, was not obliged to pay any interest on this mortgage before obtaining title, and saved this expense.

During the interim occupancy period, these purchasers had all of the protections afforded to them by the Act. Their security of tenure was assured, and they enjoyed possessory rights comparable to those they would have on becoming owners of their condominium units. By employing the phantom mortgage concept, the vendor cannot be said to have taken advantage of, or taken something away from, these purchasers; nor can this type of contractual obligation be said to have operated to their detriment. It seems to me no more than fair that a party who is given possession of a condominium unit without paying the balance of the purchase price, and who therefore has, not only the benefit of occupancy, but the use of the funds needed to close the transaction, or the savings that accrue from deferring interest payments on the mortgage monies being borrowed to close the transaction, should pay a reasonable rent during the occupancy period. A rent calculated in accordance with s. 51(6) is, by definition, a reasonable rent. It is a reasonable rent viewed from the standpoint of both the vendor and the purchaser. I should perhaps add that there is no suggestion that these purchasers did not appreciate the impact of their agreement with respect to the phantom mortgage on the calculation of their monthly occupancy fee. Nor is there any suggestion that the interest rate stipulated in the phantom mortgages was anything other than the properly applicable prevailing rate.

There is, as I stated earlier, no apparent rationale for discriminating in favour of all-cash purchasers and treating them in a more financially advantageous manner during their pre-final closing occupancy than purchasers who are to assume or give back a mortgage on final closing. The consumer protection policy underlying s. 51(6) is surely not advanced by drawing distinctions between purchasers on this basis. Nor, conversely, is the policy advanced by placing vendors who sell to all-cash purchasers in a financially disadvantageous position. Indeed, it seems to me contrary to the consumer protection purpose and, as well, contrary to commercial reality, to exempt more affluent purchasers, and those able to obtain third party financing, from payment of the mortgage interest component while requiring purchasers who are to assume a portion of the vendor's financing, or give back a mortgage, to pay this component during the interim occupancy period.

In my respectful view, the obligation of the purchasers to give back a phantom mortgage pursuant to their agreements of purchase and sale constitutes a valid contractual obligation for the purpose of s. 51(6) para. 1. I would not view this obligation as being precluded by or in contravention of the Act. It results in the purchasers being placed in effectively the same position they would be in were possession and final closings contemporaneous. It, furthermore, establishes an occupancy fee that is equitable from the standpoint of both the purchasers and the vendors. In sum, the phantom mortgage concept invoked in these cases, in my view, is consistent with the intended purpose and effect of the section. To conclude otherwise in the circumstances of these cases, and limit the occupancy fee to estimated realty taxes and common expenses only, would be to confer a windfall on these purchasers. This is a result which runs counter to their expectations on entering into the agreements of purchase and sale in question, and one which, in my opinion, is not mandated by s. 51(6).

In reaching this conclusion, I am not unmindful of the artificiality of the phantom mortgage concept or the contention that to sanction it is to permit form to outweigh substance. Nonetheless, for the reasons I have stated, the concept satisfies the requirements of the Act. Moreover, it makes s. 51(6) para. 1 equally applicable to all classes of purchasers, and achieves a fair and equitable result. If this concept were contrary to the consumer protection purpose underlying the section or violative of the spirit of the Act, I think it can fairly be said that, given its wide use over the past decade, one would have expected that the government ministry responsible for the administration of the Act would long since have intervened and caused steps to be taken to protect the numerous condominium purchasers in this province whose interim occupancy rental has been set by reference to phantom mortgages the same as, or comparable to, those in issue here. THE RESCISSION ISSUES IN THE HUANG & DANCZKAY LTD. APPEAL

I come now to the appeal of 797606 Ontario Limited against the order of Carruthers J. dismissing its claim for rescission of the agreements to purchase six penthouse-level condominium units in the respondent's proposed condominium project. The claim is based on two contentions: (1) that the respondent failed to take all reasonable steps to register a declaration and description without delay; and (2) that the respondent was in breach of the duty to take all reasonable steps to sell the other residential units included in the property without delay.

The building in question was completed in the winter of 1987. It contains 55 units which were first marketed by the respondent as "executive furnished suites" to be rented out to transient business people. In the fall of 1988, the respondent put the units up for sale as fully furnished proposed condominium units. In September, 1988, the parties entered into agreements of purchase and sale for six penthouse-level units which together make up an entire floor of the building. In November 1988, the appellant took possession of the units. As I indicated earlier, the appellant is a company engaged in the business of purchasing condominium units for investment and resale. The appellant's principals have in past years purchased condominium units in other projects developed by the respondent. The appellant intended to rent the units in question and eventually sell them at a profit. In fact, the units have been rented for various periods of time, some of them by the respondent's rental agents, and the appellant has received rental income.

By February 23, 1990, when this application came on in the court below, the respondent had succeeded in selling only four units in addition to the six purchased by the appellant. Some of the unsold units had been leased. The appellant has likewise sought to resell its six units, but without success. It has also experienced difficulty in renting the units. The respondent has refused the appellant's request to repurchase the units.

The declaration and description in respect of the property was eventually registered on February 14, 1990. The next step in the transaction is, of course, final closing. The appellant, however, contends that it is not obliged to complete the purchases, and is entitled to rescission of the agreements on the ground that the respondent failed to comply with the provisions of the Act relating to timely registration of the property and timely sale of the remainder of the units. The appellant asserts that the alleged breach of the respondent's statutory duties denied it the benefit of the condominium scheme envisioned by the Act.

Turning to the first of these grounds, the submission is that the respondent failed to take all reasonable steps to register a declaration and description without delay, as it is obliged to do under s. 51(1)(a) of the Act. This section provides that:

51.(1) Every agreement of purchase and sale entered into by a proposed declarant for a proposed unit for residential purposes shall be deemed to contain,

(a) a covenant by the vendor to take all reasonable steps to register a declaration and description in respect of the property in which the unit is included without delay ...

I agree with the appellant's general proposition that these mandatory provisions "are in the nature of consumer protection legislation designed to oblige the vendor of proposed condominium units for residential purposes to proceed without delay to register the declaration and description and to convey registrable title to the purchaser". I am of the opinion, however, that there is no basis for interfering with the decision of Carruthers J. This ground of appeal raises an essentially factual issue. On the evidence which has been adduced concerning the various steps taken by the respondent to effect registration, and the variety of title and planning problems it encountered in this regard, none of which I need detail, I can find no reason to question the correctness of the decision in appeal. In light of the material before the court, I am not persuaded that Carruthers J. erred in concluding that the respondent has not been guilty of any breach of s. 51(1)(a) such as to entitle the appellant to rescission. It should perhaps be noted that, prior to this application, the appellant did not seek any reasons for the delay in registration or make any complaint in this regard.

The second ground on which the appellant seeks rescission is founded on the allegation that the respondent failed to take reasonable steps to sell the other units in the proposed condominium project as required by s. 51(1)(b) of the Act. This section states: 51.(1) Every agreement of purchase and sale entered into by a proposed declarant for a proposed unit for residential purposes shall be deemed to contain,

(b) a covenant by the vendor to take all reasonable steps to sell the other residential units included in the property without delay other than any units mentioned in a statement under clause 54(1)(c) ...

Section 54(1)(c) sets out the requirements for a vendor who wishes to lease units in a residential condominium:

54.(1) A declarant or proposed declarant shall not grant a lease of a unit or proposed unit for residential purposes unless,

(c) every agreement of purchase and sale of a unit included in the property includes a statement that the unit to be included in the lease is or will be leased and specifies the uses that are or will be permitted by the lease ...

The agreements of purchase and sale in this case each contained the following provision:

39. The Vendor, as a proposed declarant under the Act hereby states that any unit or proposed unit within the Condominium Project may be included in a lease and the use that will be permitted by the lease will be for residential purposes only in the case of a unit.

On the evidence relating to this submission, Carruthers J. was unable to find the respondent in breach of its obligation to take all reasonable steps to sell the remaining unsold units. He also concluded that, although para. 39 of the agreement of purchase and sale "may not be as complete as it might", it constituted a statement in the sense that that term is used in s. 54(1)(c). In addition, he noted that, on the facts of this case, the appellant knew, from the time it agreed to purchase its units, that other units in the building would be leased or rented. Indeed, it is clear that, at the time of and prior to the appellant's purchase, fully furnished units were being rented to persons who had no option to purchase. The appellant obtained the respondent's consent to rent its units also. As noted above, the appellant did so in some instances through the respondent's rental agents.

Having reviewed the affidavits filed by the respondent setting forth the efforts which it has made to sell the units, which include a rather extensive advertising campaign and an offer of favourable financing terms to potential buyers, I do not think that the respondent can be said to be in breach of the duty imposed by s. 51(1)(b) to take all reasonable steps to sell the remaining residential units without delay. The respondent's inability to sell these units is doubtless an unfortunate consequence of the current severe downturn in the condominium market in Toronto. It does not appear to be through lack of trying.

In light of this conclusion, I need only add, in regard to whether para. 39 of the agreements of purchase and sale complies with s. 54(1)(c), that on the particular facts of the present case, I would agree with Carruthers J. that the contractual provision in question constitutes a statement in conformity with s. 54(1)(c). Given the appellant's knowledge of the original concept for this building, and its intention to participate in an arrangement whereby all of the proposed units, including the appellant's, were to be made available for rental purposes, this appellant could have been under no misapprehension that para. 39 constituted a statement specifying that "any unit or proposed unit" could be leased and, accordingly, was not subject to the requirements of s. 51(1)(b). Whether the particular units that may be leased must, in other circumstances, be set out with greater specificity to satisfy this provision of the Act need not be considered here.

DISPOSITION

For these reasons, I would allow the Opemoco appeal, set aside the judgment of Rosenberg J., and in place thereof order that the respondents' application be dismissed. The appellants are entitled to the costs of the appeal and of the application.

I would dismiss the Huang & Danczkay Ltd. appeal with costs.

First appeal allowed; second appeal dismissed.

Action No. M1151/91U

ONTARIO Ontario Court (General Division) B. Wright J. July 24, 1991

*Notice of appeal to the Court of Appeal for Ontario was filed August 12, 1991.

Real property -- Condominiums -- Agreement of purchase and sale -- Disclosure -- Disclosure statement providing insufficient information about by-law and rules of condominium corporation -- Change in construction schedule material amendment to disclosure statement -- Disclosure statement not complying with statutory requirements -- Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 84, s. 52.

In 1988, the applicants signed agreements to purchase units in a residential condominium project. The vendor provided each applicant with a disclosure statement. Although the proposed general organizational by-law of the condominium corporation was 12 pages in length, the disclosure statement dealt with the by-law on one-third of a page and set out only certain general topics covered by the by-law. The disclosure statement indicated that construction of the recreational facility was to begin in October 1988 and was to be completed by September 1989.

Because of a downturn in the economy and cash flow problems, the developer was unable to pay for construction and, as a result, the contractor abandoned the project. Trades and suppliers registered construction liens against the project. The commencement of construction of the recreational facilities was delayed a year. P Inc., the mortgagee, appointed a receiver-manager to take control and to complete the project.

The applicants sought a declaration that their respective agreements of purchase and sale were not binding because the disclosure statement did not comply with s. 52 of the Condominium Act. Section 52 stated that an agreement to purchase is not binding on the purchaser until the declarant or proposed declarant has delivered to the purchaser a copy of the current disclosure statement and all material amendments thereto.

P Inc. disputed that it was a declarant under the Act.

Held, there should be declarations that the agreements of purchase and sale are not binding and that P Inc. was a declarant.

The purpose of a disclosure statement is to summarize and highlight for a purchaser the important matters contained in the declaration, by-laws and rules for the condominium so that a purchaser may make an informed decision about whether to purchase. A disclosure statement should provide a purchaser with information that will provide reasonably satisfactory answers to these questions: (1) is the purchaser getting what he or she is paying for? (2) what are the rights and responsibilities of the condominium owner? and (3) how much will it cost to live in the condominium? In this case, the disclosure statement was deficient. The statement did not describe the significant features of the general organizational by-law. More information was required about the duties of the condominium corporation. The disclosure statement did not provide information about what was in the rules of the condominium corporation but contained only a listing of general subject-matter.

The applicants, as purchasers, should have been provided with material amendments to the disclosure statement. A material amendment is an amendment containing information that would provide a purchaser with a reasonable cause to reconsider whether to confirm the agreement of purchase and sale or to rescind. The purchasers should have been advised about delays in the completion of the recreational facility. Such a major change in a construction schedule was material information to which a purchaser should have had access. The purchasers should also have been advised about the construction lien claims since s. 52(7)(g) of the Act requires that the budget statement shall set out the status of any pending lawsuits material to the property.

As to the status of P Inc., under the Act, it was a declarant if it was a mortgagee in possession. Whether a mortgagee is in possession depends upon whether the mortgagee has taken out of the mortgagor's hands the control and management of the mortgaged premises. In this case, by the private appointment of the receiver-manager that it controlled, P Inc. was a mortgagee in possession and, accordingly, a declarant under the Act.

Statutes referred to

Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 84, ss. 1(1)(l) "declarant", (q) "owner", 52, 52(1), (2), (6)(b), (f), 7(g)

APPLICATION for a declaration that agreements for the purchase and sale of condominium units were not binding due to failure to comply with s. 52 of the Condominium Act.

Jonathan H. Fine, for applicants. Stephen Schwartz and Robert A. Miller, for 379059 Ontario Inc., c.o.b. Retail Engineering and Prenor Equity Inc.

No one appearing for Somerset Place Developments of Georgetown Ltd. and Canterra Developments Inc.

BLONUS WRIGHT J.:-- The applicants are purchasers of condominium units in a project called the Royal Ascot Club situated in Georgetown, Ontario.

No purchaser should be subjected to the horror story which unfolded for these purchasers. What was advertised as "a prestigious and intimate new condominium residence" with "a privileged new way of life in Georgetown" turned into a nightmare for the applicants.

Although possession was slated for September 1989, occupancy was not available until February 1990. What the purchasers occupied at that time was literally a construction site. The site, both internally and externally, was littered with garbage; the lobby entrances and hallways were not carpeted until December 1990; of the two elevators for the seven-storey X7 building, one has never worked; there was evidence of considerable water leakage into the underground garage; purchasers claim that heating and air conditioning units are inadequate; and the recreation centre has yet to open, although at the time of the hearing of this application an occupancy permit was imminent. These are only some of the many problems encountered by the purchasers.

It appears that this project got caught in the downturn of the economy which was felt particularly severely in the housing market. At the time of hearing of this application, only 41 of 84 units had been sold. The applicants, numbering approximately 30 purchasers, purchased during 1988. Apparently, the project suffered cash flow problems which resulted in the contractor being forced to cut corners, to resort to unskilled labour and substandard materials and ultimately to walk off the site because of non-payment.

Canterra Developments Inc. is the parent company of the developer, Somerset Place Developments of Georgetown Limited. This project was the only venture of Somerset. Somerset, at the time of the application, existed in name only, is basically out of the picture and has no assets to which anyone has recourse. Prenor Equity Inc. (Prenor) is the mortgagee who took control of the project in October 1990 and in November 1990 appointed 379059 Ontario Ltd., c.o.b. Retail Engineering (Retail), as receiver-manager of the project.

Prenor has effectively assumed control of the project with the unenviable task of picking up the pieces and finishing the project. It has, and is, expending considerable monies in order to complete the development and to rescue itself from what, in hindsight, it must consider to have been a bad investment.

Prenor maintains that most, if not all, of the deficiencies of the project have been rectified. The underground garage has been properly waterproofed, the elevator problem will be fixed shortly, there will be modifications to the heating and cooling equipment as recommended by Reindeers and Associates, and the recreation centre will be in full operation soon. It is Prenor's position that within a short period of time, the purchasers will, in fact, be enjoying the very kind of building and amenities that they agreed to purchase.

The purchasers still have reservations concerning the condition of the building. Having lived through and experienced a number of deficiencies in the construction of the project, the purchasers are leery of what the future may hold for maintenance and replacement costs.

The purchasers are also perturbed that Prenor has refused to honour three promises which the purchasers maintain were part of their agreements: furniture for the lobby; a van for the use of the residents; and a reduction in the phantom mortgage interest rate from 15.49 per cent to whatever the current rate is 90 days before the purchasers receive their deeds. Prenor refuses to honour these vendor commitments, claiming that the promises were not in writing.

The purchasers claim that their agreements of purchase and sale are not binding because of the failure of the vendor to deliver a disclosure statement which complies with the requirements of s. 52 of the Condominium Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 84.

In the second half of the decade of the 80s, Ontario experienced a considerable period of economic affluence with the demand for housing outstripping the supply. Prices were rising rapidly and not only were sales by purchasers, who intended to occupy what they purchased, on the increase, but there was a high percentage of speculative purchasers hoping to make a quick buck in the housing market. Condominium units were being gobbled up by clamouring purchasers and investors before developers even put a shovel into the project site. In that atmosphere of frenzied buying, the adequacy of a disclosure statement seldom crossed the purchasers' minds. The only concern was to buy before someone else did.

The importance of the adequacy of a disclosure statement surfaces when there is a recession and prices are falling because of the glut of condominiums on the market or because a condominium project runs into financial difficulties as did the Royal Ascot Club. In those situations, purchasers look for ways to get out of deals which have gone sour for one reason or another. In this case, the applicants cannot be blamed for seeking every available remedy to get out of what they perceive to be a bad investment.

Although condominiums have been in existence for a number of years, to a first time buyer the condominium concept of ownership is completely new. It is considerably different from, and foreign to, house ownership. The purpose of a disclosure statement is to summarize and highlight for a purchaser the important matters contained in the declaration, by-laws and rules so that a purchaser receives the pertinent information upon which to make an informed decision whether to purchase.

Issues

There are two issues:

- (1) Does the disclosure statement delivered to the applicants satisfy the requirements of s. 52 of the Condominium Act?
- (2) Is the respondent, Prenor Equity Inc., a declarant under the Condominium Act?

Disclosure statement

Section 52(1) of the Condominium Act provides that an agreement of purchase and sale is not binding on the purchaser "until the declarant or proposed declarant has delivered to the purchaser a copy of the current disclosure statement and all material amendments thereto".

Section 52(2) gives a purchaser, before getting title, ten days to rescind the agreement after receiving the disclosure statement or any material amendments thereto. This provision allows the purchaser to rescind without any reason and any purchase money paid is refunded.

But, if s. 52(1) is not complied with, there does not appear to be any time limit in which to declare an agreement of purchase and sale not binding on the grounds that the disclosure statement is inadequate as long as the purchaser has not become the owner of a unit. If a purchaser becomes an owner of a unit and alleges that a declarant provided statements or material required to be given to a purchaser that failed to contain any material statement or information, the unit owner is entitled to damages.

The Act provides very strict provisions as to the content of a disclosure statement. The pertinent provisions, for our purposes, are:

52(6) The disclosure statement ... shall contain and fully and accurately disclose,

(b) a general description of ... recreational and other amenities together with any conditions that apply to the provision of amenities;

(d) a brief narrative description of the significant features of the existing or proposed declaration, by-laws and rules governing the use of common elements and units ...

(f) where construction of amenities is not completed, a schedule of the proposed commencement and completion dates ... (7) The budget statement ... shall set out,

(g) ... the status of any pending lawsuits material to the property of which the declarant or proposed declarant has actual knowledge ...

My first observation: the above provisions appear to be poorly drafted. There appears to be a dichotomy of meaning. On the one hand, the disclosure statement shall "fully and accurately disclose", while on the other hand, "a general description" or "a brief narrative description of the significant features" is sufficient.

The question is: does the disclosure statement provided to the applicants comply with the above provisions?

There are only two previous cases which deal with the adequacy of a disclosure statement. In an October 24, 1983 brief endorsement on the record [summarized at 22 A.C.W.S. (2d) 509] in the case of Brunott v. Coolmur Properties Ltd., the Ontario Court of Appeal [Brooke, Weatherston and Thorson J.J.A.] said:

The appellant contends that there was no binding agreement of purchase and sale because no disclosure statement [was] delivered which meets the requirements of s. 52. We agree without specifying its failures that the document was no more than a statement of intention -- a proposed statement that lacked information on specific matters the statute enumerated. [It is] clear that [the] purpose of s. 52 is that [the] purchaser be given this information.

The disclosure statement in Brunott was two and one-third pages long exclusive of the budget statement. In our case, the disclosure statement is seven pages long exclusive of the budget statement. Therefore, our disclosure statement contains more information than in Brunott, but it must be decided whether those seven pages comply with the requirements.

The second case is a judgment of Carruthers J. in Benner v. HLS York Developments Ltd. (1985), 52 O.R. (2d) 243, 21 D.L.R. (4th) 652, in which the disclosure statement was found to be adequate. The following are relevant statements from that case at p. 246 O.R., p. 655 D.L.R.:

If a disclosure statement is found wanting so that, in effect, it is not a disclosure statement as required by the provisions of the Condominium Act, then a purchaser is at no time required to complete the transaction in connection with which it has been given.

In deciding whether a proffered disclosure statement complies with the provisions of s. 52, the court is to employ an objective standard. ... The person to whom it is given has to be able to determine what are the essential elements of what he has agreed to purchase ... The purpose of the relevant provisions of the Condominium Act is to permit the purchaser to be able to make an informed decision as to whether to elect to rescind or affirm the outstanding agreement of purchase and sale. In my opinion, the sufficiency or otherwise of a disclosure statement must, as well, be judged on the basis of the materiality of its content.

I agree with the comments of Carruthers J. However, I wish to expand on the reasons behind the purpose for a disclosure statement. Why is the content of a disclosure statement so critical?

The public is familiar with the adage "a man's house is his castle". But this type of ownership includes the complete control and privacy of both the internal and external parts of the property. In a condominium property, the extent of an owner's control and privacy are severely limited. That control and privacy is confined to within the walls of the owner's unit. Once an owner steps out of the door of his unit, he shares in common with other owners all of the other aspects of the condominium property. Along with that sharing come certain responsibilities and restrictions.

In effect, a previous house owner, who enjoyed the benefits of sole proprietorship, is, as owner of a condominium, only a shareholder with one vote in a small business run by a board of directors where the majority of votes makes the decisions. Even members of the public who have never previously owned a house are familiar with the trappings of house ownership or apartment occupancy, but not the concepts of condominium living.

Since condominium lifestyle is dramatically different than the familiar lifestyle of other property ownership, it is extremely important that persons contemplating condominium living be adequately informed of the advantages and disadvantages of the condominium concept. The legislation provides that complete and adequate information necessary for a purchaser to make an informed decision should be contained in the disclosure statement.

In the whole scheme of things, some aspects of condominium living may initially appear unimportant to a vendor of condominiums. The vendor is completely familiar with the condominium concept and is in the business of selling that concept to the public. But the criteria of required information must be based on the underlying philosophy that hereditary concepts of property ownership have a longstanding mental impact on a person's subconscious attitudes of a style of living. Those very familiar concepts are ingrained. It takes time and new information to change those concepts.

For example, is it material for a condominium purchaser to know that the corporation must have a key to the owner's unit and the owner cannot change the lock unless a key is provided to the corporation? That is a totally new concept for a previous house owner whose thinking has been devoted to the security of his own property and the only persons who have keys are members of the family. There are very good reasons why the corporation needs to have a key, but until the rationale for the requirement to give a key to the corporation is brought home to the purchaser, the purchaser is unable to take the second step to understand the rationale behind the requirement. Once the rationale is explained, the requirement usually fades into insignificance. But, initially, the information may be significant to a new purchaser.

Paragraph 9 of the disclosure statement advises the purchaser that the corporation is entitled to enter any unit "upon reasonable notice". A purchaser would have no difficulty with this concept. The purchaser would be given reasonable notice that the corporation needed access to the owner's unit for a specific purpose. But, I suggest, it is a whole new concept for a purchaser to be told that the corporation has in its possession at all times a key to the owner's unit.

The above example is given to demonstrate a minor but important difference in concepts between house ownership and condominium shareholding.

I suggest that a first time condominium purchaser has three main concerns:

- (1) Am I getting everything that I am paying for?
- (2) What are my rights and responsibilities as a condominium owner?
- (3) How much will it cost to live in this condominium complex?

In my view, a disclosure statement should provide a purchaser with the information which will provide reasonably satisfactory answers to those three concerns.

I now propose to discuss in some detail the content of the disclosure statement.

Proposed By-Law No. 1 (general organizational by-law)

The proposed By-law No. 1 comprises 12 pages; the disclosure statement refers to the by-law in one paragraph on p. 6 comprising one-third of a page. There is no narrative description of any significant features of the by-law. The disclosure statement sets out only certain general topics covered by the by-law. Since the disclosure statement gives no description of significant features of the by-law, one could conclude that there are none to disclose. My reading of the by-law compels me to conclude that the disclosure statement is deficient since it fails to describe the significant features of the by-law.

For example, I believe a disclosure statement should provide more information on the duties of the corporation than is contained in this disclosure statement. The only duty of the corporation mentioned is assessing common expenses from time to time and collecting monthly common expense payments from unit owners. Other duties listed in Article IV of the By-law, which may be of particular interest to some purchasers, are:

- (f) the preparation of an estimated budget;
- (h) the employment and dismissal of personnel necessary for the maintenance and operation of the common elements;
- (j) the investment of reserve monies held by the Corporation in interest bearing accounts ...
- (q) establishing and maintaining adequate reserve funds for the major repair or replacement of the common elements ...

It is essential that purchasers be advised of what input they have into and control over the affairs of the corporation. It is not disclosed to a purchaser that under Article V of the by-law, the board shall call a special meeting: "Upon receipt of a requisition in writing made by owners who together own not less than 15% of the units". There is no disclosure that at meetings "a quorum shall be constituted when persons entitled to vote and owning not less than 33 1/3% of the units are present in person or represented by proxy".

I suggest that a purchaser should know that the affairs of the corporation can effectively be dealt with by only one-third of the unit owners.

With respect to the Board of Directors, the information in Article VI of the by-law to the effect that the number of directors shall be five, of whom three shall constitute a quorum, or that a director need not be an owner has not been disclosed. Such information should have been disclosed.

The disclosure statement fails to set out important information from Article XII of the by-law with respect to default in payment of common expenses. No disclosure is made that arrears, "shall bear interest at the rate of 18% per annum and shall be compounded monthly until paid".

Additionally, Article XII contains other pertinent information. The board sets the budget unilaterally; the owners have no say. On receipt of the budget, owners must pay by 12 post-dated cheques. Extraordinary expenses may be assessed by the board at any time and are payable within ten days. All the disclosure statement says is: "The proposed By-law establishes requirements for assessing common expenses from time to time and collecting monthly common expenses from unit owners".

My conclusion is that the disclosure statement does not contain sufficient information to comply with the requirements of s. 52 of the Condominium Act. There are too many voids in the description of significant features of the by-law which go to informing purchasers as to the handling of the affairs of the corporation, what input an owner has as a shareholder and how costs are determined.

The reported judgment in Benner, supra, does not contain the disclosure statement which was under scrutiny; however, for comparison purposes, I obtained a copy from counsel who acted for the plaintiff in that case. Although the disclosure statement is only five and a half pages long, exclusive of the budget statement, slightly more than one page is devoted to a description of the significant features of proposed By-law No. 1.

With respect to proposed By-law No. 1, the disclosure statement in Benner discloses: 15 per cent of unit owners can call a special meeting; 33 1/3 per cent of owners constitute a quorum; the number of directors; a director need not be a member of the corporation; extraordinary expenses may be assessed by the board and are payable within ten days; and, arrears of payments of common expenses bear interest at 18 per cent per annum.

At least, the drafter of the disclosure statement in Benner believed the above items were significant features of By-law No. 1. These are the type of significant features which I have found to be absent from the disclosure statement in our case.

The problem any judge faces in adjudicating on the sufficiency of a disclosure statement is, in my view, the failure of the legislation to provide an adequate guideline for the content of a disclosure statement. It is not adequate to simply require disclosure of "significant" features. Purchasers are sophisticated and unsophisticated. What would be a "significant" feature to one purchaser may be not at all "significant" to another purchaser. Therefore, there should, I suggest, be some standard form of the content of a disclosure statement. Such is a matter of policy rather than law.

I suggest it is incumbent upon government to devise a standard form of disclosure statement to give more guidance to vendors and developers and more protection to purchasers. Purchasers should not be required to commence legal actions for the determination of what government should be deciding as a matter of policy. Courts should not have to spend time defining the content of disclosure statements when such a matter is truly the purview of the legislature. By now, there surely is sufficient knowledge and experience with the condominium concept that the government can put its mind to determining what a disclosure statement should contain and be able to amend the legislation to provide better guidelines rather than the vague generalities of the current provisions.

An entirely different approach to the legislation could be advanced due to the fact that the purchaser receives, with the disclosure statement, complete copies of the declaration, by-laws and rules of the corporation. It could be argued that the purchaser receives all of the required information and, therefore, it is not necessary that the disclosure statement duplicate a lot of the information. For that argument to be valid, the legislation requires amendment to make the requirements of the content of the disclosure statement much less stringent.

In addition to the discussion on pp. 288 to 290, supra, I offer the following example of information contained in By-law No. 1 which some purchasers may consider to be significant and to which at least some reference might be made in a disclosure statement. This example underlines the lack of preciseness when the legislation uses such a fluid term as "significant". It means different things to different people.

Article III of the by-law describes the records which the corporation shall maintain. The following is a list of some of the records spelled out in Article III:

- 1(i) a table depicting the maintenance responsibilities and indicating whether the corporation or the unit owners are responsible.
- (j) ... a list detailing current replacement costs and life expectancy under normal maintenance conditions of all major capital items in the property.
- (k) a separate record of all receipts on account of common expense payments.
- 4(a) minutes of all meetings of the Board;
- (c) a copy of all consents for alterations to units.
- 5(a) a copy of annual financial statements shall be furnished to every owner.

The disclosure statement makes no reference to any of the records which the corporation is required to keep. To be advised that there is easy access to such records could be important to a purchaser who is becoming a shareholder of a business. The purchaser will be put somewhat at ease knowing that there is a record of who is responsible for maintenance and information available on life expectancy and current replacement costs of all major capital items. As well, a purchaser will have access to all minutes of the board meetings and will receive an annual financial statement. Probably an even more important record to a purchaser is the consents for alterations to units. There could be considerable consternation amongst unit owners if there was no such record. If there were no records, unit owners could discover that the corporation allowed certain alterations to be made by one owner but refused approval for similar alterations to another owner. Where the corporation must keep a record of all consents for alterations, unit owners are assured of even-handed treatment.

Rules

The disclosure statement does not tell a purchaser what is in the rules; it contains only a listing of general subject-matter. For example, it does not disclose that any losses, costs or damages incurred by the corporation by reason of any breach of the rules shall be paid by the owner and may be recovered in the same manner as common expenses. This includes any breach of the rules by any guests of the owner.

Rule 16 says: "No motor vehicle, other than a private passenger automobile, motorcycle or station wagon, shall be parked in any parking space". If a purchaser had a small trucking or delivery business, it would appear that the owner's parking space could not be used for a small truck or delivery van. The purchaser would not know this fact from reading the disclosure statement. I note that the Benner disclosure statement contains this information.

Rule 22 states that any unit owner wishing to use the party or meeting room must first provide a refundable deposit "in such amount and upon such terms as may be determined by the Board or the manager in their sole discretion".

Rule 23 provides that children under the age of 16 are not permitted in the exercise rooms unless accompanied by a parent. This would be important information for a mother and father who both work and have children under 16. The children would like to use the exercise room after school and their parents would like them to be so occupied but they would not be able to use the facilities without a parent being present. Suppose a family has children under 16 and an older child age 18 or more. The purchaser should be informed about this rule to determine if it would be possible to amend the rule so that an adult other than a parent could be present with the children in the exercise room.

Both Rules 22 and 23 are conditions placed on the use of facilities. Those conditions are not disclosed in the disclosure statement. The absence of that disclosure is a breach of s. 52(6)(b) which requires the statement to contain "any conditions that apply to the provision of amenities". Is this another area where the legislation is far too vague? What are "any conditions"? I suggest that an examination of a number of disclosure statements may find them to be faulty because some condition has not been disclosed.

To this point, I have discussed the disclosure statement which was provided to all the applicant purchasers. However, s. 52(1) and (2) is not limited to receipt by the purchaser of a copy of the current disclosure statement, but "all material amendments thereto". I must consider whether the purchaser should have been provided with any amendments to the disclosure statement.

Material amendments

A "material" amendment is an amendment containing information which would provide a purchaser with a reasonable cause to reconsider whether to confirm the agreement of purchase and sale or to rescind.

For example, s. 52(6)(b) mandates that the disclosure statement provide any conditions that apply to the provision of recreational and other amenities. If certain purchasers agreed to buy a unit in a particular condominium development because of the recreational amenities, it would be imperative to that purchaser to be informed of any material changes to the conditions that apply to the recreational amenities.

To continue with recreational amenities, s. 52(6)(f) provides that the disclosure statement contain a schedule of the proposed commencement and completion dates where construction of the amenities is not completed. Suppose, for example, that the disclosure statement which the purchaser originally received did provide the proposed commencement and completion dates for a recreation centre which was to have a swimming pool. Suppose that a senior citizen purchaser, as part of continuing therapy for a physical problem, is required to spend a certain amount of time each day swimming. If the construction of the recreation centre is delayed for a considerable time, that would be a very material amendment to the information upon which the purchaser decided to purchase. That information could cause the purchaser to look for other accommodation with the necessary swimming facility.

Paragraph 4 in the disclosure statement under the topic "Recreational and Other Amenities" records: "The construction of the above amenities is expected to commence in the month of October 30, 1988 and the proposed date for completion is September, 1989".

The evidence is that all applicants, except one, signed their agreement of purchase and sale prior to October 1988 and received the above information about the proposed commencement and completion dates of the recreational facilities. Construction of the recreation centre did not start until October 1989, one year later than expected, and, at the time of this application in June 1991, the facilities were just being opened.

The purchasers had interim closing dates of September 1989 at which time they were to be given possession and, pursuant to the agreement, expected a completed recreation centre. I find that a considerable time prior to the expected interim closing, the vendor was well aware that the proposed construction dates were beyond realization. The vendor knew the recreation centre would not be completed by the time of interim possession and must have been aware that construction may not have been commenced until that time.

I believe that such a major change in a construction schedule was material information to which a purchaser should have had access. I find that there was an obligation on the vendor to make that material amendment to the disclosure statement. Failure to make that amendment is non-compliance with s. 52.

A second material change requiring an amendment occurs in s. 52(7)(g). It requires that the budget statement shall set out "the status of any pending lawsuits material to the property of which the declarant or proposed declarant has actual knowledge". In this case, there were a number of liens registered against the lands by tradesmen and suppliers who were not being paid. The main contractor vacated the site in April 1990, filed a lien, and commenced an action against the developer for a substantial amount. Such matters of pending lawsuits seem clearly to be "material to the property". In my view, such information is crucial in order for a purchaser to make a decision to purchase. That information fits in with one of the main concerns of a purchaser: how much will it cost to live in the condominium building? If there are substantial pending lawsuits, a purchaser should be informed in order to be able to seek advice whether those pending lawsuits will add any costs to the monthly expenses, and if so, how much. In the case of this project, the information of pending lawsuits would have put purchasers on notice that this project was in financial difficulty, which, at least, would have provided them with an opportunity to determine whether they wished to rescind their agreements. In my view, such information is within the category of "material amendments" to the disclosure statement which should have been provided to the purchasers. Otherwise, subss. 52(1) and (7)(g) are meaningless and the consumer protection atmosphere which pervades the Condominium Act is illusory.

I conclude that the disclosure statement violates the requirements of s. 52 because its content is inadequate and material amendments to the statement were not made. In order that this condominium project will come to completion with compliance with all legislative requirements, it is necessary to determine who is the declarant for that purpose. I now consider the second issue.

Is Prenor a declarant under the Condominium Act?

Section 1(1)(l) of the Condominium Act defines "declarant" as: "the owner or owners in fee simple of the land described in the description at the time of registration of a declaration and description of the land". "Owner" is defined in s. 1(1)(q) as: "the owner or owners of the freehold estate or estates in a unit and common interest, but does not include a mortgagee unless in possession".

The question is: is Prenor a mortgagee in possession, and therefore, an owner and, therefore, a declarant?

Apparently, courts of equity were cautious in deciding that a mortgagee was in possession. McRuer J. [quoting from Parkinson v. Hanbury (1867), L.R. 2 H.L. 1] in Beckstead v. Ball, [1961] O.R. 127, 26 D.L.R. (2d) 374 (H.C.J.), at p. 130 O.R., p. 377 D.L.R., said:

It follows of course from the almost penal liabilities imposed on a mortgagee in possession that Courts of Equity were very slow to decide that possession had been taken, and would not do so unless satisfied that the mortgagee in possession took the possession in his capacity of mortgagee without any reasonable ground for believing himself to hold in any other capacity. ... The Courts also favoured any means which would enable the mortgagee to obtain the advantages of possession without its drawbacks. In Beckstead, the mortgagee was not in actual possession and did not control the premises other than to collect rents.

I suggest it is a possibility in any condominium project that a mortgagee will find itself compelled to take over a project, as Prenor did in this instance, in order to salvage a substantial investment. It is a risk that a mortgagee takes under consumer protection legislation such as the Condominium Act. According to the reasoning in Beckstead, I am satisfied that Prenor "took the possession in (its) capacity of mortgagee without any reasonable ground for believing (itself) to hold in any other capacity".

If Prenor is not in possession and therefore not a "declarant", the purchasers have no responsible person upon which to rely to complete the project pursuant to all of the terms of the agreements entered into with the purchasers. There would exist no one to fulfil the declarant's obligations under the Condominium Act. The developer, Somerset, exists in name only, stripped of any meaningful authority with respect to this project. If a mortgagee in Prenor's position is not in possession, then unscrupulous vendors have available a scheme to circumvent the consumer protection aspects of the legislation. All that is required of a less than honest developer is to set up a shell company to sell the units. Then the vendor company disappears; the mortgagee-related company takes over, but, if deemed not to be in possession, the mortgagee is not required to live up to the original agreements. The purchasers are the losers, having purchased units in a project which is not the quality of the project for which they bargained.

The question of whether a mortgagee is in possession depends upon whether the mortgagee has taken out of the mortgagor's hands the control and management of the mortgaged premises. In Beckstead, a reference was made to the decision in Noyes v. Pollock (1886), 32 Ch. D. 53, 55 L.J. Ch. 513 (C.A.), which dealt with whether a mortgagee not in actual possession but in receipt of rents is, in law, a mortgagee in possession. Bowen L.J. made the following comment at p. 64 Ch.D.:

But in the case where an estate is let to tenants, of course the mortgagee does not enter upon actual occupation of the demised premises. He may fall under the principle as a person who enters and takes possession of the rents and profits; but only, as it seems to me, if he does something which goes beyond the mere receipt of sums of money to which the rents and profits may amount, and reaches a point at which he displaces, for the purpose of realizing the security, the mortgagor from the control and dominion of the reversion of the estate which is demised. Unless the dominion and control is taken in that sense, the mere receipt of the produce of the management may be taken by the mortgagee, and yet he may stop short of taking the management itself. He may take the rents; that is not enough unless he takes the rent in such a way as to take upon himself, and out of the hands of the mortgagor, the business and the duty of collecting and being diligent in that respect.

In my view, Prenor's actions accord with this description of a mortgagee taking possession and those actions go beyond what Bowen L.J. concludes constitutes a mortgagee in possession. Prenor not only receives the occupation fees from the purchasers, but has taken over the daily operation of the project in order to see it to completion, including all the physical and legal aspects. The mortgagor, Somerset, has been completely displaced and has no input into any facet of the management of the project. But Prenor argues that its receiver-manager, Retail, is in possession and not Prenor. However, it is a facade to suggest that Retail is in possession when Prenor is calling all the shots. In my opinion, Retail is receiver-manager only in name and exercises only whatever authority is given to it by Prenor. In fact, the contract between Prenor and Retail makes it certain that Retail operates only at the behest of Prenor. Paragraph 7(b) of that contract provides that Prenor will "supervise and give final approval for all actions of Retail in completing and managing the project".

Since Retail is the privately appointed receiver-manager of Prenor, Prenor cannot escape the obligations of a mortgagee in possession. It would be inequitable to allow Prenor to hide behind a receivership, thereby hoping to absolve itself of all responsibility to purchasers. There is a clear distinction between privately appointed and court-appointed receivers as to obligations. Although not definitive statements, courts have implied that privately appointed receivers are akin to mortgagees in possession and have corresponding obligations.

In Ostrander v. Niagara Helicopters Ltd. (1973), 1 O.R. (2d) 281, 40 D.L.R. (3d) 161 (H.C.J.), a receiver-manager was appointed by the mortgagee to protect and enforce the security of the mortgagee. The court, at p. 286 O.R., p. 166 D.L.R., found that:

A very clear distinction must be drawn between the duties and obligations of a receiver-manager ... appointed by virtue of the contractual clauses of a mortgage deed and the duties and obligations of a receiver-manager who is appointed by the Court and whose sole authority is derived from that Court appointment ... In the latter case he is an officer of the Court; is very definitely in a fiduciary capacity to all parties involved in the contest.

In that case, the court was satisfied that the purpose of the employment of the receiver was to protect the security of the bond holder. Stark J., at p. 286 O.R., p. 166 D.L.R., held that the privately appointed receiver's role was that of "agent for a mortgagee in possession". There was no suggestion in the case that the mortgagee was ever in actual possession. The relationship with the receiver was in the nature of a typical appointment such as between Prenor and Retail, yet Stark J. saw fit to refer to the mortgagee as being "in possession". Galligan J., in Federal Trust Co. v. Frisina (1976), 20 O.R. (2d) 32, 86 D.L.R. (3d) 591 (H.C.J.) stated [pp. 34-35 O.R., p. 593 D.L.R.]:

A mortgagee has the right in law to go into possession for default. In the exercise of that right the mortgagee obviously can choose the manager he pleases. But a mortgagee exercising his right to go into possession incurs corresponding obligations. Frequently, those obligations are thought to be onerous. It seems to me that when a mortgagee applies to the Court to appoint a receiver-manager he is asking the Court to dispossess the mortgagor but absolve himself from the obligations incurred if he exercises that right himself. I think that if he asks a court to relieve him of the obligations of a mortgagee in possession, he must lose his right to decide who shall be in control of the property.

It ought to be remembered that a receiver-manager appointed by the court under s. 19 of the Judicature Act, becomes an officer of the Court and is therefore very different from a person appointed manager by a mortgagee in possession. That person is simply the agent of the mortgagee.

In R. v. Coopers & Lybrand Ltd., [1981] 2 F.C. 169, 34 C.B.R. (N.S.) 97 (C.A.) [costs award aff'd [1981] 2 F.C. 196, 80 D.T.C. 6323 (C.A.)], the privately appointed receiver was held to be akin to a mortgagee in possession and therefore responsible for failure to remit an amount deducted from wages for income tax. The court commented at p. 181 F.C., pp. 108-09 C.B.R.:

One exercising the office of receiver and manager is acting for the benefit of the debenture holders. He is not appointed to carry on the business of the company in the best interest of the company; he is appointed to realize the security of the debenture holders. While the debenture itself states that the receiver and manager is the agent of the debenture debtor, the chief purpose of this provision (which is a contractual one between Venus (mortgagor) and the Bank (mortgagee)) is to confirm the title that the receiver and manager seeks to confer on any third party dealing with it and to exonerate the Bank from any responsibility for acts of the receiver and manager. The powers of the receiver and manager are really ancillary to the main purpose of the appointment, which is the realization for the debenture holder of its security. The receiver and manager is akin to a mortgagee in possession. The receiver and manager taking possession of the property subject to the charge becomes the manager of that property of the debtor but not the manager of the debtor company.

In that case, the receiver continued manufacturing and merchandising activities on the property because it was of the opinion that it would be in the interest of the bank to use that property "in its unquestioned possession".

I conclude that Prenor is a mortgagee in possession under the Condominium Act. In effect, Prenor stands in the place of the vendor, Somerset, and assumes all the rights and liabilities of the vendor. The liabilities include honouring the agreements with the purchasers which include: reduction of the mortgage interest component based upon the difference between the rate actually used in the calculation of the occupancy fee (15.49 per cent) and the mortgage rate effective 90 days prior to the unit transfer date; provision of a courtesy van for the condominium corporation; and, supplying appropriate furniture for the lobby of the complex.

Conclusion

There will be a declaration that the disclosure statement does not comply with s. 52 of the Condominium Act. The agreements of purchase and sale are not binding on the purchasers.

There will also be a declaration that Prenor is a declarant under the Condominium Act.

The purchasers are to be refunded the total amount of any deposit monies including monies paid for upgrades and including accrued interest which rate, I understand, has been agreed to by the parties. There will be judgment against any of the defendants who hold any of the deposit monies.

Since interim possession, the purchasers have, in my view, been paying occupancy fees commensurate with a completed "prestigious" building with all the promised amenities. For what they have received, and the many hassles and anxieties they have had to endure, the occupancy fee has been exorbitant. I believe they should be required to pay only an amount for reasonable "rent" because they have been, in effect, tenants. I assess a monthly "rent" to be the amount of the estimated realty taxes plus the common expenses. Put another way, the applicants shall be refunded all of the mortgage interest component of the monthly occupancy fee.

The applicants shall be afforded a reasonable time in which to obtain alternate accommodation.

I have not dealt with the question of the validity of the phantom mortgage and whether the vendor had the right to collect the mortgage interest component of the monthly occupancy fee. That question is before the Court of Appeal as a result of an appeal from the judgment of Rosenberg J. in Albrecht v. Opemoco Inc. (1989), 70 O.R. (2d) 151, 61 D.L.R. (4th) 594 (H.C.J.) [supplementary reasons at (1989), 70 O.R. (2d) 221, 62 D.L.R. (4th) 541 (H.C.J.)]. The parties have agreed that the determination of that question as it relates to this case should be adjourned pending the Court of Appeal's decision.

I may be spoken to with respect to costs and to any other matter which may arise as a result of this judgment.

Order accordingly.

Baer v. Condominium Plan 9123697

Between Grania Mary Baer, plaintiff (applicant), and The Owners: Condominium Plan 9123697, defendant (respondent)

[1998] A.J. No. 1441

Action No. 9703-10188

Alberta Court of Queen's Bench Judicial District of Edmonton Lee J. December 22, 1998.

Injunctions -- Interlocutory or interim injunctions -- Arguable issues of law involved or serious questions to be tried -- Real property -- Condominiums -- Corporation -- Liability to unit holders.

Application by Baer for an interlocutory injunction compelling the Condominium Association to pay the costs of accommodation incurred as a result of her displacement. Commencing in 1993, Baer complained to the Association that her unit was contaminated with mold, mildew and garage fumes, and that walls and carpets in her unit had been blackened and stained. In 1997, the Association agreed to undertake an investigation of Baer's unit and to pay for alternative accommodations of Baer's choice during the investigation. During the year-long investigation of the unit, the Condominium Association's engineers reported that the problems were caused by defects in the design or installation of a bedroom window, clothes dryer vent, fire stop system, pipe and wall. In November 1997, the Association proposed a repair and remediation process to Baer. The proposal provided that Baer would sign a release all claims against the Association. Baer rejected the proposal and instructed the Association not to enter or conduct repairs to the unit without her permission. Baer rejected the proposal because she believed that high carbon monoxide levels in the unit required more investigation and would not be eliminated under the repair plan, and she did not want to sign a full release of all claims. Since it could not conduct any further repairs without Baer's authorization, and because Baer refused to agree to its proposal or to advance an alternative proposal, the Association advised Baer that it would cease paying for her alternative accommodation effective January 1, 1998.

HELD: Application dismissed. The Association was not an insurer of building defects in individual units. Even if the defects had been the responsibility of the Association, there was insufficient evidence that it failed to fulfil its obligation to repair. There was no serious question to be tried that the Condominium Association was obligated to pay for alternative accommodations at a time when Baer did not allow it to make repairs to her unit. The court had no authority to obligate the Condominium Association to provide a written plan of repair to Baer or to pay for Baer's alternative accommodations while she conducted her own investigations.

REASONS FOR DECISION

LEE J.:--

I. BACKGROUND

[para1] The Plaintiff regrettably purchased her unit in the condominium project known as Whelehan Place located in St. Albert, Alberta, from the developer of that project in December 1991. The unit is located on the main entrance level, off the lobby area. The unit shares a common wall with one level of the indoor multi-level parkade.

[para2] From turn-over of the project to the Condominium Association in 1991, and continuing today, the owners of the project allegedly have noted or been advised of numerous and serious design and construction problems with the building, including the following:

(a) Improperly waterproofed wood and concrete foundations resulting in the infiltration of water into the parkade and, more importantly, into the wood sub-floors of the building. This deficiency has resulted in the rotting and failure of the sub-floors of three units, including that of the Plaintiff. The sub-floors were repaired at the time the foundation on the west side of the building was re-waterproofed.

(b) Various areas of the foundation have rotted or failed as a result of water infiltration and improperly constructed wood foundation systems. To avoid full structural failure of portions of the building, certain of these foundation sections have been reconstructed and fortified. Further areas of the building foundation are also rotting and others are suspected to be rotting but repairs have not been carried out to date because of financial constraints.

(c) Deficient construction and design of the roofing system. This has resulted in the infiltration of outside water and leakage due to significant condensation. Leakage into the building has caused damage to drywall and other interior improvements of various units. (d) Improperly balanced ventilation systems. This has resulted in back-drafts and air circulation problems throughout the building.

(e) In 1997, it was discovered during an investigation of the Plaintiff's unit that the building does not meet applicable fire code requirements that existed at the time the building was designed, nor is the building constructed in accordance with the actual design fire safety standards. Consequently, there is little to retard the spread of fire either from unit to unit or floor to floor. Discussions are on-going among provincial and civic officials and with engineers of the Defendant to determine how this problem can be remedied.

(f) Various insulation deficiencies. This has resulted in freezing pipes and significant heat loss from buildings and particular units.

(g) Various other less serious deficiencies.

[para3] To date, the Condominium Association has incurred significant costs for the investigation, re-design and repair of those deficiencies. Depending upon the manner in which the fire code issues will be remedied, further costs to repair the deficiencies could exceed $3,220,00.00.

[para4] An Action was commenced by the Condominium Association in 1995, originally against the developer, Chris Whelehan Construction Ltd. and Chris Whelehan, of the project, seeking recovery of the costs to investigate, re-design and repair these deficiencies. More recently in 1998, the Action has been amended to include a claim against the engineer, Jacobsen Hage Engineering, and the architects, IBI Group and the IBI Group Architects, engaged on this project.

[para5] The Reserve Fund maintained by the Defendant Condominium Association was depleted soon after discovery of the original foundation waterproofing deficiencies in 1995. Currently, investigations and repairs, (including costs to finance the legal Action against the developers, engineers and architects of the project), have been funded by special assessments levied against the owners of the units in the condominium project. By means of these levies, the Defendant Condominium Association has maintained and repaired the building to date.

[para6] The Plaintiff has defaulted in the payment of such levies imposed.

[para7] Three levies have been imposed against owners of Whelehan Place since the initial discovery of the construction and design deficiencies. Each levy imposed was approximately $75,000.00, which equates to about $1,250.00 per unit in the project for each levy.

[para8] The Defendant Condominium Association currently has no Reserve Fund balance. Its budgeted or anticipated expenses for the operation, maintenance and repair of the building exceeds its income.

II. THE APPLICATION

[para9] The Plaintiff seeks interlocutory injunctive relief as against the Respondent Owners of Condominium Plan 9123697 to pay her present costs of accommodation incurred as a result of her displacement. III. THE PLAINTIFF'S UNIT

[para10] Commencing in about 1993 or 1994, the Defendant Condominium Association began to receive complaints from the Plaintiff that, originally, her unit was contaminated by moulds and mildew and, later, that her unit was contaminated by garage and parkade fumes. Numerous investigations were conducted or commissioned by both the Plaintiff and the Defendant Condominium Association. It has been observed, however, that blackening and staining of walls and carpets have occurred in the Plaintiff's unit.

[para11] As a result of these observations and the demands of the Plaintiff to conduct repairs to her unit, the Defendant Condominium Association agreed to undertake a full scale investigation of her unit in 1997. Further, the Defendant Condominium Association agreed to pay for alternative accommodations of the Plaintiff's choice during the investigation. It commenced paying for such accommodations in December 1996.

[para12] During the investigation of the Plaintiff's unit, the Defendant's engineers report the following problems:

(a) The master bedroom window did not close, thus allowing dirt and outside dust to continuously enter the suite. The window sill of the master bedroom window is at grade level and the infiltration of outside dust was quite evident on the window sill.

(b) The master bedroom window is also located within Building Code minimum distances of a parkade ventilation fan.

(c) The clothes dryer vent had never been connected to the exterior venting system by the Plaintiff, thus allowing dryer lint and dust to vent directly into her unit.

(d) One penetration was found to exist in a corner of the master bedroom through to the parkade level below. This was a pipe penetration which had not been sufficiently caulked by the original contractor. That penetration was sealed by the Defendant's engineers in April 1996. (e) A crack existed in the outside wall of the building in the proximity of the Plaintiff's master bedroom. It is not evident, however, that this has caused the infiltration of outside air into the Plaintiff's unit.

(f) No fire stop system existed in the ceiling space of the Plaintiff's unit. It was subsequently discovered that this was a common deficiency throughout the building.

(g) A door sweep had been installed by the Plaintiff or her representatives on the entrance door to the suite. This prevented the proper circulation of air throughout the suite. The door sweep has been removed.

(h) The Plaintiff did not regularly clean her unit.

[para13] Investigations of the Plaintiff's suite continued for almost one full year. The investigation was allegedly slowed by a number of factors, including the following: (a) the Defendant's representatives were required to investigate numerous complaints and allegations made by the Plaintiff throughout the course of that year regarding the existence and sources of contamination of her unit. None of these allegations have yet to be substantiated;

(b) financial constraints;

(c) discovery of the fire stop issue and the undertaking of studies to determine the means of rectifying this problem; and

(d) discovery of numerous other deficiencies in the building, generally, that had to be repaired in priority to the Plaintiff's unit because of the seriousness of their nature, (including structural deterioration, water leakage, etcetera).

[para14] During the year long investigation of the Plaintiff's unit, it was concluded by the Defendant's engineers that no further blackening of walls or carpet in the suite would occur if:

(a) the master bedroom window was adjusted so that it would fully close;

- (b) the dryer vent was properly connected; and
- (c) the one penetration found in the master bedroom was sealed.

[para15] Upon carrying out of these repairs, studies by the Defendant's engineers have apparently revealed that there is no further blackening or sooting of the carpets or walls of the unit.

[para16] In November 1997, the Defendant proposed a repair and remediation process to the Plaintiff with respect to her unit, which proposal included the following:

- (a) ensuring that there was no unacceptable air infiltration into the unit;
- (b) cleaning and painting the unit and providing an allowance for carpet replacement if the Plaintiff so chose;
- (c) removing or sealing the fireplace at the Plaintiff's option;
- (d) sealing the bedroom window because of its proximity to the parkade vent;
- (e) repairing all damage caused by the investigation; and
- (f) paying for alternative accommodations for the Plaintiff during repairs.

[para17] Also included in the proposal was an offer to have the Plaintiff's representative discuss the repair process with the Defendant's engineers.

[para18] The Defendant's proposal for the repair and remediation of the Plaintiff's unit was refused by the Plaintiff, and the Defendant Condominium Association was directed by the Plaintiff's counsel not to conduct any repairs to the Plaintiff's unit without the Plaintiff's express permission.

[para19] Since it could not conduct any further repairs without the Plaintiff's authorization, and because the Plaintiff refused to agree to a rectification proposal or to advance an alternative proposal of her own in that regard, (to date the Plaintiff has not proposed any repair procedure), on November 20, 1997, the Condominium Association advised the Plaintiff that it would cease paying for alternative accommodations for her effective January 1, 1998.

[para20] On March 11, 1998, Plaintiff's counsel demanded that the Defendant and its representatives cease entering the Plaintiff's unit for any reason other than an emergency.

[para21] On March 28, 1998, a further written offer was made by the Defendant to carry out repairs to the Plaintiff's unit.

[para22] Further, on June 3, 1998, a meeting was scheduled between the Plaintiff's and the Defendant's engineering experts to inspect the Plaintiff's unit and to discuss repair procedures. The meeting did not occur and the Plaintiff has refused to make her expert available for such a meeting since that time.

[para23] Since the Defendant could not conduct any repairs without the Plaintiff's express authorization, and because it was prohibited from entering the Plaintiff's unit, the unit was left in the state that existed at the time the investigation was complete in November 1997. The Defendant states that the suite could have been repaired to a habitable state within two or three weeks of November 1997.

IV. THE PLAINTIFF'S SUBMISSION

[para24] The Plaintiff's condominium suite is in a state of disrepair. As a result, it is not suitable for habitation.

[para25] The Defendant provided the Plaintiff with accommodation while they conducted various tests in her suite for a period of approximately 12 months ending January 1, 1998.

[para26] Since then, the Plaintiff has lived with friends or as at the present time, she is house-sitting. She continues to make her mortgage payments and pay the taxes on her condominium unit but does not have sufficient monthly income to also pay for alternate accommodation.

[para27] The Plaintiff has no place to stay from December 18, 1998 to January 8, 1999. She has made a reservation at Campus Tower, which is where she stayed when the Defendant paid for her accommodation.

[para28] The Plaintiff's psychologist advises [that this prolonged litigation and lack of a home is having a detrimental psychological affect on the Plaintiff.

[para29] The Condominium Corporation has a duty to repair the Plaintiff's condominium suite: s. 30 of the Condominium Property Act.

[para30] The Court has some inherent jurisdiction to supervise and enforce the duties of the Condominium Corporation under the Condominium Property Act, as indicated very generally in s. 60.

[para31] The Court can enjoin a Condominium Corporation to perform its duties: Re Manton and York Condominium Corporation [1984] 49 O.R. (2d) 83 [Ont. County Ct.].

[para32] In the exercise of its duty to inspect and repair, the Condominium Corporation may expend funds available to it to cover expenses, s. 31(1)(a) of the Condominium Property Act.

[para33] Clothed with the authority to enforce the duties of a Condominium Corporation, then the Court has the jurisdiction to direct the manner in which the duty is exercised. It has jurisdiction to enforce compliance with the Rules of Court in the course of litigation so the Court can order that the unit be repaired after both the Plaintiff and the Defendant have had a reasonable opportunity to carry out testing.

[para34] The Condominium Corporation's obligation to pay the displaced owner's cost of accommodation would come to an end after:

- (a) it had completed its investigations; (b) it had provided a reasonable plan of repair;
- (c) both Defendant and Plaintiff have had a reasonable opportunity to conduct tests for defects after reviewing all the results; and
- (d) it was ready, willing and able to perform the repairs.

[para35] The Plaintiff has not unreasonably withheld her consent to the proposed repairs:

(a) Her expert found carbon monoxide levels in the master bedroom of the Plaintiff's unit at readings as high as 34 during peak periods of carbon monoxide emissions in the parkade. The Defendant's test results, provided by Defendant's counsel to Plaintiff's counsel on December 2, 1998 show readings no higher than 11, where 25 is the limit for health and safety. If these are the results that the Plaintiff will rely on at trial, the Plaintiff should be allowed to carry out more extensive gas monitoring studies before the suite is sealed.

(b) The Defendant's offer of repair contained in its solicitor's letter dated March 24, 1998 is not reasonable because it is subject to the condition that the Plaintiff "confirms in writing that it satisfactorily addresses all of her concerns with respect to her suite". Those repairs call for sealing the master bedroom window and the fireplace.

[para36] The first offer of repair presented in the Defendant's solicitor's letter dated November 20th, was conditional upon the Plaintiff signing a full release of all her claims against the Defendant. This offer was repeated by the Defendant in a letter dated March 2, 1998 from the Defendant's solicitor. It, too, was conditional upon the Plaintiff releasing all claims.

[para37] The Plaintiff's expert has indicated that more extensive follow-up studies and investigations of the suite should be carried out (specifically to monitor the air quality over a period of time) if the results and findings of his report were not accepted by the Defendant. V. THE PLAINTIFF'S EVIDENCE

[para38] This Application is brought on the following evidence:

(a) the Plaintiff's psychologist's letter which contains an opinion that is not sworn and who has not been made available for cross-examination;

(b) the Plaintiff's personal statement of her own emotional condition entitled "WHAT IT MEANS TO BE HOMELESS". This letter has never been produced previously in this Action; it, too, has not been the subject of cross-examination, and it is not sworn;

(c) the evidence in the Plaintiff's Affidavit concerning her monthly income and expenses which allege her present impecuniosity, and which has been the subject of Examination for Discovery. However, there are a series of yet to be answered undertakings given by the Plaintiff concerning this evidence.

[para39] The Defendant submits that there are problems with respect to the Plaintiff's evidence concerning her impecuniosity, including:

(i) evidence given at Examination for Discovery revealed that the Plaintiff's net annual income as a teacher, after tax and deductions, was about $40,000.00 per year. This amounts to about $3,300.00 per month, not $2,700.00 per month as set out in paragraph 2 of the Plaintiff's Affidavit;

(ii) paragraph 3 of the Plaintiff's Affidavit refers to a line of credit. In her evidence given at Examinations for Discovery, the Plaintiff indicated that she has been repaying her line of credit and she is not currently drawing on her line of credit (and has not been doing so for some time). Consequently, the line of credit had been drawn on at a time when the Defendant was paying for the Plaintiff's accommodations.

[para40] (d) In terms of the psychological problems allegedly suffered by the Plaintiff, the Defendant submits that the Plaintiff's written submissions, her Affidavit and personal statement fail to mention the following evidence given at Examinations for Discovery:

(i) the Plaintiff suffered from depression and was on medication before moving into Whelehan Place in 1991;

(ii) four deaths of family members and friends occurred over a short period (two by suicide) after the Plaintiff moved into Whelehan Place. These deaths had a profound psychological effect on the Plaintiff;

(iii) since 1995-1996, the Plaintiff has attended psychological counselling for, among other things:

(a) issues with her current partner and her mother;

(b) issues regarding her feelings of abandonment by her former counsel in this Action; (c) issues regarding the length of time this litigation has taken to progress.

VI. NATURE OF THIS APPLICATION

[para41] The Plaintiff appears to suggest that this Application is for injunctive relief. As the matter has not yet gone to trial, the relief sought is obviously interlocutory in nature. The Plaintiff, however, completely fails to address the prerequisites for obtaining interlocutory injunctive relief.

[para42] To be entitled to interlocutory injunctive relief, the Plaintiff must satisfy each element of the tripartite sequential test adopted by the House of Lords in American Cyanamid v. Ethicon [1975] 1 All E.R. 504 (H.L.). The Plaintiff must show:

(a) she has a serious question to be tried;

(b) she would suffer irreparable harm such that no fair and reasonable redress would be available if an interlocutory injunction was not granted; and

(c) the balance of convenience, having regard to all the relevant factors, weighs in favour of granting the injunctive relief.

[para43] Each element of the test must be satisfied before the next is considered. This strict test for injunctive relief is necessary because the Plaintiff in such a case seeks a remedy without proof of its claim: Ominayak et al. v. Norcen Energy Resources et al. (1985), 58 A.R. 161 (Alta. C.A.); Alberta Law Society v. Black et al. (1983), 29 Alta. L.R. (2d) 326 (Alta. C.A.).

[para44] The Court must also be concerned about the ability of the Defendant to recover any loss it suffers if the Plaintiff is unsuccessful at trial and if the injunction sought has been granted. Consequently the Court often requires the posting of security in addition to an undertaking in damages that the Defendant may suffer as a result of the granting of the injunction.

[para45] This is important in this case as the Plaintiff claims that she is impecunious. If the Defendant is required to pay for the Plaintiff's accommodations now, before trial, it may be unable to recover those funds after trial, together with the arrears of condominium fees and special levies of which the Plaintiff has defaulted in payment.

VII. SERIOUS QUESTION TO BE TRIED

[para46] There is no dispute that the Defendant Condominium Association has a responsibility to maintain and repair common areas of the condominium project. The case of Re: Manton, supra, does not stand for the proposition that the Defendant Condominium Association must, however, repair defects that existed at the time the owner acquired its interest in the project. The Condominium Association is not an insurer of building defects for which the developer is responsible: Wright v. Strata Plan No. 205 (1996), 20 BKL R (3d) 343 (SC), affirmed (1998), 43 BKL R (3d) 1 (B.C.C.A.).

[para47] In this case, regardless of whether the alleged defects are the responsibility of the Defendant Condominium Association, there is insufficient evidence that the Defendant failed to fulfil its obligation to repair. The Plaintiff alleges the following obligations on the part of the Defendant in this regard:

(a) Obligation to inspect. There is evidence that extensive investigations were conducted through 1996 and 1997 by the Defendant;

(b) Right to expend funds. It is undisputed that the Defendant Condominium Association has expended funds to inspect and conduct repairs to the Plaintiff's unit and is prepared to finish that work; and

(c) Pay costs of accommodation during repair and inspection. It is undisputed that the Defendant Condominium Association did pay for alternative accommodations while carrying out its investigations and repair and is prepared to do so while completing those repairs.

[para48] One of the reasons why the repairs have not been carried out in the Plaintiff's unit is because the Plaintiff has not authorized repairs or allowed the Defendant to enter the unit to do such work. [para49] Further, there does not appear to be any authority under the Alberta Rules of Court, the Condominium Property Act (Alberta) or any inherent power of the Court to oblige the Defendant to:

(a) provide a written plan of repair to the Plaintiff; and

(b) to pay accommodations while the Plaintiff conducts her own investigation (even though she has now had over six years to do so).

[para50] Consequently, there is no serious question to be tried that the Defendant is obligated to pay for alternative accommodations at a time when the Plaintiff has not allowed or authorized the Defendant to make repairs to her unit.

[para51] Further, there is no authority that an injunction can be imposed requiring a Defendant to pay money to the Plaintiff prior to judgment, which is in effect what the Plaintiff seeks in this Application. It can be argued that what the Plaintiff is effectively seeking is summary judgment. It appears that the requirements of summary judgment do not exist in this case:

(a) there is no evidence that the Plaintiff's claim can be sustained beyond reasonable doubt; and

(b) the Plaintiff has not sworn that she knows of any evidence to support the Defendant's defence of this Action.

VIII. IRREPARABLE HARM

[para52] Further, to justify injunctive relief, the Plaintiff must show that she will suffer harm for which no fair and reasonable redress may be had in a Court of law, and that to refuse the injunction would be a denial of justice. This is a separate and distinct test from the balance of convenience and must be satisfied before the balance of convenience is weighed: Ominayak et al. v. Norcen Energy Resources, supra, p.166.

[para53] The Plaintiff has quantified its potential loss in monetary terms. It has produced an account for the cost of alternative accommodations. If, after trial, it is determined that the Defendant should have paid for alternative accommodations at this time, the Plaintiff will be entitled to judgment for that amount plus interest (or its borrowing costs). It is not irreparable harm for which interlocutory injunctive relief is justified.

[para54] Further, there is no evidence that:

(a) the Plaintiff has no alternative accommodations with friends or family, or;

(b) alternative accommodations cannot be financed through the Plaintiff's line of credit or otherwise; and

(c) the Plaintiff will suffer any loss or damages as a result of staying with friends or family over the course of the Christmas season.

[para55] Consequently, there is insufficient evidence of irreparable harm.

IX. BALANCE OF CONVENIENCE

[para56] The final element of the tripartite test for injunctive relief is the balance of convenience. Considering all factors between the parties, the Plaintiff must show that equity favours granting the relief sought.

[para57] Without security filed by the Plaintiff in support of this request for injunctive relief, the balance of convenience favours not granting the relief sought:

(a) If an injunction is granted on the basis that the Plaintiff cannot afford alternative accommodations, then the Defendant will be unable to recover this payment if it is successful at trial.

(b) However, if an injunction is not granted and the Plaintiff is successful at trial, the costs associated with alternative accommodations can be set off against her liability for condominium fees and special levies.

[para58] Further, any expenses the Defendant incurs in paying for alternative accommodations for the Plaintiff [which may arise partly because of the Plaintiff's failure to authorize repairs], will be paid from proceeds of special levies. These levies have been collected from the owners of units in the project. The Plaintiff, who is in default in this regard, takes the position that since the unit became uninhabitable, she stopped paying her condominium fees and assessments.

[para59] Neither the Defendant, nor its unit owners, can afford to pay for all repairs necessary to rectify the numerous problems with the building. Although the Plaintiff is the only unit owner not able to live in her unit, all the owners are, unfortunately, currently living in unacceptable conditions in one form or another - some with significant leakage, others in units where pipes are freezing, others at risk of structural failures and all at risk of considerable loss and damage due to fire.

[para60] To order the Defendant to re-allocate its limited resources from investigation and repair of other more dangerous conditions to pay for the Plaintiff's alternative accommodations harms all owners in the project. Considering that the Plaintiff may have inadvertently or otherwise brought some of her accommodation problems upon herself, the balance of convenience would suggest that the total consequences of her conduct not be placed on the shoulders of the condominium owners.

[para61] Finally, the Plaintiff is in default of her obligations under the Condominium By-laws to pay condominium fees and special levies. Interim injunctive relief requires the Court to consider equitable principles.

X. CONCLUSION

[para62] The Plaintiff's Application unfortunately must fail on the basis that:

(a) incomplete proper evidence is adduced in support of this Application;

(b) there is no legal basis for the relief sought;

(c) the tripartite test for injunctive relief is not satisfied on the alleged facts of this case; and (d) it appears that the Plaintiff's actions may have contributed to the accommodation problems she is currently experiencing.

Peel Condominium Corporation No. 505 and Peel Condominium Corporation No. 447, applicants, and Cam-Valley Homes Limited, Cam-Valley Developments Ltd. and David Feldman, respondents

Court File No. 99-CV-166553

Ontario Superior Court of Justice Epstein J. Heard: June 10, 1999. Judgment: October 29, 1999.

Counsel: P.M. Conway and Jennifer A. Roberts-Logan, for the applicants. C.P. Stevenson, for the respondents. [para1] EPSTEIN J.:-- This application raises interesting issues concerning contractual obligations and disclosure in the context of condominium development. Notwithstanding the efforts that have gone into the extensive and detailed consumer protection legislation that governs the purchase and sale of condominiums, there continues to be an abundance of cases before the courts in which the parties require assistance as to the nature of the obligations arising out of the transaction. This is one such case.

[para2] The application was originally brought by Peel Condominium Corporation No. 505 (PCC 505) for various forms of relief pertaining to a parcel of land (the "Lands"). At the opening of the hearing, I granted an order, on consent, whereby another condominium corporation, Peel Condominium Corporation No. 447 (PCC 447) was joined as an applicant. The addition of PCC 447 was initially resisted by the respondents but when presented with the various options that might appropriately be attached to an order permitting the proposed amendment, Mr. Stevenson, counsel for the respondents, agreed to the joinder. The respondents' consent to an order adding PCC 447 as an additional applicant was on the undertaking of Ms. Conway, counsel for the applicants, that the hearing would proceed based on the material then in the record. On this basis, the application was argued before me followed by written submissions throughout the summer.

[para3] The applicants are seeking an order, purportedly, that will give them some interest in or control over the Lands. There is also a counter-application for an order discharging the caution that PCC 505 and PCC 489 registered against the Lands on April 24, 1997. As well, the respondent David Feldman, a principal of the two corporate respondents, has brought a motion dismissing the application to the extent that it applies to him personally.

[para4] As will be seen from observations made later in these Reasons, the precise nature of the relief sought is of some considerable importance. The Notice of Application sets out the relief claimed as follows:

(a) A declaration that Cam-Valley Homes holds title to the property described as Parcel Block II-1, Section M-199, Plan 43R-21858, Part 8 (the "Outdoor Recreation Area") in trust for Peel Condominium Corporation no. 505 ("PCC 505"), Peel Condominium Corporation no. 447 ("PCC 447") and Peel Condominium Corporation no. 489 ("PCC 489").

(b) An order requiring the respondent, Cam-Valley Homes Limited ("Cam-Valley Homes"), to convey all right and title to the Outdoor Recreation Area, or one acre thereof, to PCC 505, or alternatively jointly to PCC 505, PCC 447 and PCC 489.

(c) An order that the respondent, Cam-Valley Homes pay the applicant in lieu of constructing the promised facilities in the Outdoor Recreation Area, the cost of constructing such facilities; or, in the alternative, the same or a greater amount to be determined as damages for the destruction of the trees and foliage on the Outdoor Recreation Area; and, if required, a reference to determine same.

(d) Punitive or exemplary damages in the sum of $100,000.00.

(e) If necessary, an interim injunction prohibiting the respondents, their officers, directors, employees, agents, affiliated or successor corporations or assigns from conveying, assigning, alienating, or taking any further steps to alter or effect the landscape or the foliage on the Outdoor Recreation Area until the final judgment in this application.

(f) In the further alternative, a declaration that PCC 505 is entitled to damages against Cam-Valley for breach of disclosure statement pursuant of section 53(5) of the Condominium Act and a reference to determine the same.

[para5] It was more or less common ground that the relief claimed in paragraphs 1(c) and 1(f) would not be dealt with in the course of the hearing before me. Those paragraphs contain claims that are more properly addressed in a hearing dealing with a right to damages pursuant to s. 52(5) of the Condominium Act R.S.O. 1990, c. C-26 (the "Act").

THE FACTS

[para6] The facts relevant to the one issue before me are not in dispute.

[para7] The applicants are two condominium corporations that form part of a multi-phase condominium development planned and constructed by the respondents in an area just west of Toronto known as Sawmill Valley. The respondent Cam-Valley Homes Limited ("Cam-Valley Homes") is the developer and holds title to the Lands. The other corporate respondent Cam-Valley Developments Ltd. ("Cam-Valley Developments") was the developer before transferring title to the Lands, and other property associated with the development (collectively the "Property"), to Cam-Valley Homes on June 29, 1993. In these Reasons I will also refer to these respondents either as the Developer or the Declarant, more or less interchangeably.

[para8] Planning for the overall development started in the late 1980's. Cam-Valley Developments proposed to develop a series of condominiums in different phases around a wooded valley. The concept was that each phase would be created as an independent condominium corporation with a different style and a different density but when the development was completed a unique urban community with a rural atmosphere would be formed. [para9] It is clear that the overall project was conceptualized and marketed as a woodland community. It was originally intended by the Developer that the centre of this unique community would be a recreation complex. This complex was to be nestled among a grove of trees on the Lands and contain facilities for tennis, golf and other forms of leisure activity (the "Outdoor Recreation Area"). The plan was that ultimately each of the condominium corporations would have an interest in, the use of and be responsible for the Outdoor Recreation Area.

[para10] This intention with respect to the Outdoor Recreation Area is evidenced by the documentation forming the basis of the agreements between the parties with respect to the first three phases of the development; namely, PCC 447, PCC 489 and PCC

505. These documents also contain terms that provide for the conveyance of the Lands to the participating condominium corporations upon completion of the Outdoor Recreation Area. Other documents such as the site plan for PCC 505 filed by the Developer with the City of Mississauga make reference to the Outdoor Recreation Area.

[para11] There is also no doubt that the Developer, in its marketing of the individual units, represented to the purchasers of at least PCC 505 that their homes would be part of a development with a limited density in an attractive wooded area the centre of which would be the Outdoor Recreation Area. There is uncontroverted evidence that some purchasers relied upon the Developer's representations as to the overall nature of the development and the use of the Lands for the Outdoor Recreation Area in making their decision to purchase. Indeed, there is evidence to support a finding that in one case the purchaser paid more for a unit because it overlooked the Lands and the proposed Outdoor Recreation Area.

[para12] The first phase completed was a 164 dwelling building registered as PCC 447. It was registered October 3, 1991. At that point Cam-Valley Developments transferred the project and title to the Property, including the Lands, to Cam-Valley Homes and the concept changed direction. Instead of more towers, Cam-Valley Homes built townhouse units. The next phase that was completed was PCC 489, which was registered May 22, 1994. It is comprised of 24 townhouses. The third phase, PCC 505, which was registered October 3, 1995, added another 56 townhouses to the development. Another townhouse project of approximately 38 townhouse units is apparently under construction. Cam-Valley Homes has obtained approval for and intends to build a second tower comprised of 134 units. It has also announced, and this is the matter of concern to the applicants, that it intends to build another townhouse project of approximately 25 units on the Lands. There is really no dispute over the obvious fact that the changes that have taken place and that are proposed for the development are almost exclusively market driven.

[para13] In the result the project that was originally intended to be approximately 670 units built in five phases changed to involve about 440 units to be constructed in six phases. The sixth phase is the 25 unit townhouse development that Cam-Valley Homes plans to build on the Lands. The consequences of this sixth phase would be more extensive use of the Property and the loss of most, if not all, of the recreational and social core of the development in the form of the Outdoor Recreation Area. I say "most, if not all" as the Developer has offered to appease the applicants by constructing a significantly scaled down recreational facility on the Lands. However, there can be no doubt that the sixth phase would alter the character of the community. There would be changes such as in the number and location of buildings and in road and traffic patterns. Most significantly, there would be a loss of a very strategic segment of open space.

[para14] For reasons that will later become clear I note that the third phase originally planned, a condominium tower referred to as the Terraced Apartments contemplated in the September 18, 1987 disclosure statement (for what ultimately became PCC 447), was not built. It is common ground that the Developer was under no obligation to build the Terraced Apartments. It was agreed between the parties that the Terraced Apartments concept was abandoned as a result of the planning difficulties arising from an arborist's report that the trees on the lands designated for the Terraced Apartments were of high quality and due to the downturn in the economy in about 1989.

[para15] In 1996 in the course of the steps taken by the Developer to restructure the project in response to market forces, Mr. Feldman advised a meeting of directors of PCC 505 that the Developer's intention with respect to the Lands had changed. Rather than construct the recreation facility described in the disclosure statement, Cam-Valley Homes would instead build an additional 25 townhouse units on the Lands. In 1997 Mr. Feldman started to prepare plans to build on the Lands. PCC 505 promptly objected and attempted to preserve its rights with respect to the Lands by meeting with representatives of the City of Mississauga. In April of that year a Caution was registered against title to the Lands. Discussions proceeded as to how the matter with respect to the use of the Lands might be resolved. Then, early in 1999, PCC 505 received notice that Mr. Feldman was preparing a list of potential purchasers for the townhouse development proposed for the Lands. Further discussions took place between the parties during which the status quo was preserved pending a possible resolution of the dispute concerning the Lands. Then, without any meaningful notice, on March 25, 1999 Mr. Feldman gave instructions to remove the trees from the Lands. The next day the forest on the Lands was razed pursuant to these instructions.

[para16] PCC 505 immediately commenced this proceeding and obtained an injunction on the evening of March 26, 1999. The injunction included a term that pending the return of the application the respondents would be restrained from altering or changing the Lands in any way. Unfortunately, it was too late to save the trees.

THE DOCUMENTATION

[para17] While these facts provide insight into the background giving rise to this application, the argument focused on the wording and meaning of and the interrelationship among the various documents in which the agreements of the parties were recorded.

[para18] The documents that are pivotal to the determination of the issues in the hearing are those typical of most condominium purchases; namely, the disclosure statement, the declaration and the individual agreements of purchase and sale relevant to the sale of each condominium to the ultimate purchasers. In this case a further contract, referred to as a reciprocal agreement, was prepared to record part of the transaction specifically relating to the intended community participation in and responsibility for the Outdoor Recreation Area and other shared facilities.

[para19] It is helpful to start with the documents that are basic to every condominium purchase and sale transaction in the Province of Ontario.

[para20] When a purchaser is interested in a condominium that has not yet been constructed he or she is entitled, under the Act, to receive a disclosure package. The package consists of a number of documents including a disclosure statement. This statement contains such things as a description of the project, a budget for the condominium for the first year and a brief description of the significant features of the proposed declaration, by-laws and rules for the condominium. Upon registration these documents, i.e. the declaration, by-laws and rules and budget statement will govern the operation of the condominium corporation. The declaration may be described as the corporation's constitution and addresses such issues as the percentages of contributions to common expenses and what those common expenses are and restrictions on use and occupancy of units. The final document that is part of every transaction is the agreement of purchase and sale.

[para21] In the case of the applicants the relevant provisions of the disclosure statements, the declarations, the reciprocal agreement and the agreements of purchase and sale are set out below with emphasis added, where appropriate.

[para22] The relevant portions of the disclosure statement for PCC 505 are:

Section 1 - Description of the Buildings and Units

The Declarant also owns the lands adjacent to the Phase IV Lands ("Additional Property") and currently proposes to register pursuant to the Condominium Act on part of the Additional Property, up to three (3) more Condominium Corporations ... Each of the Proposed Corporations will be given a proportional interest (based on the number of dwelling units in each Corporation) as tenants in common in the Outdoor Recreation Area to be constructed on Part Block H, Plan M-99, as outlined in this Disclosure Statement and will be required to share certain common elements of the Proposed Corporations as set out herein. The outdoor recreation area may be created as a unit or units in any of the Proposed Corporations, or may be retained in fee simple ownership. Ownership of the units created, or the fee as the case may be, will be transferred to the Proposed Corporations. In order to provide for sharing the cost associated with operating the outdoor recreation area, the Declarant proposes to have the Corporation enter into an agreement (the "Reciprocal Agreement") with the Phase 1 Corporation [PCC 447] and the Declarant. Upon registration of the Proposed Corporations the Declarant proposes to have those Corporations adopt the Reciprocal Agreement as original signatories. Upon the Reciprocal Agreement being adopted by all Proposed Corporations the Declarant will be released and forever discharged from any further obligations thereunder to the extent that the obligations were taken over by any of the Proposed Corporations. Each Corporation will pay a share of the cost to maintain and operate the outdoor recreation area.

It is anticipated that this Corporation and the Proposed Corporations may jointly operate the outdoor recreation area. The outdoor recreation area may contain four (4) tennis courts, an outdoor pool, and a putting green, which will be set up as units in the proposed Corporation and may not be constructed until the last Phase is constructed, but the final configuration of the Outdoor Recreation Area, if and when constructed, may vary from that contemplated herein.

Section 2 - Amenities

3. The following facilities may be created as units in the Proposed Corporations and may not be available until after construction of the last Phase and then on a shared basis in the outdoor recreation area (to be shared by all of the Proposed Corporations as herein set out):

- (a) outdoor pool
- (b) four (4) tennis courts
- (c) three (3) hole putting green

Each of the Proposed Corporations will own its proportional interest as tenants in common in the outdoor recreation area or the unit(s) created thereon. The transfer of ownership in the outdoor recreation area may not be completed until all of the Proposed Corporations are registered. The costs of operating the outdoor recreation area will be shared only by those buildings that are occupied.

The following are anticipated commencement and completion dates of the Outdoor Recreation Area amenities which will commence only with the last Phase: COMMENCEMENT DATE is January 1, 1994 and the COMPLETION DATE is December 31, 1994.

Section 3 - The Declaration

n) Reciprocal Agreement

The Corporation is required to enter into the Reciprocal Agreement summarized in By-Law No. 2 as described in Section 5 of this Introductory Disclosure Statement.

Section 5 - By-Law No. 2: Reciprocal Agreement

By-law No. 2 [the Reciprocal Agreement] is required to be passed by the Corporation in order to ratify and confirm the terms, provisions and execution of an easement and cost-sharing agreement (the "Reciprocal Agreement") to be entered into between the Condominium Corporation registered as Phase IV of Granite Gates and the Declarant (with the Declarant entering into the Reciprocal Agreement on behalf of itself and its successors and assigns, namely any of the Adjacent Corporations, which are not registered. The Reciprocal Agreement will provide, inter alia, the following:

ii) It provides for the sharing of the outdoor recreation area and other shared services and establishes a cost sharing formula among the Proposed Corporations based upon the number of units in each of the Proposed Corporation's relative to the cost of operating, maintaining, repairing, replacing and inspecting the outdoor recreation area and any mutually shared servicing systems which service the Proposed Corporation.

[para23] The relevant provisions of the declaration are as follows:

Article 1

(1) Definitions ...

(a) "Common Facilities" means facilities being shared by the Proposed Corporation as set out in the Reciprocal Agreement.

(f) "Outdoor Recreation Area" means the outdoor pool and tennis courts, putting green and all appurtenant structures, works and lands.

Article VII - Duties of the Corporation

(d) to accept a conveyance from the Declarant of its share of any Common Facilities from time to time, to the Corporation ...

(f) to accept a conveyance of an individued [sic] interest in the Outdoor Recreation Area tendered to it by the Declarant, as a tenant in common with the adjacent corporations.

[para24] The relevant provisions of the reciprocal agreement are as follows:

... and whereas Cam-Valley intends to but is under no obligation to develop and construct high-rise and/or townhome buildings upon each of the Future Phase Lands and to register them as one or more condominium corporations (hereinafter referred to as the "Adjacent Corporations") and in the event of the development, construction and registration of the condominium plans on the Cam-Valley Lands, Cam-Valley will cause the Adjacent Corporations to enter into and be bound by the terms of this Agreement. [Preamble, page 2, second paragraph).

ARTICLE I - DEFINITIONS

(e) "Common Facilities" shall mean those services, chattles [sic] , equipment and facilities being shared by the Proposed Corporations as set out in Article 4.00 herein and more particularly, without limitation, the Outdoor Recreation Area, the Outdoor Road Network and the Mutual Easements.

(m) "Outdoor Recreation Area" shall mean the recreation area constructed on Part of Parcel Block II-1, Section M-199, in the City of Mississauga.

(s) "Proposed Corporations" means the Phase 1 Corporation [PCC 447] and the Future Phase Corporations and their respective successors and assigns, but until such time as all of the Corporations are registered it shall also include Cam-Valley with respect to any unregistered corporations ...

ARTICLE 2.00 - RECITALS

2.01 The recitals hereinbefore set forth are true in substance and in fact.

ARTICLE 4.00 - COMMON FACILITIES

4.01 The parties hereto hereby agree that the facilities and amenities listed herein (the "Common Facilities") shall be operated, maintained, repaired, improved, altered and replaced by the corporation owning such Facilities on behalf of all of the Proposed Corporations as if the Proposed Corporations were really one Corporation and the facilities were common elements belonging to the one corporation"

(a) Gateway Entrance;

(b) Shared Common Element Areas;

(c) Outdoor Road Network;

(d) Outdoor Recreation Area;

4.02 The parties hereby acknowledge that ownership in the Outdoor Recreation Area and Gateway Entrance, will be transferred to each of the Proposed Corporations as tenants in common in accordance with their Proportionate Share. Cam-valley agrees (to the extent that it is able) to have each of the Proposed corporations, when registered, accept a conveyance of such units. In the event that Cam-Valley does not proceed with the construction and registration of all Proposed Corporations, the transfer of those units which are constructed will be made to the registered corporations in accordance with their Adjusted Proportional Share. The transfer will be made at such time that all Proposed Corporations are registered or at such time as Cam-Valley determines that it will not proceed with the development of further corporations.

4.03 In the event that Cam-Valley does not proceed with the construction and registration of all Proposed Corporations or does not construct any of the Common Facilities contemplated herein, then this Agreement shall be deemed to be amended to delete references herein to any Common Facilities not constructed and Cam-Valley shall be under no obligation to construct or create same or [sic] shall Cam-Valley suffer any liability with respect thereto.

4.06 The Block OO Corporation [what is now PCC 489] shall be entitled, at its option to be exercised within one (1) year after registration of the Block OO Corporation (or Cam-Valley's option on its behalf) to use and enjoyment of the Outdoor Recreation Area. If so, then the Block OO Corporation shall become a tenant in common of the Outdoor Recreation Area along with the other Proposed Corporations and the Proportional Share for the Outdoor Recreation Area shall be adjusted to take into account the number of dwelling units in the Block OO Corporation.

[para25] The agreements of purchase and sale entered into between Cam-Valley Homes and the purchasers provide as follows:

"2. Paragraphs 1-52 the acknowledgment and schedules ... F attached hereto form part of and are an integral part of the agreement.

3.(a) 'Lands' means that certain parcel or tracts of land and premises in the City of Mississauga ... described as Part of Block HH and II registered Plan M-199, Mississauga.

5.(b) 'Condominium' means the lands and buildings constructed or to be constructed by the vendor and registered as a condominium on part of the lands.

23. The Purchaser covenants and agrees not to register or permit to be registered this Agreement or an assignment or a transfer thereof, or a caution, Purchaser's lien, or certificate of pending litigation or any encumbrance whatsoever against title to the Lands or the Unit. In the event the Vendor is required to pay any money to remove such title encumbrance or registration the Purchaser shall reimburse the Vendor for such money together with interest at 24% per year and legal fees on a solicitor and his own client basis.

38. ... 'It is agreed that there is no representation or warranty otherwise as expressly herein in writing.'

Schedule "F" - Phased Developments

The Purchaser acknowledges that the Vendor and/or its successors and assigns and/or any related companies may in the future construct another building or buildings on parts of the Lands [defined as part of block HH and II, Registered Plan M-199, City of Mississauga] and the Purchaser agrees not to object to such construction nor deem such construction as an inconvenience or nuisance, or make a claim for damages or injuries or otherwise. The Purchaser hereby consents to any re-zoning required for the Lands in order for the Vendor to proceed with its future plans and hereby agrees not to object to any re-zoning and committee of Adjustment applications brought by the Vendor.

[para26] The declaration concerning PCC 447 is slightly different. The relevant provisions are as follows:

"Recreation Complex" means the outdoor recreation area to be constructed on Part of Parcel Block II-1, Section M-199, in the City of Mississauga.

ARTICLE VII - DUTIES OF THE CORPORATION

(d) to accept a conveyance from the Declarant of its share of those Common Facilities which are units and any Parking Units that the Declarant desires to convey, without consideration, from time to time, to the Corporation (whether created as units in this Corporation or in any of the Proposed Corporations) and to register the same in the Land Registry Office for the Land Titles Division of Peel (No. 43);

(e) to accept a conveyance of an undivided interest in the Recreation Complex in the proportion tendered to it by the Declaration, as a tenant in common with the Proposed Corporations.

Section 2 - Recreational and Other Amenities

The following proposed recreational and other amenities will be contained in the building and will be for the use and enjoyment of members of the Corporation and their tenants, guests and invitees. The costs of operating the facilities will be included in the common expenses of each unit owner. The use and operation of such amenities shall be subject to the rules and regulations passed by the Board of Directors from time to time. Members of the Proposed Corporation will not be required to make any payments for the use of these facilities other than their regular common expenses payments or other payments as the Board of Directors may determine. Each of the Proposed Corporations will own its proportional interest as tenants in common in the outdoor recreation area. The transfer of ownership in the outdoor recreation area may not be completed until all of the Contemplated Corporations are registered. The Declarant will only build the outdoor recreation area when it builds the Terraced Apartments. Accordingly, if the Terraced Apartments are never constructed, the outdoor recreation area may never be constructed. The costs of operating the outdoor recreation area will be shared only by those buildings that are occupied.

If Terraced Apartments are not built then the Outdoor Recreation Area may not be completed.

THE ARGUMENT

[para27] Against this background, counsel for the applicants contends that the Developer is in breach of a number of its obligations set out in the relevant documents, particularly the reciprocal agreement, is in breach of its fiduciary obligations to the applicants and is in breach of trust.

[para28] Under the terms of the reciprocal agreement the Developer had an obligation to require all phases of the overall development to participate in the agreement. In breach of this obligation, the draft condominium documents for the two most recent phases, the townhouse development being built and the high-rise, do not contain any reference to the Outdoor Recreation Area or to the reciprocal agreement at all. On cross-examination Mr. Firestone a representative of the Developer admitted that the purchasers of the units of these most recent developments were not told of the Outdoor Recreation Area due to the fact that the composition of the overall development changed considerably after PCC 505 was marketed. Counsel for the applicants also argues that the disclosure statement, declaration and reciprocal agreement relevant to the earlier phases of the development clearly describe the Outdoor Recreation Area as part of the common facilities of PCC 505 and PCC 447 and that as such the Developer has a contractual obligation to provide them. While the obligations of the Developer in terms of the Outdoor Recreation Area may have been somewhat qualified, there was no qualification to its obligation to convey the Lands.

[para29] The applicants also submit that once the Developer began to sell units in the development, it committed itself to the character of the project. As such it placed itself in a fiduciary relationship to the unit purchasers not only with respect to their units but also to the interests appurtenant to those units.

[para30] Further, when the Developer issued its disclosure statement providing for an Outdoor Recreation Area (albeit with uncertain facilities) it committed itself to holding the Lands in trust for the unit purchasers present and prospective, and for the condominium corporations. It follows that the respondents cannot now avoid their obligations by their own decision, motivated by economic reasons, to alter the plan of the development.

[para31] In contrast to the applicants' reliance on the original intention of the parties in relation to the use of the Lands, the respondents' position is anchored by the precise wording of the documents that record the agreements of the parties. It is fundamental to the respondents' argument that while there originally was an intention to build an Outdoor Recreation Area on the Lands, that intention, according to the documents, was always subject to change. It is clear, counsel for the respondents contends, that the Developer was free to change the composition of the project as it saw fit and that, depending on the nature of the changes, an Outdoor Recreation Area may never be built. The documents also state unequivocally that only if the Outdoor Recreation Area is built is the Developer obligated to convey the Lands to the applicants.

[para32] For example, in the February 1993 disclosure statement, the Developer sets out that an Outdoor Recreation Area would be constructed on the Lands and that the area "may contain" certain amenities that "may not be constructed until the last phase [of the development was] constructed but that the Outdoor Recreation Area, "if and when constructed", may vary from that contemplated in the disclosure statement. Counsel also points out to the fact that the disclosure statement made reference to and attached the reciprocal agreement that contains a specific term to the effect that in the event that the Developer did not proceed with the construction and registration of all proposed corporations or common facilities, then the agreement would be deemed to be amended accordingly with no liability on the part of the Developer. Counsel relies as well on that part of the declaration to the effect that while PCC 505 is obliged to accept a conveyance from the Developer of its share of the common facilities and to accept a conveyance of an undivided interest in the Outdoor Recreation Area tendered to it by the Developer as a tenant in common with the adjacent corporations, there is no corresponding provision requiring the Developer to convey the Lands if the Outdoor Recreation Area is not built.

[para33] From the point of view of the respondents the only reasonable interpretation of the condominium documents is that if an outdoor recreation facility were ever constructed on all or part of the Lands then that part of the Lands would be transferred to the participating condominium corporations pro rata according to their proportionate shares. However, the disclosure statement and the reciprocal agreement make it clear that the Developer has no obligation to build an outdoor recreation centre of any sort. Only if a complex of that nature were to be constructed would it form any part of the common facilities.

THE ANALYSIS

[para34] At this juncture it is helpful to return to the nature of the relief claimed. Understanding exactly what the applicants are trying to achieve is of considerable importance not only to the determination of the appropriate relief but also in assessing whether the applicants are entitled to any relief at all in terms of what is in issue in this Application. While the focus of the applicants' argument has been the purchasers' reliance on their having the use of and an interest in a recreation facility, I am not convinced that a recreation facility is what the applicants are after. The Notice of Application contains no request for specific performance of the construction of the Outdoor Recreation Area. Such a suggestion was first raised in written argument submitted approximately a month after the hearing. It appeared to be somewhat of an afterthought in response to a question I posed about what the applicants were trying to achieve. There is also an underlying threat of a claim for damages based on misrepresentation of what it was that the purchasers were buying. However, from everything before me, in writing and in terms of the oral argument, it would appear that the real intention of the applicants is to prevent the Developer from building a further residential phase of the project on the Lands. While such is not clearly set out in the materials I do note that an interim injunction was sought in the Notice of Application and that the factum filed on behalf of the applicants contains a section in which a "continuing injunction" to prevent any further changes to the Lands is requested.

[para35] Identifying the objective of the applicants in this fashion leads me directly to my analysis of whether the applicants are entitled to relief in terms of the question before me. That is, what is to happen to the Lands. This requires reconciling the representation and reliance based case presented by the applicants with the literal reading of the documents based case presented by counsel for the respondents.

[para36] The analysis must start with and focus on identifying the common intention of the parties with respect to the use of the Lands.

[para37] In this regard I must agree with counsel for the respondents that the relevant documents contain terms to the effect that the Developer is under no obligation to construct an Outdoor Recreation Area of any nature on the Lands. While I find the wording of the contractual documentation to be confusing, to say the least, the repeated references to the uncertainty surrounding the construction of the Outdoor Recreation Area are sufficient to alert a prospective purchaser to the possibility that the development may include a recreational centre scaled down from that originally contemplated or may not contain such a facility at all. In fact, not only is the suggestion that the Developer promised an Outdoor Recreation Area contrary to the express provisions in the disclosure statements and reciprocal agreements but also to the applicants' own witnesses as they testified that they understood that the Outdoor Recreation Area might never be built.

[para38] In these Reasons I have referred to wording in the PCC 447 disclosure statement to the effect that the outdoor recreation facility would not be built until the Terraced Apartments were constructed. I have also indicated that the Developer was free to change the components of the development and certainly was free to decide not to build the Terraced Apartments. The fact that the Terraced Apartments were not built and that the disclosure statement of PCC 447 contains the wording it does serves as further evidence in support of my finding that a reasonable purchaser knew or ought to have known that there was a possibility there might never be a recreation centre on the Lands.

[para39] The documents, if read with care, also contain, provisions to the effect that only if the Outdoor Recreation Area is built would the Developer have to convey the Lands to the participating condominium corporations.

[para40] The applicants attempt to counter the logical conclusion based on this wording (that they are not entitled to a conveyance of the Lands) by relying on the principles set out in Middlesex Condominium Corporation No. 87 v. 600 Talbot Street London Ltd. (1998), 37 O.R. (3d) 22 (C.A.). In that case the issue before the court focused on the obligations of the developer to provide a superintendent's suite as part of the common elements of the condominium corporation. The disclosure statement contained a general description of the proposed property that included a two bedroom dwelling unit set aside for use by a superintendent. This description and the budget required under s. 52(6) of the Act were both consistent with a finding that the superintendent's suite was a common element. The corporation sued for a declaration that the unit being used by the superintendent was a part of the common elements and for a mandatory order requiring it to be conveyed to the corporation. It also sued for damages under s. 52(5) of the Act. The trial judge made a strong finding that the documents demonstrated an original intention that the superintendent's unit would be one of the common elements of the corporation. He dismissed the claim for damages due to the corporation's inability to prove reliance and did not deal with the alternate form of relief claimed being that of a conveyance.

[para41] The Court of Appeal held that the corporation was entitled to the conveyance of the unit based on the fact that the Act provides specific remedies with respect to false and misleading disclosure. Mr. Justice Rosenberg, in writing for the Court, observed that earlier decisions of the Court of Appeal had made it clear that with respect to common elements "the Declarant is bound not to prefer its interests over those of the group of unit owners. Where the reasonable interpretation of the evidence is that, notwithstanding the registered title, the Declarant intended a reasonable purchaser to believe or to justifiably assume that [something was to be] a common element or an asset of the corporation, the Declarant will be required to convey [it] to the corporation."

[para42] Counsel for the applicants argues that in the case at bar the relevant disclosure statements, the reciprocal agreements and the declarations clearly describe the Outdoor Recreation Area as part of the common facilities of the development and that reasonable purchasers would justifiably assume that the centre would be built and that the Lands would be conveyed. As such, following the lead of the Ontario Court of Appeal in Middlesex, the Declarant should be required to do just that.

[para43] The problem with this argument rests with my finding as to what the documents provide in terms of any obligation the Developer may have in relation to the Outdoor Recreation Area. Whereas in Middlesex the trial judge made a "strong finding" that there was an original intention that the asset in question would be one of the common elements, I am not in a position to make such a finding in relation to the Outdoor Recreation Area. I agree with the submission of counsel for the respondents that the documents contain terms that reserve to the Developer the right not to build an Outdoor Recreation Area at all. The purchasers and their counsel knew or ought to have known of this reservation, given the number of times that the possibility of their never being an Outdoor Recreation Area is referred to in the documentation. I repeat my finding that the documents further provide that only if the Outdoor Recreation Area were to be constructed would the Developer have any obligation to convey the Lands. It follows that the principles set out in the Middlesex case do not assist the applicants in their attempts to obtain an interest in the Lands.

[para44] The fiduciary argument as advanced by the applicants is similarly flawed. The authority relied upon of York Condominium Corp. No. 167 v. Newry Holdings Ltd. et al. (1981), 32 O.R. (2d) 458 also involved a superintendent's suite. The Court of Appeal found that the evidence was sufficient to support a finding that there was a common intention that the suite would form part of the common elements of the corporation and that a prospective purchaser would be justified in assuming that the suite would be one of the common elements. The Court felt justified in overcoming the potential problems created by the actual registered title and ordered a conveyance of the suite to the corporation.

[para45] What is of particular interest is that in Newry Wilson J.A. described the position of a developer, once sales of units started to take place, as follows:

I think he has ... placed himself in a fiduciary relationship to the unit purchasers not only with respect to their units but also with respect to the interests appurtenant thereto. He therefore holds the property in trust for the unit purchasers, present and prospective, and for the condominium corporation which will come into being upon registration of the declaration. I believe he is under a duty to protect the interests of all unit owners present and prospective and cannot put his own interests in conflict with theirs even although he himself continues to be an owner as long as any units remain unsold.

[para46] While the Middlesex and Newry cases stand for the proposition that a declarant is bound not to prefer its interests over those of the group of unit owners, the Court of Appeal has made it clear that the starting point must be a finding as to the reasonable intentions of the parties based on the evidence.

[para47] I have found that the evidence in this case does not support a finding that the Declarant intended that the purchasers believe the Outdoor Recreation Area was to be built and that the Lands would be conveyed and that a reasonable purchaser would assume that such would be the case.

[para48] However, that finding does not extinguish the rights of the applicants. With two exceptions, to which I will refer later in these Reasons, I find that the various documents do not contain any terms under which the Developer reserves to itself the right to build on the Lands if it abandons its plans to build an Outdoor Recreation Area. The documents merely say that the Outdoor Recreation Area may not be built and that such is contingent on the development of the entire project. They give the Developer the option of not building a recreation facility and therefore of not having to convey the Lands to the participating corporations. However, I do not see how the wording of the documents permits the Developer to deny that the owners, present and prospective, have some interest in the Lands. The clause that automatically amends the documents in the event that the Developer decides to change the nature of the project justifies the Developer in saying that it does not have to build, but not that it can appropriate the Lands for itself. In short, I find that the Developer intended that the purchasers believe that the Lands would not be used for residential development and that a reasonable purchaser would assume that the Lands, if not used for a recreational facility, would not be otherwise developed.

[para49] The exceptions to which reference is made in the previous paragraph are as follows. In schedule "F" of the various agreements of purchase and sale pursuant to which the individual units were sold to the ultimate purchasers, the purchaser acknowledges that the vendor may in the future construct another building on parts of the Property and the purchaser agrees not to object to such construction. As well the purchaser consents to any re-zoning necessary for the vendor to proceed with its future plans. As it turns out the definition section of the agreements of purchase and sale includes a legal description from which an astute purchaser, may have ascertained that the area referred to in this schedule included the Lands. In addition there was a provision in the disclosure statement to the effect that certain other parts of the Property may be used for the development of condominium complexes. If examined closely, the clause would suggest that the Lands might be used for further residential development.

[para50] The question to be answered is whether the clause in schedule "F" of the agreement of purchase and sale and that contained in the disclosure statement are sufficient to reserve to the Developer the right to build a further residential phase of the project on the Lands. Can these two provisions defeat the applicants' reasonable reliance on the bulk of the evidence that supports a finding that the Developer did not reserve to itself the right to appropriate the Lands? For the following reasons I find that the answer to this question is, no.

[para51] First, the provisions of the contractual documentation concerning the possible use of the Lands that if the Lands were developed at all they would be used for a recreation facility and the clause in schedule "F" of the agreement of purchase and sale together with that in the disclosure statement, are capable of reconciliation. These latter clauses make reference to the possibility that the Developer may, in the future, construct another building or buildings on parts of the Property. It seems to me that they could be interpreted as referring to those parts already identified by the Developer as intended for residential development.

[para52] At the very least the clauses are worded in an ambiguous fashion. Consistent with the consumer protection aspect of the Act, and the fact that it is the Developer who drafted the documentation, it is reasonable to interpret any ambiguity in the documents against the Developer. See: Wellington Condominium Corporation No. 61 and Marilyn Drive Holdings Limited (1998), 37 O.R. (3d) 1 (Ont. C.A.). I find the words of Abella J.A. particularly compelling in her dissenting decision in the case of Arthur Andersen Inc. v. Toronto-Dominion Bank (1994), 17 O.R. (3d) 363. Justice Abella dissented with respect to the application of contra preferentum but not as to its meaning. She described the contra preferentum rule as being "meant to relieve the non-authorial Party to a contract from an interpretation that party could not clearly discern from a plain reading of the document. This prevents the party who did draft and understand the contract from springing a hidden contractual burden on an unsuspecting signator": Anson's Law of Contract, 25th ed. (1979), at p. 151; Fridman, The Law of Contract in Canada, 2nd ed. (1986), at pp. 445-46; Consolidated Bathurst Export Ltd. v. Mutual Boiler & Machinery Insurance Co. [1980] 1 S.C.R. 888, 112 D.L.R. (3d) 49.

[para53] Based on this analysis I find that the wording of the condominium documentation supports a finding that the Developer never intended a reasonable purchaser to conclude that it planned to develop the Lands for use other than as a recreation facility.,

[para54] Another way of coming to the same conclusion would be to find that the clause in Schedule "F" of the agreement of purchase and sale and in the disclosure statement are repugnant to the clear intention that the Developer intended to use the Lands, if at all, for a recreation area. In that case the court is entitled and indeed obliged to reject the inconsistent portions of the documents as being repugnant to the very nature of the transaction the parties entered into. Where different parts of an instrument are inconsistent, effect must be given to that part which is calculated to carry into effect the real intention of the parties as gathered from the instrument as a whole, and that part which would defeat it must be rejected. See: Sabah Flour and Feedmills Sdn. Bhd. v. Comfez Ltd. [1988] 2 Lloyd's Rep. 18.

[para55] Finally, I turn to an important point that, in my view, can clearly be made by the facts of this case. It is based on the vulnerability of the purchaser in the course of a purchase of a condominium unit from the Developer. The point is that a developer should not be allowed to rely on obscure or unclear contractual provisions in the condominium documentation in such a way as to defeat the reasonable expectations of the purchaser. Such would be contrary to the principles of good faith and fair dealing between contracting parties, contrary to the consumer protection objectives of the Act and to the developer's fiduciary obligations to purchasers of units.

[para56] I start with the principle that contracting parties owe one another a duty to act reasonably and in good faith and to perform contracts honestly made. LeMesurier v. Andrus (1986), 54 O.R. (2d) 1 (C.A.). In the case of contracts entered into as governed by consumer protection legislation such as the Act, these obligations are reinforced by terms designed to promote fair dealing between contracting parties.

[para57] In my view, in terms of a developer, the net result of these obligations, together with the fiduciary obligations identified in Newry go beyond its simply ensuring that somewhere in the documents a prospective purchaser may be fortunate enough or astute enough to ascertain what the developer is actually promising to deliver. The developer has the resources to craft a carefully written series of documents and insert in the mass of inter-related clauses any contingency or qualification upon which it might later want to rely. The purchaser, who is entitled to rely upon the developer's obligations of good faith and fair dealing and upon the purposive application of the Act, cannot be expected to invest the amount of resources necessary to decipher the intricacies of the voluminous documentation that is fundamental to the relationship between the developer and the purchaser. The purchaser is entitled to expect that the developer, in recording the agreements of the parties in terms of all of the reasonable expectations, does so with regard to serving the interests not just of the developer but of the purchaser as well. The purchaser's interests can only be protected if the purchaser is put in a position to understand the agreements. The element of trust that the prospective purchaser is entitled to have in terms of the fairness of the developer's drafting of the documents that record the transaction between the parties is in keeping with the fiduciary relationship identified by Wilson J.A. in Newry. It follows that the purchaser is entitled to expect that if the developer wants to reserve certain material matters to its own unqualified discretion, such reservations must clearly and distinctly be set out in the documents.

[para58] To me, it is unthinkable that in this case the Developer could market a project based, to some considerable extent, on the attraction of something other than residential development on the Lands, make repeated reference to this "oasis" in the documentation, and then, purportedly relying on some lurking ambiguity in the documents, embark upon a course of action, motivated solely by its own financial interests, with the result that it appropriates the Lands for itself. [para59] In my view, the resolution of the competing interests of the Developer in its attempt to build townhouses on the Lands and the owners of the units in PCC 505 and PCC 447 in preventing such development is founded on basic principles of contract law and principles of fairness as applied to transactions involving the sale of a condominium by the developer. As previously indicated the core of the analysis must be the reasonable expectations of the parties with respect to the Lands as set out in the documentation upon which the parties rely as being a record of their agreement. I have found that the reasonable expectation was that there might never have been a recreational facility or a conveyance of the Lands but not that the Developer could use the Lands as a site on which to add a residential phase to, the project.

[para60] The question that remains to be answered is the identification of the appropriate order to give effect to my conclusions. I have determined that an injunction should issue enjoining the respondents from any use of the Lands that would interfere with the intention I have found to exist that the Lands would not be used for a further residential phase of the development. [para61] The enforcement of contractual rights by injunction has a long history. An early case in Ontario is Cockburn v. Quinn (1890), 20 O.R. 519, in which the defendant had a lease from the plaintiff that contained a covenant not to use the premises for any purpose but that of a private dwelling. In violation of that covenant the defendant held nightly auction sales in the premises. MacMahon J. found that this was a breach of the covenant and granted an injunction.

[para62] More recently it has been recognized that the court retains a broad jurisdiction to order injunctions. The following passage is found in the leading authority Robert J. Sharpe, Injunctions and Specific Performance (2nd ed.) (Toronto: Canada Law Book Inc, 1992) at 148 "... the modern court is free to develop novel remedial solutions while adhering to the principle that injunctions are not to be used to create new rights in a vacuum ... jurisdiction to award injunctions should not be given a narrow meaning ... an injunction will not be barred merely because it was not the practice to grant one in the past.

[para63] Admittedly, before a court can order an injunction there must be a justifiable interest. In this case I have found that the applicants have a right to protect the Lands from being appropriated by the Developer. In my view an injunction is suitable as a means of restraining the respondents from breaching the covenant not to appropriate the Lands to themselves. Such relief is in keeping with the principles set out in the jurisprudence in which it has been made clear that a court must, before granting an injunction, consider all the surrounding circumstances which include the strict rights of the parties, the magnitude of the breach or potential breach, the injury suffered by both and the monetary loss to the parties from the granting or withholding the injunction.

[para64] In the circumstances of this case an injunction is a remedy that satisfies the applicants' substantive rights in the least burdensome way. It presents minimal intrusion on the rights of the Developer. While the Developer is prevented from proceeding with its plans to build the 25 unit townhouse development, it does have the option of proceeding with the Outdoor Recreation Area in some fashion and then the ultimate conveyance of the Lands to the participating condominium corporations. The Developer can, of course, do nothing and maintain the Lands as a type of parkland.

[para65] In terms of the applicants, I have already indicated that damages are not before me in the course of this application. I would add however, that in my view damages would be wholly inadequate to compensate the applicants not only for the loss of the wooded area they believed would be part of their community but also the loss of enjoyment of the overall character of their neighborhood.

[para66] While there is no evidence before the court concerning the monetary impact to the Developer of granting the injunction, it goes without saying that the financial consequences might well be significant. However, the Developer made the representations it did to the potential purchasers concerning the use of the Lands with its eyes open.

[para67] In all of the circumstances I find that the applicants are entitled to a permanent injunction on terms hopefully to be resolved by the parties, that would have the effect of preventing the Developer from altering the Lands in any way that would interfere with the expectations of the parties that I have found reasonable; namely, that the Lands, if used at all by the Developer, would be used for a recreational facility.

[para68] As indicated at the outset, the respondents have, by way of counter-application, requested an order discharging the caution registered against title to the Lands as instrument number LT1717607 in the Land Titles of Peel. Based on my conclusion that PCC 505 is not entitled to a conveyance of the Lands, the fact that the owners of PCC 505 specifically contracted not to register a caution of this nature, and the fact that I have decided to protect the interests of the Applicants by way of an injunction, the caution ought to be removed from the Land Titles register.

[para69] I now turn to the motion brought on behalf of Mr. Feldman for an order dismissing the action against him personally. In my opinion there is insufficient evidence to support a cause of action against Mr. Feldman. There is no evidence to support a finding that he was personally responsible for the Lands or that he had a contractual or fiduciary relationship with the applicants. Based on the manner in which the application is framed, the evidence before the court and the argument advanced I am of the view that the action against Mr. Feldman ought to be dismissed.

[para70] In the result an order will issue granting the applicants an injunction on the terms set out in these Reasons. The caution registered against the Lands is hereby ordered to be discharged. The application against Mr. Feldman is dismissed.

[para71] This application centred almost exclusively on attempts by the applicants to prevent the Developer from proceeding with a residential development on the Lands. The applicants have been successful in this regard and accordingly are entitled to their costs on a party and party basis. If counsel are unable to resolve the amount of these costs or the terms of the injunction, they may make submissions to me in writing within 30 days of today's' date.

Arthur Marian Jasinski, Plaintiff, and Mauro Trinchini and Lina Trinchini, Defendants

Action No. 60796/90Q

Ontario Court of Justice - General Division Toronto, Ontario MacPherson J. Heard: March 8, 9, 10 and 11, 1994. Judgment: March 24, 1994.

Kenneth Wolfson, for the Plaintiff. Joseph Paradiso, for the Defendants.

MacPHERSON J.:--

INTRODUCTION

[para1] The principal issues in this case concern the legal status of municipal work orders and deficiency notices and their effect on a condominium sale agreement. The issues arise in the context of a formal purchase and sale contract which included a specific tailored clause (as opposed to a standard form clause) dealing with work orders and deficiency notices.

FACTUAL BACKGROUND

[para2] In 1987 the defendants, Mauro Trinchini and Lina Scalisi (now Trinchini), were engaged to be married. They purchased a three bedroom condominium in a building with 152 units at 2825 Islington Avenue in North York. Two months later the defendants married. In the next three years two children were born and the Trinchinis decided to sell their condominium and try to purchase a private home which they felt would be more suitable for raising a young family. In the spring of 1990 they listed their condominium for sale.

[para3] The plaintiff, Arthur Jasinski, is an aircraft mechanic. He is also an investor, on a modest scale, in commercial properties. By 1990 he had purchased a tavern in Niagara Falls and a commercial building, with a bank as principal occupant, in Cowichan, British Columbia.

[para4] On the advice of a real estate agent who happened also to be a personal friend, Mr. Jasinski became interested in the Trinchinis' condominium. An Agreement of Purchase and Sale (Condominium - Resale) was signed by the parties on May 23, 1990. It is a standard form agreement; however, under paragraph 2 five special terms have been added to the agreement. Three of these terms have been typed onto the document; the other two have been written in by hand. Although three of these additional terms are relevant to this litigation, the final result of the litigation turns on the term dealing with work orders and deficiency notices. It is one of the handwritten terms and provides:

VENDOR WARRANTS THAT THERE ARE WORK ORDERS OR DEFICIENCY NOTICES OUTSTANDING AGAINST THE PROPERTY AND WILL BE COMPLIED WITH AT HIS EXPENSE ON OR BEFORE CLOSING.

[para5] On May 23, 1990 there were two existing sets of work orders issued by the City of North York in relation to the condominium building at 2825 Islington Ave. It was also known by the residents that more work orders were imminent because of ongoing inspections being conducted by officials of the City. And indeed, three further work orders were issued on July 25, 27 and 30, 1990. To their credit, the defendant vendors, through their real estate agent, brought the matter of work orders to the attention of the plaintiff's real estate agent as negotiations unfolded on May 23, 1990. To his credit, the plaintiff testified (and so did his real estate agent) that on May 23, 1990 this seemed like a minor matter on the periphery of the negotiations. However, the parties decided to deal with the matter by inserting the term set out above into the Agreement of Purchase and Sale.

[para6] The solicitor for the plaintiff submitted a letter of requisitions on August 3, 1990. This letter was not a timely one, the date for requisitions generally being July 3, 1990 and for requisitions relating to municipal work orders being August 2, 1990 (pursuant to paragraph 9 of the Agreement of Purchase and Sale). Paragraph 7 of the letter of requisitions requires "Evidence that...there are no outstanding work orders or deficiency notices under any municipal by-laws." The proper response of the defendants' solicitor was "satisfy yourself." The plaintiff's solicitor contacted the City of North York and received a reply from the Building Department on October 11, 1990. This reply enclosed copies of the July 25, 27 and 30 work orders and deficiency notices.

[para7] Between October 17 and November 1, 1990, the latter being the scheduled closing date, there was a fair amount of correspondence between the solicitors for the parties. Some of it related to the work orders. Then on November 1 the solicitor for the defendant tendered a full and proper set of closing documents. The plaintiff did not close.

[para8] The plaintiff launched an action for the return of his $10,000 deposit. The defendants resisted this claim and counterclaimed for damages totalling $43,394.59 which they allege represent the losses they suffered when the sale of their condominium did not close.

ISSUES

[para9] There are, in my view, two issues to be determined in this case:

- (1) Does any legal liability attach to either party for the failed transaction?
- (2) If the answer to Question 1 is in the affirmative, who has suffered the loss and how much in damages should be awarded to compensate for the loss?

ISSUE 1 - LIABILITY FOR FAILED TRANSACTION

[para10] The plaintiff asserts that on November 1, 1990, the scheduled closing date, there were outstanding work orders relating to the condominium building that had not been complied with. This non-compliance, says the plaintiff, is a clear violation of the express term in the Agreement of Purchase and Sale dealing with work orders. Moreover, it is a serious violation, one going to the root of the contract, and therefore entitles the purchaser to rescind from completing the transaction contemplated by the contract.

[para11] I do not agree with the plaintiff's submissions on either compliance or remedy. I will deal with them in turn.

(a) Compliance with Work Order

[para12] The condominium complex at 2825 Islington Ave. contains 152 units - two with one bedroom, seventy-five with two bedrooms and seventy-five with three bedrooms. The City of North York work orders relating to the complex in the May 23 - November 1, 1990 time period involved a mixture of major and minor repairs. The evidence of William Lewis, the manager of the complex in 1990 and today, which I found reliable and helpful, was that major repairs were required on the storage garage and some balconies and minor repairs were needed on stairwells, landings, stairwell windows, balcony guards, the swimming pool and lighting in the storage garage. The number and extent of the required repairs were not, according to Mr. Lewis, unusual for a building of this size and age. The estimated cost of all the repairs required by the work orders was $592,600. This is not, in my view, a trivial amount; however, it is also not an unusually high amount in a large multi-million dollar residential building.

[para13] The resident owners of the complex set about to comply with the work orders. There were two components to their response; one component dealt with the actual repairs, the other related to their financing.

[para14] The repairs were scheduled to take place over a two year period, with an emphasis on completing the major repairs before December 31, 1990 because of the commencement of the Goods and Services Tax on January 1, 1991. It is true that this meant that some, indeed many, of the work orders would still be outstanding on November 1, 1990, the scheduled closing date of the Jasinski-Trinchini transaction. However, in a large condominium project, unlike in a single dwelling, the regular existence of municipal work orders is the norm, not the exception. I find that the way in which the resident owners of the condominiums at 2825 Islington Ave. dealt with the scheduling of repairs was appropriate in the circumstances.

[para15] On the financial plane, the response of the resident owners was a three-pronged one - reliance on a reserve fund of $88,273, the levy of a special assessment on all the owners to pay for the cost of the major capital-related repairs, and an increase in the autumn of 1990 in the monthly maintenance fees [See footnote 1 below] payable by all owners, with some of this increase being intended to finance the minor ongoing maintenance-related repairs. A Notice of Assessment prepared on September 4, 1990 informed all of the owners of the nature, cost and scheduling of the repairs and indicated that the special assessment would cover $354,600 and maintenance fees would cover $238,000 of the total repair cost of $592,600. [See footnote 2 below] For the owners of three-bedroom condominiums, including the Trinchinis, the special assessment was $2,442 and the monthly maintenance fees increased from $309.82 to $340. * 1. There was some argument about whether maintenance fees and common expenses are the same. It is clear to me that, in terms of the documentation in this case, they are.

* 2. Presumably it was contemplated that the reserve fund of $88,273 would be used, as its title implied, as a reserve fund. [para16] The Trinchinis responded by paying the entire special assessment of $2,442 before the closing date. They also included in the documents they tendered on closing an undertaking which provided in part:

In consideration of the closing of the above transaction, we undertake and covenant as follows:

(1) The warranties in the agreement of purchase and sale shall survive and continue in force after the closing of this transaction.

Assuming that the clause in the Agreement of Purchase and Sale relating to work orders is a warranty [See footnote 3 below], the effect of paragraph (1) of the undertaking on closing is to confirm that the Trinchinis would remain responsible for paying for any additional expenses (e.g. a second Special Assessment) incurred post-closing to complete the repairs required by the pre-closing work orders. [See footnote 4 below]

* 3. See discussion below.

* 4. In fact, no further assessments or levies against the owners were ever made in connection with the work orders. [para17] In short, my tentative conclusion is that both the owners of the condominium complex acting collectively and the Trinchinis took proper steps to comply with the work orders levied against their complex. Unless compliance is interpreted to mean discharge, which is neither what the term of the agreement says, nor, in my view, realistic in a large multi-unit residential building, I cannot see what more they could have done.

[para18] The plaintiff has a different view. He says that he did not close on November 1, 1990 because the existence of the work orders made him fearful of exposure to the expenditure of more money than he was willing to pay.

[para19] I do not accept this argument. On May 23 the plaintiff offered $153,000 for the Trinchinis' condominium. If the transaction had closed on November 1 he would have paid $153,000. The special assessment paid by the Trinchinis pre-closing and their undertaking on closing constituted, in my view, complete coverage of the major capital-related repairs required by the work orders.

[para20] It is true that the monthly maintenance fee increased from $309.82 to $340 in the early autumn of 1990. However, this increase related to both regular inflation-related costs (e.g. utilities and services) and the maintenance-related repairs required by the work orders. It was an increase of less than 10 per cent. Moreover, when one examines the monthly maintenance fees over a period of years (1987 - $299; 1988 - no increase; 1989 - $310; 1990 - $340; 1991 - $364; 1992 and 1993 - no increase), it seems clear that the $30 increase in 1990 was neither particularly high nor a precursor of major repair expenditures that followed.

[para21] The plaintiff's other argument, advanced with more vigour than his fear of exposure argument, was that the existence of the work orders made it impossible for him to obtain mortgage financing for the condominium. Hence he was unable to close.

[para22] The plaintiff signed the Agreement of Purchase and Sale on May 23, 1990. One of the clauses in the Agreement made it conditional on the purchaser obtaining satisfactory financing within 10 days. On May 29 the plaintiff obtained a Mortgage Commitment from First National Financial Corporation in Oakville. On May 30 he waived the clause respecting financing. He says that in late October this mortgage company became aware of the work orders relating to the condominium complex and withdrew its mortgage commitment. He further asserts that he was unable to obtain alternative financing and was therefore unable to close on November 1, 1990.

[para23] For several reasons, I do not accept this scenario. First, the evidence about the withdrawal of the mortgage commitment is suspect. There is no letter or document from the company. There was no witness from the company. There is only a self-serving letter from the plaintiff's solicitor to the company the day before closing confirming the alleged withdrawal of the mortgage commitment.

[para24] Secondly, the plaintiff led no evidence to indicate that he made any effort to secure alternative financing. He was an investor on previous occasions and he was a client of a major bank with access to a substantial line of credit. It is difficult to believe that one rejection, if there really was one, was determinative of the plaintiff's access to mortgage money.

[para25] Third, in November 1991 the plaintiff and his wife placed a $200,000 mortgage on their principal residence. The plaintiff testified that he did this to raise money for investment purposes. A fair inference is that this money was also available to him a year earlier and would have enabled him to close the condominium purchase.

[para26] Fourth, there is a clause in the Agreement of Purchase and Sale requiring the Trinchinis to arrange a first mortgage for the plaintiff if necessary. The plaintiff never raised this possibility with the defendants or their solicitor. [para27] Fifth, and in my view conclusive, the plaintiff's testimony at trial that he did not have the funds to close once the original mortgage financing fell through is belied by his own testimony and that of his solicitor on his examination for discovery. At the discovery, Mr. Jasinski said: "I could have closed. I mean, I had the funds to close." (Q137) Mr. Feldman, the plaintiff's solicitor, said: "There would have been any number of other sources available to my client. I have in the past, arranged financing for clients and could have done so, if necessary." (Q153) I prefer this evidence to the plaintiff's testimony at trial.

[para28] My conclusion is that there was no shortage of mortgage money caused by the existence of municipal work orders relating to the condominium complex. The real reason for the plaintiff's decision not to close on November 1, 1990 was, in my view, an investment decision pure and simple.

[para29] The plaintiff testified that he purchased the condominium for his daughter who was living at home at the time. His plan was to rent the condominium for a few years while she attended courses and then give it to her when she moved out on her own.

[para30] I have some difficulty accepting that this was the principal reason for the plaintiff's decision to buy the condominium. He testified that neither he nor his daughter inspected the condominium before deciding to purchase it. Moreover, the plaintiff made no attempt to find a tenant before the November 1, 1990 closing date. And the plaintiff made no effort after the failed closing to purchase a different property for his daughter even though real estate prices have fallen drastically from 1990 to 1994. All of this leads me to conclude that, although the purchase of the Trinchini condominium might have been related in some way to a desire to do something special for his daughter, the principal reason for the proposed purchase was investment and profit.

[para31] In summary, I find that the defendants have "complied with" the work orders against the condominium complex. The steps taken by the condominium owners collectively to repair the property to comply with the work orders and the steps taken by the Trinchinis to pay their share of the expenses connected to the repairs, were, in my view, timely, full and fair. In Lemesurier v. Andrus (1986), 54 O.R. (2d) 1 (C.A.), a case in which a purchaser attempted to repudiate a land contract because of a small, non-material deficiency in title, Grange J.A. said, at p. 5:

The test is therefore whether the vendors were in a position to convey substantially what the contract called for.

[para32] In my opinion, the vendors here are on even stronger ground than the vendors in LeMesurier. In the instant case there is not just substantial compliance; there is, in my view, total compliance. On November 1, 1990 the defendants were in a position to deliver to the plaintiff the property at the price agreed to on May 23, 1990.

[para33] The only fact that changed between May 23 and November 1 was that the common expenses for the Trinchinis' condominium increased from $309.82 to $340 per month. However, this represents an increase of less than ten per cent; moreover, in the years the Trinchinis owned the condominium (1987-1990) the average annual increase was about six per cent. As well, Clause 5 of the Agreement of Purchase and Sale (a standard form clause) states that the vendor warrants that the common expenses "presently payable" by the vendor are $309.82; it is implicit (indeed it is the essence of condominium ownership) that these monthly payments will increase over time as the costs of maintaining and servicing the entire condominium complex rise.

[para34] It is, of course, open to a prospective purchaser to guard against the existence of any work orders at the time of closing. A clause stating that all existing work orders must be discharged would suffice. So would a clause providing that the vendor warrants that on the closing date there will be no outstanding work orders against the property: see, for example, Jorian Properties Ltd. v. Zellenrath (1984), 46 O.R. (2d) 775 (C.A.), and Table Stake Construction Ltd. v. Jones (1977), 18 O.R. (2d) 203 (H.C.). [See footnote 5 below]

* 5. Such a clause would still leave open the question of what is the appropriate remedy for its breach. See discussion below in Section 1(b) - Remedy. [para35] The language of the clause in the instant case is not as specific as "discharge" or "no outstanding work orders." Rather the clause acknowledges that there are work orders outstanding against the property, but that these will be "complied with" at the vendor's expense before closing. In my view, for the reasons I have enumerated, the vendors in the instant case have fulfilled their obligations under this clause.

[para36] In their closing arguments, both counsel spent a good deal of time discussing the relatively recent decision of Roberts J. of this Court in Ahuntsic Investments Inc. v. Cheng (1992), 28 R.P.R. (2d) 16. In that case the defendant Cheng contracted to purchase a resale condominium unit from the plaintiff vendor. Cheng became aware of a work order relating to the condominium complex and refused to close when it was not discharged by the closing date. The vendors sued for breach of contract and were successful in a trial before Roberts J.

[para37] The key clause in the Agreement of Purchase and Sale in Ahuntsic provided in part:

9. ... If within that time [purchaser] shall furnish vendor in writing with any valid objection to title or to any outstanding work order which vendor shall be unable to remove, remedy or satisfy and which purchaser will not waive, this agreement shall be null and void and all deposit monies paid by purchaser hereunder shall be refunded. [Emphasis added]

[para38] Roberts J. held that the vendors had complied with this clause. The reserve fund established by the condominium corporation, the absence of any special assessment against the owners, and the work schedule for repairs led him to conclude that the vendors had in fact "satisfied" the work order.

[para39] In the instant case, Mr. Wolfson, counsel for the plaintiff, urged that Ahuntsic should not be followed or applied. He advanced two arguments in support of this proposition - first, that Ahuntsic was wrongly decided; second, that important factual differences make it distinguishable.

[para40] The principal basis for the first argument is the critical annotation written about Roberts J.'s decision in the case report. The author of the annotation calls it "a curious decision" and "a rather unique decision". The essence of his criticism is contained in this passage, at p. 16:

Roberts J.'s rather unique decision appears to indicate that a work order in the process of being complied with may not necessarily be an "outstanding" order. The difficulty is that a purchaser now appears to be saddled with the burden of establishing that a work order registered against a particular property is indeed outstanding. It is submitted that the particular facts in Ahuntsic made this determination rather simple. The decision provides no guidelines to determine when a purchaser should be "satisfied" that a work order is no longer outstanding. [para41] The problem with this passage, in my respectful view, is the very first sentence. As I read Roberts J.'s reasons, he is not saying that a work order in the process of being complied with is not an "outstanding" work order. Rather, he examines the entire clause relating to work orders, which admittedly refers to "outstanding" work orders, but also speaks of the vendor's opportunity to "remove, remedy or satisfy" them. The use of the word "satisfy" in addition to the word "remove" implies that something other than complete removal or discharge of the work order before closing is contemplated and permitted. So Roberts J. is not saying that an outstanding work order is rendered not outstanding by an appropriate course of conduct by the vendors directed towards compliance. What he is saying is that the notion of satisfaction or compliance, at least in a condominium context, is a flexible one inviting consideration of the wording of the governing clause in the agreement and the conduct of the parties, especially the vendors, with respect to the work orders.

[para42] I agree with Roberts J.'s approach and decision in Ahuntsic. There are clear differences between large condominium complexes and private homes with respect to work orders, as well as with respect to the ease with which they can be removed. Large condominium complexes frequently have work orders issued against them, while this is only infrequently the case for private homes. Furthermore, while an individual home owner, acting alone, can take steps to remove a work order against his or her home, an individual condominium owner cannot remove a work order against the entire condominium complex acting on his or her own.

[para43] Therefore, it would be unrealistic and unfair to interpret a clause relating to work orders in a purchase and sale agreement as requiring total discharge, unless, of course, there is specific language to that effect in the agreement. If there is not such language ("no outstanding work orders", "discharge", "removal"), if the language couples "outstanding" with "compliance" (this case) or "satisfaction" (Ahuntsic), then, in my view, it is appropriate and necessary to conduct a broader inquiry along the lines suggested by Roberts J. in Ahuntsic.

[para44] In argument, Mr. Paradiso, counsel for the defendants, said that the purchaser of a condominium must understand that participation in a condominium enterprise involves both ownership and partnership. This is an apt and attractive description. In the context of work orders, this combination invites recognition of the fact that work orders are a regular, in some cases even continuous, feature of the life of a large condominium complex. Moreover, dealing with the work orders is beyond the control of a single owner vendor; co-operation among all the owners is required.

[para45] Against this real world background of the nature of a condominium enterprise, I would hold that in interpreting a clause relating to work orders in an Agreement of Purchase and Sale, if the clause combines the fact of a work order being outstanding with the opportunity for the vendor to satisfy or comply with it, then to determine whether there has been compliance with the work order, it is appropriate to examine the conduct of the collective ownership of the condominium enterprise, the conduct of the owner vendor, and the conduct, especially the reliance, of the prospective purchaser. In this case, the administrative and financial steps taken by the collective ownership, the actual payments and undertakings made by the defendants in aid and anticipation of closing, and the conduct of the proposed purchaser lead me to the conclusion that there was sufficient compliance with the work orders to require the closing of the transaction on November 1, 1990.

[para46] The plaintiff's other argument concerning Ahuntsic was that, even if the legal principles enunciated in it are correct, the case is nevertheless distinguishable from the instant case because of several important factual differences. Those alleged differences were that the purchaser in Ahuntsic was an experienced investor whereas Mr. Jasinski is not, that there was a large reserve fund of $800,000 in the condominium enterprise in Ahuntsic whereas there was only $88,000 in the fund at 2825 Islington Ave., and that the extra cost of the work orders to the purchaser in Ahuntsic was $181, a de minimus amount, whereas in the instant case the exposure of the purchaser was for an unknown, and presumably higher, amount.

[para47] I am not persuaded that any of these differences are important, let alone determinative. First, Mr. Jasinski, although not as experienced an investor as Ms. Cheng, nevertheless had previous investment experience in commercial properties in Ontario and British Columbia. Second, the difference in the reserve fund is irrelevant; what is important is whether the financial steps taken by the owners collectively and the defendant vendors personally constituted compliance with the work orders. Reserve funds, special assessments, maintenance fees and warranties can all contribute to compliance. Third, as discussed above, the plaintiff's fear of long term financial exposure for the repairs required by the work orders was not the real reason for his failure to close. And even if it were, there was no basis for it in light of the financial arrangements that had been made by both the defendants and all the owners of the condominium complex. Accordingly, I am not prepared to find that Ahuntsic is irrelevant to the instant case.

(b) Remedy - Essential Condition or Warranty?

[para48] Since I have decided that the defendants did not violate the clause relating to work orders in the Agreement of Purchase and Sale, it is not necessary, strictly speaking, to consider the plaintiff's further submission that the violation constituted a breach of a fundamental condition of the contract which entitled him to repudiate or rescind. However, in case my decision on the work order compliance/violation issue is wrong, I will address the issue that would follow on, namely, what is the remedy to which the plaintiff is entitled?

[para49] The answer to that question depends on whether the clause relating to work orders is a condition or warranty. The difference between the two has been enunciated by many courts and scholars. One of the clearest formulations, in my opinion, is that of Blair J.A. (dissenting, but not on this point) in Jorian Properties, supra, at p. 779:

What has been called "the dichotomy of condition and warranty", which originally applied to contracts for the sale of goods, now extends to contracts generally: Cheshire and Fifoot's Law of Contract, 10th ed. (1981), p. 132 et seq. A breach of condition entails more serious consequences than a breach of warranty. If there is a breach of condition, the innocent party may elect to treat himself as discharged from the contract or to maintain the contract and recover damages for the breach. If there is breach of warranty, the innocent party can only claim damages for breach of the particular term and may not treat the contract as ended and claim damages for the loss of the whole contract: Chitty on Contracts, 25th ed. (1983), vol. 1, p. 409 para. 746.

[para50] How, then, is one to determine whether a contractual term is a condition or a warranty? In Jorian Properties, both Zuber J.A. for the majority and Blair J.A. in dissent relied on a passage from Lord Diplock's judgment in Hongkong Fir Shipping Co. v. Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd., [1962] 2 Q.B. 26 (C.A.), at pp. 65-6:

[I]n what event will a party be relieved of his undertaking to do that which he has agreed to do but has not yet done?

The test whether an event has this effect or not has been stated in a number of metaphors all of which I think amount to the same thing: does the occurrence of the event deprive the party who has further undertakings still to perform of substantially the whole benefit which it was the intention of the parties as expressed in the contract that he should obtain as the consideration for performing those undertakings?

[para51] I have no hesitation concluding that the clause relating to work orders in the Agreement of Purchase and Sale in the instant case is a warranty, not a condition. I say this for three reasons.

[para52] First, the clause itself says "VENDOR WARRANTIES". It is true that labels are not determinative in every case: see Lamont, Real Estate Conveyancing, 2nd ed., p. 3-33. Nevertheless, a good starting point, in my view, is the assumption that use of the verb "warrants" in a contract indicates that the provision is a "warranty", not a "condition."

[para53] Second, there is authority in Ontario for the proposition that a clause relating to work orders can be, depending on the drafting and circumstances, a warranty. In Table Stake Construction, supra, the relevant clause stated:

The Vendor warrants that on the closing date there will be no outstanding work orders against the property.

[para54] After a discussion of the relevant principles and case law, Osler J.'s conclusion about the legal status of this clause was stated in these terms, at pp. 211-2:

[I]n my view the non-fulfilment of the term in question would not affect the substance and foundation of the transaction and the obligation arising from that term does not go so directly to the substance of the contract that its non-performance may be considered non-performance of the contract itself. I conclude, without doubt, that the term I have been discussing was, in law, a warranty. This is an important conclusion as a breach of warranty does not entitle the innocent party to specific performance but only to claim damages.

[para55] By parity of reasoning, in the instant case the plaintiff would not be entitled to repudiate the contract if the work order clause in the agreement had been violated. His only remedy would be damages.

[para56] Third, I do not believe that violation of the work order clause in the instant case would deprive the plaintiff of "substantially the whole benefit" of the contract. On November 1, 1990 Mr. Jasinski could have received the property he desired at the price he agreed to pay. The continuation beyond November 1 of some work orders might have constituted, at most, a minor administrative inconvenience and a small, perhaps even negligible, financial exposure.

[para57] My conclusion on this issue is that, even if the clause relating to work orders had been violated, the plaintiff was not entitled to feel that he was discharged from his obligation to close on November 1, 1990. His only remedy would have been in damages for breach of warranty. ISSUE 2 - DAMAGES

[para58] The effects on the defendants of the plaintiff's failure to close on November 1, 1990 were devastating, both emotionally and financially. Mr. Trinchini had a job with a modest income and Mrs. Trinchini was at home with two pre-school children. In anticipation of the sale of the condominium they had agreed to purchase a new home with a closing date of November 1. They followed through on this transaction, as they were legally bound to do. The financial consequences of owning two properties after November 1 were very serious indeed.

[para59] I have no hesitation concluding that the defendants have proved all of their damages and that they did everything possible to mitigate them. I was impressed by the evidence of Mrs. Trinchini and of Mr. Joseph D'Addio, the defendants' real estate agent, on these points. Moreover, the plaintiff led no evidence to challenge any of the claims or calculations advanced by the defendants.

[para60] Accordingly, I find that the defendants are entitled to damages as follows:

- (1) Loss on the timely (January 2, 1991) and fair market value sale of the condominium - $28,000.00
- (2) Re-negotiation of mortgage related to failed closing on November 1, 1990 - 1,808.53
- (3) Interest on bridge financing during period of owning two properties - 983.01
- (4) Interest on line of credit required to carry two properties - 2,151.69
- (5) Common expenses on condominium property for three months - 1,020.00
- (6) Taxes paid on condominium property for three months - 256.36

(7) Legal costs of failed transaction - 1,525.00 ----- Sub-total - $35,744.59 [See footnote 6 below] * 6. The defendants also claim $7,650 as their share of the real estate commissions payable on the failed transaction. Although the technical wording of the Agreement of Purchase and Sale might appear to permit the agents and their companies to collect these commissions, both agents involved in the transaction testified that they had in fact not received any commissions and had no expectation of doing so. Accordingly, I am assuming that the plaintiff's $10,000 deposit, currently being held by Re/Max Professionals Inc., will be returned to him and not used to pay commissions. If I am wrong about this, counsel may notify me and I will consider the defendants' claim for a further $7,650. [para61] The plaintiff is also entitled to pre-judgment interest at 12.9 per cent for forty months which works out to $15,370.17.

CONCLUSION

[para62] The plaintiff's claim is dismissed. The defendants' counterclaim is allowed. The defendants are entitled to damages in the amount of $35,744.59 and pre-judgment interest of $15,370.17.

[para63] The defendants are also entitled to their costs of this action which may be spoken to, if necessary.

CASE REFERENCE NO. 297

Allen Singer and Nancy Singer, Applicants, and Reemark Sterling I Limited, Respondent

Ontario Judgments: Action No. 7807/92

Ontario Court of Justice - General Division Toronto, Ontario White J. Heard: April 1, 1992 Judgment: May 22, 1992

Carolyn J. Johnson, for the Applicants. Marc T. Huber, for the Respondent.

WHITE J.:-- The applicants seek the following relief: (i) a declaration that the general agreement providing for the purchase of condominium unit 1201 in the condominium development known as Sterling Club I at 320 McCowan Road, Scarborough, Ontario between Allen Singer and Nancy Sheila Singer, as purchasers, and the respondent, as vendor, is null and void;

(ii) a declaration that the general agreement providing for the purchase of condominium unit 1308 in this condominium development between Allen Singer, as purchaser, and the respondent, as vendor, is null and void;

(iii) a declaration that Allen Singer and Nancy Singer are entitled to the return of all monies paid to the vendor pursuant to the unit purchase agreement forming part of the general agreement for unit 1201;

(iv) a declaration that Allen Singer is entitled to the return of all monies paid to the vendor pursuant to the unit purchase agreement forming part of the general agreement for unit 1308 in the development;

(v) certificates of pending litigation against the title of the relevant units; and,

(vi) the costs of this application.

FACTS:

On the 14th of December, 1987, Allen Singer executed a general agreement with respect to unit 1308 for the purchase of that unit with the respondent. On the same date, he and his wife, Nancy Singer, executed a general agreement with respect to the purchase of unit 1201 with the respondent.

In a series of payments, Mr. Singer has paid the respondent $32,051.18 towards the purchase of unit 1308 and he and his wife have paid the respondent the sum of $42,982.75 towards the purchase of unit 1201.

The general agreements both refer to the following documents: unit purchase agreement, financial schedule, trust agreement, development agreement, services agreement, rental management agreement, guarantee agreement and appliances lease. These documents are appended to the general agreement and are integral parts of the general agreement.

In Article 1.06 of the unit purchase agreement, the purchaser acknowledges purchasing an undivided interest in the land with the objects of acquiring beneficial ownership of pro-rated undivided interests, developing the land and registering a condominium declaration with respect to the lands. Individual ownerships of the units shall be transferred to each of the purchasers for whom the vendor holds registered title as bare trustee.

Article 2.01 of the unit purchase agreement sets out the purchase price and a schedule of payment for the purchaser's lands, the work, landscaping, paving and initial services.

Article 4.02 of the unit purchase agreement provides that the transfer of the condominium unit to the purchaser shall take place on the transfer date.

Article 5.01(e) of the unit purchase agreement prevents the purchaser from assigning, selling or transferring his interest in the agreement, the land or the unit on or before the transfer date or before the vendor has received full proceeds of the mortgage.

Article 12.01(x) of the unit purchase agreement defines the transfer date to be the later of September 1, 1989 and the date being fifteen days after the purchaser has been notified that the condominium declaration has been registered subject to the provisions of Article 11.03 of the unit purchase agreement and Article 1.08 of the development agreement.

Article 13.08 of the unit purchase agreement provides that time shall continue to be of the essence of the agreements in all respects and any waiver of any time provision shall not be effective unless in writing and signed.
